In a debate in the House on 2 April on the international arms trade, the Minister described my speech, which had criticised the Government's so-called ethical foreign policy, as "sad" and "churlish". It is not my behaviour in this sorry saga that we are debating tonight that I consider to be sad. The hon. Gentleman went on—as Ministers always do—to blame the previous Government, and said that I should have stood up and said that we were genuinely sorry. Tonight, the House will want to know whether the Minister is a big enough man to stand up and say that he is sorry.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tony Lloyd): I am delighted to speak about Sierra Leone before such a packed House. The House of Commons tonight, with full Opposition Benches, contrasts markedly with the House during the debate on 12 March. My speech on that occasion has attracted the interest of both the shadow Foreign Secretary, the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), and his junior spokesman, the hon. Member for Westbury (Mr. Faber). However, neither of them took the trouble to attend that debate—although a solitary Conservative Back Bencher spoke in it. That was the level of Opposition interest in the events in Sierra Leone. We have had to wait from the restoration of President Kabbah until now to hear the Opposition even welcome the President's return to power in that country.

Let me say at the outset that the Government's policy with respect to Sierra Leone has been a success, and it has been a success for an ethical foreign policy. I shall tell the House a little about the events that took place.

Mr. Robathan: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Lloyd: No, the hon. Gentleman has already made several interventions.

From the time of the coup, the Government recognised and supported the legitimate elected Government of President Kabbah, even while he was in exile. We regarded as illegitimate the junta that had taken his place. We wanted democratic Government to be restored and we were delighted when it was. However, we wanted it done legally—that is an important point as many Opposition Members, particularly the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir J. Stanley), have fudged such issues. We wanted it to happen in accordance with United Nations Security Council resolutions as that is the correct way for such things to occur.

We contemplated the threat or use of force, but only as a last resort. When we were asked about it—only one Conservative Member asked a question about Sierra Leone from the time of the coup last July until recently—we said that we preferred to see negotiations, which would avoid bloodshed and harm to the people of Sierra Leone. We made it clear that the possibility of force was available as a last resort, but only with the blessing of the United Nations. That is the right and proper way for the Government to behave, and we do not resile from that approach.

We did not want arms to flow into the region—that goes to resolution 1132, which the hon. Member for Westbury does not seem to have read—even if they were meant for the good people, as they could easily have ended up in the wrong hands. We made it clear over and over again that we would not support any illegal action. President Kabbah got the message. In his letter to the Prime Minister of 11 May, he said:

"I recall, during the Commonwealth meeting in Edinburgh, Mr. Tony Lloyd remarking that while the British Government would continue to give diplomatic and other support to my Government, it could not provide it with lethal materials or weapons. As far as I was concerned, the matter was closed."

Several interesting points have emerged during the debate, and one of them concerns the role of the Opposition. I am not even sure whether the shadow Foreign Secretary knows who got rid of the junta in Sierra Leone. I can inform him that ECOMOG, not Sandline, got rid of that regime. The shadow Foreign Secretary and his hon. Friends do not seem to realise that. ECOMOG conducted a significant military operation and forced the junta to take flight. President Kabbah's letter to the Prime Minister said:

"As I review the media reports in London, it struck me that Sandline's role in the removal of the illegal regime and the return of my Government has been exaggerated."

That is an understatement. He goes on to say that the weapons arrived only after the removal of the illegal regime—that is an important point—and the liberation of Freetown by ECOMOG. President Kabbah said:

"I assure you most emphatically that at no time did my Government utilise mercenaries provided by Sandline."

He continued:

"It is erroneous for anyone to suggest that Sandline was involved in a coup . . . on my behalf."

Sandline did not restore President Kabbah's Government.

Mr. Blunt: At this point, the Minister should know that the issue of arms is neither here nor there. Crucial to the military success of the ECOMOG operation was the military assistance and advice given by Sandline to President Kabbah, with the knowledge of the High Commissioner. That package included arms, and President Kabbah signed the end user certificate knowing that they came from a British company.

Mr. Lloyd: The hon. Gentleman must appreciate that there is nothing in the Security Council resolution or in Britain's national legislation—the Order in Council—that could control advice provided to President Kabbah. Is the hon. Gentleman serious in raising that point? We have said continually that there was no ministerial approval of any breach of the United Nations arms embargo. I reiterate that Sandline did not restore President Kabbah's Government: that was achieved by forces, chiefly Nigerian, contributed by ECOMOG. It was a trained and well-equipped army, and, frankly, a few mercenaries with a handful of arms shipped via Bulgaria could not do the job.

Dr. Tonge: I thank the Minister for giving way. Will he tell the House whether he and his Government are entirely happy about the involvement of the Nigerian Government in restoring power to President Kabbah? Many people in Sierra Leone are particularly worried about that and about the influence that Nigeria will have over them in the future.

Mr. Lloyd: I shall come to that point in a moment. The British Government—this is germane to the hon. Lady's question—did not fully endorse the ECOMOG action, because there was no Security Council resolution mandating that invasion.

Mr. Howard rose—

Mr. Lloyd: If the right hon. and learned Gentleman will allow me to finish my point, I shall certainly give way.

On 12 March, I told the House:

"while we welcome the fact that the rule of the military junta has been brought to an end, we were unable wholeheartedly to endorse the ECOMOG action. We believe that any use of force should be based in international law."—[Official Report, 12 March 1998; Vol. 308, c. 842.]

I hope that the right hon. and learned Gentleman will endorse that view.

Mr. Howard: Certainly. If the hon. Gentleman takes the view—as he has done consistently—that the ECOMOG action that restored President Kabbah was contrary to international law, how can he conceivably justify his claim at the outset of his speech that the return of President Kabbah was a great success for British foreign policy?

Mr. Lloyd: Self-evidently, the return of President Kabbah is welcome, and Britain did several things to assist it. The right hon. and learned Gentleman does not seem to be aware that, while we regret that the military observer group of the Organisation of West African States—ECOWAS—did not await a United Nations mandate before intervening, Britain worked very hard to ensure that it knew that we would support such a resolution if proper rules of engagement and a proper military plan were presented to the United Nations to give it legal legitimacy. That is the action of a responsible Government.

Since then, we have contributed to ECOWAS. We have offered logistical support, and we have contributed £2 million to the United Nations trust fund for ECOMOG, which is targeted at issues such as disarmament and demobilisation. However, we did not fully endorse the actions of the Nigerian army that did the job. Therefore, it is ludicrous to suggest that we would endorse the actions of mercenaries who made no difference in that situation.

Mr. Garnier: In light of the Minister's remarks in the past five or 10 minutes, does he agree that the Prime Minister's intervention and his description of this affair as "hoo-hah" were deeply unwise?

Mr. Lloyd: The Prime Minister always made quite clear the parameters of events. He made it clear that we strongly welcome the restoration of President Kabbah—and the Opposition concur with that view. The Prime Minister said that the restoration of the legitimate Government in Sierra Leone was possible only through legal action, and he has never said anything other than that. He is consistent in that view.

Equally, the Prime Minister has not endorsed any action—he made this very clear, and the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) should know that—that is in breach of the United Nations arms embargo, which would be deplorable. However, the Prime Minister did say that the Opposition's attempts to use the incident for domestic political purposes were the kind of hoo-hah that we all deplore. [Interruption.] At the end of the day, the shadow Foreign Secretary knows that.

That is why, between May last year and May this year, Opposition Members asked not one question about Sierra Leone. They made not one observation about Sierra Leone, and they made no attempt to raise issues regarding human rights abuses in that country—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. I will not allow any shouting in the Chamber. The House must come to order.

Mr. Lloyd: Opposition Members may shout all they want, but the simple reality is that the shadow Foreign Secretary and his junior spokesman showed not one scrap of interest in Sierra Leone during those long months.

I shall tell the House what has happened in Sierra Leone. This is important. I shall try to do this dispassionately. When I went to Sierra Leone I was shown pictures of the atrocities committed by the Revolutionary United Front. I was shown a picture of a decapitated body. The head had been placed between the legs as a warning to others. That is an example of the atrocities that took place regularly. At no point during 12 months did one question come to the Foreign Office from the shadow Foreign Secretary. Why not?

Mr. Faber rose—

Mr. Lloyd: It seems that the junior Opposition spokesman will explain why. Please do.

Mr. Faber: I made this clear in my speech. We deplore the atrocities that took place. I referred to the Prime Minister's intervention on this matter as pathetic, and pathetic it was. As the Minister took such a close interest in matters in Sierra Leone, will he tell us when he first knew, and from whom?

Mr. Lloyd: It is astonishing that the hon. Gentleman is prepared to rise to speak about his own actions. For 12 months, the hon. Gentleman with Opposition responsibility for Africa seemed oblivious to the fact that the coup had taken place in Sierra Leone. He raised not one question or protest during that period. Not once did he display interest in what had happened in Sierra Leone.

Dr. Tonge: I thank the Minister for giving way again. I well remember when he told the House of the atrocities in Sierra Leone, because that was during the debate on arms contracts and arms sales. The official Opposition did not attend that debate.

I noticed from the Foreign Office press releases that on the day when you were speaking about those atrocities in Sierra Leone, and horrifying the House with your descriptions, you had that morning met President Kabbah of Sierra Leone. I wonder whether you had heard anything about this matter—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have not met President Kabbah.

Mr. Lloyd: I am not sure about the matter of Sandline, to which the hon. Lady has referred, and President Kabbah. President Kabbah and I never discussed Sandline during the various meetings that I have had with him.

I shall tell the House what the Government did do. Most certainly, Britain was responsible consistently for actions at the United Nations. Britain was responsible for making sure that President Kabbah was invited to Edinburgh for the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting, uniquely for a president in exile. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister appointed John Flynn, and his role is perfectly straightforward. He has not been appointed to conspire on behalf of Sandline. He is to work for the Government in terms of our policy.

The hon. Member for Westbury should be careful about the level of innuendo—[Interruption.] John Flynn is a respected former diplomat and should be given that recognition.

Britain sent in HMS Cornwall after the coup had been thrown out, as it were, in Freetown. The ship took part in humanitarian activity. HMS Cornwall took no part in military action against the coup plotters or even in favour of President Kabbah. The House should be more proud of the Royal Navy's role and a little ashamed of the insinuations that it has behaved somehow dishonourably. I hope that the shadow Foreign Secretary will be very careful.

Sir Peter Emery rose—

Mr. Lloyd: No, I shall not give way. I ask the right hon. Gentleman to forgive me.

Since then I have visited Sierra Leone, along with the Commonwealth ministerial action group. I met once again with President Kabbah. I met nobody in Sierra Leone from Sandline. I have met nobody from Sandline, and will meet nobody from Sandline. I think that my record on that score stands complete.

Since the coup Britain has been working hard at the United Nations to ensure that there is a peacekeeping role for ECOMOG—to make sure that there are military observers to take part in the process of demilitarisation and demobilisation.

I shall make a political point about what happened hitherto in Sierra Leone. The coup took place because the Conservative Government did not make an effort to ensure that democracy was solid in Sierra Leone. That is why the coup took place. We shall not make that mistake again. That is why we are continually engaged—that is why £2 million has gone into the United Nations trust fund.

Mr. Howard: As a matter of fact, it was the previous Government who paid for the elections as a result of which President Kabbah came to power.

The Minister of State has seven minutes left to answer the many specific questions that have been put to him during the debate, not least by the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott). Will he now answer the questions that have been put to him and account to the House for his conduct in this matter?

Mr. Lloyd: My account to the House is very clear. I made a clear statement last Thursday and I shall be judged by that. I shall come on to that in a few minutes. Before doing so, I shall quote once again from President Kabbah in his letter to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. He wrote:

"I hasten to add that the people of Sierra Leone will be for ever grateful to your Government and the British people for the timely assistance, encouragement and support you gave us in our hour of need."

Those are not the words of someone who thought that Britain had not done enough. They were the words of a man who thought that Britain had played a noble role in the restoration of democracy in Sierra Leone. It is a role that I am proud to have had a part in, and that is the position of my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary.

Sir Peter Emery rose—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The House must come to order. The House must be quiet.

Sir Peter Emery: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Lloyd: I do not think that Conservative Members are terribly interested in listening. However, it is clear that Sandline has made many allegations. It wanted to exaggerate its military role and its contacts with officials. As my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has already said, we should be careful in not repeating allegations made by Sandline to those who cannot defend themselves in this place. However, that does not mean for one second that we would condone any breach of the United Nations' ban or sanction. Any such allegation is treated with the utmost gravity. That is why the allegation was referred to Customs and Excise.

I cannot go beyond the statement of my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General except to say that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has not seen the report of the officers of Customs and Excise. My right hon. Friend was not a party to the decision made by the commissioners. I cannot add to the statement that they have made today. However, I can assure the House that, if the conduct of anyone in the Foreign Office has been a factor in the commissioners' decision, that will be fully investigated and revealed by the investigation that my right hon. Friend has already announced. That is an important assurance to the House. Hon Members should give the House the courtesy of accepting that the inquiry should go ahead on the basis outlined, so that it can get to the bottom of these matters.

Clearly, the inquiry must go to the truth and it will get to the truth. It is worth the House recognising something that the Opposition are reluctant to accept, in that it was Foreign Office officials, whom the Opposition scorn, who warned Sandline, as my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has said, that the United Nations arms embargo was in force. Once Foreign Office officials were told that it was alleged that the arms embargo had been breached, they referred the matter to Customs and Excise.

The right hon. Member for East Devon (Sir P. Emery) said in the House last week that it was astonishing that the matter had not been referred to me before being put to Customs and Excise. The right hon. Gentleman is not only wrong but outrageous. It would be ridiculous for Ministers to be asked to comment on the reference of potential criminal activities. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will take this opportunity to retract.

Sir Peter Emery: In a slightly calmer vein, and in an effort to defend Foreign Office officials who the Minister says cannot defend themselves, will the Minister give the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, as it has requested, the memos of the meetings of officials that are in the hands of the Foreign Office along with the notes made and the telegrams that have been received? Those documents will speak louder than any of the Minister's words, and we shall then know the truth.

Mr. Lloyd: These are clearly matters for the inquiry. It is a shame that the right hon. Gentleman did not retract his ridiculous statement of last week.

I have many meetings with many people. The one common thread joining non-governmental organisations, President Kabbah and many other people is that the subject that did not come up was Sandline. Sandline was a sideline.

The House is being gripped by Sandline fever. The shadow Foreign Secretary has been determined to try to make his name on it. We understand why. In the absence of any foreign policy, it is necessary to grasp at whatever comes to hand.

The hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Mr. Campbell) asked whether the inquiry would cover the Nixonian formula: what Ministers knew and what they should have known. Let me make it clear to the hon. and learned Gentleman that I shall welcome appearing before an inquiry, and shall welcome precisely that line of questioning. It is important for the confidence of this House in my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, and in me, that such questions are asked. I shall co-operate fully with the inquiry and ensure that those questions are answered.

Many questions have been put to me. I congratulate the shadow Foreign Secretary on the award that he won last week from the Royal Television Society for his interview with Jeremy Paxman, when he refused 14 times to answer a question about whether he had overruled Derek Lewis.

The Government have nothing to hide and will hide nothing. We shall get to the bottom of all this. Contrast that with the sleazy actions of the previous Government, of whom the shadow Foreign Secretary was part. They covered up arms to Iraq—a real scandal—and still do not apologise.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 31 (Questions on amendments) and agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House notes the Government's consistent policy of support for the restoration of President Kabbah and recognition of him as the elected and legitimate President of Sierra Leone and welcomes the success of that policy and the overthrow of the brutal and repressive military regime; applauds the open and proper manner in which the Government have responded to allegations of a breach of the UN arms embargo; and congratulates the Government on its commitment to an urgent outside investigation and publication of a full report.

Territorial Army

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire): I beg to move,

That this House views with concern recent reports that the size of the Territorial Army may be reduced to 40,000 and that it may be stripped of many of its combat units; recognises the role of the Territorial Army both in complementing the role of the regular army on active service in places such as Bosnia and in providing a strategic reserve of trained combat and supporting units in case of wider conflict; applauds the work of the Territorial Auxiliary and Volunteer Reserve Associations around the country in providing opportunities for young people to volunteer in the reserves and cadets, and in building bridges between local communities and the armed forces; and urges the Government to use the Strategic Defence Review to develop rather than undermine the role of this important national resource.

Over the past 10 years, most Opposition days have been used to castigate Governments for mistakes that they have been perceived to have made. We have a different objective: to persuade the Government to avoid a mistake that we fear that they are about to make. The motion that we have tabled on the Territorial Army is as non-partisan as they come. It embraces views that have been expressed by hon. Members on both sides of the House, at both ends of the building and by informed opinion outside Parliament about the feared impact of the strategic defence review on the size and the role of the TA.

I am slightly surprised that the Government are seeking to amend our motion, and no doubt we shall hear which of its propositions the Government have difficulty with, but the absence of invective on the Order Paper should not disguise the concern that has inspired the debate and, indeed, a recent spate of hyperactivity in the Ministry of Defence, doubtless in the hope of avoiding intervention by the Minister without Portfolio.

The cause of our concern is a series of reports by defence correspondents, especially Michael Evans of The Times, who seems to be well informed, that the TA will be cut to 40,000. I also understand that the SDR reserves paper, which was discussed in the MOD on 6 February, proposed that the size of the TA should be approximately 40,000. Perhaps the Secretary of State can confirm that. We know from Ministers that they plan to retain or to enhance the TA's specialist capabilities, so the only way that they could reach the figure that I have mentioned is by substantial reductions of about 80 per cent. in the infantry.

In response to that suggested reduction, we have had two lively debates in the House. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) for their diligence in initiating those debates and for their advocacy during them. However, nothing that Ministers have said in reply has allayed that concern.

There was also a much longer debate in the other place. There were no fewer than 33 Back-Bench speakers—many only recently retired from advising Ministers at the MOD—of whom only two took the Government brief. Commenting on the possible reasons for that, Lord Gilbert said:

"One is that my noble friends have total confidence in the way the Government are running the country".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 22 April 1998; Vol. 590, c. 1225.]

A less charitable commentator might be driven to the opposite conclusion.

I choose just one quotation from the many speakers in our three excellent debates. The hon. Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George), the Chairman of the Select Committee on Defence, whom I of course notified of my intention to quote him, said:

"The fact that there are so many Members here in the early afternoon is a warning to the Treasury and the Ministry of Defence that messing around with what is left of our reserves would be difficult and dangerous . . . Warfare has not changed so greatly as to render our traditional reserves superfluous; nor are they there only to plug holes left in the MOD's budget . . . If we find that the reserves have been relegated to superfluity, I am convinced that there will be tremendous reaction throughout the country, reflected in the House."—[Official Report, 8 April 1998; Vol. 310, c. 313.]

I believe that he is right, and if Ministers will not listen to me, they should listen to him. I am delighted that he is in his place for the debate.

The Opposition want to give further momentum to the concern to which I have referred. We hope not only to persuade the Government to change their proposals, but to bring to a swift conclusion the increasingly embarrassing delay in publishing the SDR, for which we still have no date. Ministers keep telling us how thorough, inclusive and transparent was the exercise that led to the report that they sent to their colleagues at the end of March. Despite that, however, their colleagues want between three and four months to validate that comprehensive exercise. As we have constantly been told that it is not Treasury-driven, we wonder who is holding it up.

In the meantime, there is an increasingly damaging impact on morale, on recruitment and on procurement. The Secretary of State is probably equally frustrated by the delay, but is too polite to say so. However, he owes it to the service for which he has responsibility to bring the exercise to a swift conclusion.

In speaking about the TA, it is no part of my case to look backwards rather than forwards or to set regular against reserve. There must be a good, forward-looking relationship between the two because they depend on each other. The Regular Army depends on the TA to complete battalions that are sent to Bosnia; the TA depends on the Regular Army for its marching orders, and they share a common culture and ethos. The future of the TA and the long-term health of the Regular Army are inextricably linked, and there is no advantage in reducing the TA infantry to insignificance, as the strategic defence review apparently suggests, while hoping to man an enhanced regular infantry.

The Minister for the Armed Forces has said that the reserves can make their case in public while the regulars cannot. That is a fair point, but, of course, the regulars are much closer to the decision-making process and have more senior officers within the Ministry of Defence. An advocacy that is private rather than public may be every bit as influential.

There are two key questions for the House. They are, first, what is to be the role of the TA over the next 15 to 20 years; and, secondly, can that role be filled with the manpower that the Government are examining? The role of the TA is as a general reserve to the Army. It is there to reinforce the Regular Army when that is required with individuals, units or sub-units in the UK or overseas. It also provides the framework and basis for regeneration and reconstitution in times of national emergencies.

The TA performs other roles. In many parts of the country, it is the only link between military and civil in our demilitarised society. It is an important source of recruits for the Army and is an alternative to conscription. It offers opportunities for volunteering to the responsible citizen; it assists other Government objectives and programmes, such as welfare to work; and it offers opportunities of a structured life to young people who might otherwise lack contact with order and discipline.

I shall outline the case that Government must answer. The manpower that the Government apparently propose will mean that the TA will lack the critical mass that it needs to remain a viable organisation. Cuts focused on the infantry will mean that its heart will become starved of oxygen and its limbs will become less efficient. Infantry reductions of about 80 per cent. mean that it will no longer be a truly national organisation. The shrinking will not only have the impacts that I have mentioned but will affect the perceived role of the TA in society, the employer's willingness to release employees for training for a valued purpose, and people's motivation to join.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath): My right hon. Friend is dealing with the important roles of the TA. Does he agree that the TA is vital to the future of the Army cadet force because throughout the country, and certainly in my constituency in the Camberley area, cadets rely on the TA for stores and training and for many other services? To damage the TA is to damage the cadets.

Sir George Young: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. I had intended to speak about that issue, but he has raised it more eloquently than I could.

I shall now deal with the TA's role as general reserve to the Army, and assume that at one end of the scale we plan for a high-intensity conflict for which we field one division. It is legitimate to contemplate such a conflict: we contemplated one in the House only a few weeks ago. If we assume 15 per cent. casualties in four days, on the TA figures that we are debating, the Army would have to call up ex-regulars on day five. The trouble with that is that 50 per cent. of the addresses of ex-regulars are incorrect. In addition, they may not be fit or trained on current equipment, and may not want to serve.

The strategy of cutting the TA and relying on ex-regulars to save money rejects the trained, fit and willing volunteer for the possibly unfit, unwilling and untrained ex-regular—if one can get hold of him. We could be into that scenario quite soon. Sustaining any operation requires depth, and if the reserves are cut, there will not be the depth to sustain an operation. In a lower-intensity conflict with fewer casualties, with inadequate reserves there would be a shortage of manpower after about 90 days. At the other end of the scale, there is the example of the recent floods in the midlands. The Army locally was on block leave and the territorials stepped in and were the only soldiers who were present.

Most regular units deploy with a TA increment on operations or on exercises. Some 10 per cent. of the implementation force, IFOR, and the stabilisation force, SFOR, manpower in Bosnia was found from reservists, of whom about 1,200 were infantry. Without such back filling, the regular infantry would be even more stretched, and that would lead to worse retention and an ever-increasing reduction in regular manpower.

The TA has gained much respect for its role in Bosnia. More broadly, while we have a small regular force, the volunteer reserve forces help to provide the capacity to punch above our weight, and that has enabled Britain to have an effective foreign policy. All that is at risk.

Reducing the TA has other consequences, such as those that were mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins). TA premises are used by others such as cadets, who also use vehicles and equipment with TA infantry instructors. To get a clearer idea of the exact impact, I have today written to the regional chairmen of the Territorial Auxiliary and Volunteer Reserve Association to get their assessment of the consequences of what we are discussing.

The whole of the reserve forces cost about 3 per cent. of the entire defence budget. The TA is astonishing value for money; my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) will expand on that at the end of the debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury made the point in his perceptive piece in today's issue of The Daily Telegraph. As one noble Lord put it, it is like saving money by ceasing to pay for the insurance policy.

The role of reconstitution as well as that of general reserve may be compromised by the strategic defence review. It is fine to say that we shall have time to do that because there will be adequate warning, but history tells us otherwise. It was not until the spring of 1939 that it was decided to double the size of the TA. That decision ensured that many units went to war partly trained and ill-equipped and the price was heavy. My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) may recall how difficult it was in 1971 to train and recruit the new infantry battalions that he formed. It took five or six years to build up the expertise on which a unit relies.

The strategic defence review will take us up to 2015—17 years ahead. We only need to look back 17 years to 1981 to appreciate what we did not foresee at that time—the Falklands, Iraq and Bosnia, to name but three major demands on the armed forces. The record of forecasting military conflict is not good. There is a hint that there will be no need to call out complete units again. I am not sure that I agree with that. In replying to a recent debate and at defence questions today the Minister for the Armed Forces said that the Russians would not land tomorrow. That is correct, but who can predict the shape, location or duration of future conflicts? For expansion, the infrastructure and the framework must be in place, and it is precisely those which we are likely to lose.

We do not know exactly how forces may be required, and that means that we need a general rather than a specialised reserve. That is why cuts of 80 per cent. in the infantry would be so dangerous. Infantry is flexible; it can re-role. One company in Winchester has re-roled from infantrymen to amphibious engineers. The infantry has the key soldiering skills to an extent that specialists have not, and that makes it the heart of a genuine multi-purpose reserve.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I fully endorse my right hon. Friend's excellent case on behalf of the Territorial Army. Does he agree that, if the TA is cut to the extent that many of us think it will be, that will deprive ex-regulars, who have cost a great deal to train, of the opportunity to become TA soldiers and officers, with the tremendous benefit that that can bring to the services and to younger recruits?

Sir George Young: My hon. Friend's point is well made, and I am grateful to him.

I shall now turn to the issue of recruitment. Currently, the Army is about 5,000 below strength and has a turnover of some 15,000 a year. Some 40 per cent. of Regular Army recruits come from the TA and the cadets, and they come disproportionately from the infantry. Cutting the infantry in the TA therefore runs the risk of double jeopardy. Not only does it cut off a promising source of recruitment for undermanned regulars, but it leaves the regulars even more exposed because the reserves are no longer there to support them. The reserves are being squeezed to make headroom for a sixth deployable brigade, but that is the wrong way to do it. The Army's top priority at the moment is recruitment and retention. My contact with the armed forces parliamentary scheme over recent weeks has brought that home to me, but cutting the TA makes that problem worse, not better.

I turn to the argument about footprint—the need to have a physical presence throughout the country that is seen, felt and respected, not least for recruitment. If the number comes down to 40,000, Scotland looks particularly naked, which I am sure would be of concern both to the Secretary of State and the Minister for the Armed Forces. That is because Scotland has a very high infantry profile and is the area where the reductions are likely to be made.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire): My right hon. Friend makes a very good point. Is he aware that, if the infantry and the yeomanry were to be abolished, similarly the whole of Gloucestershire and most of Wiltshire would be entirely empty of the Territorial Army?

Sir George Young: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. When I receive the replies to the letters to which I have referred, we will have a much clearer picture of exactly what the regional distribution of the cut might be.

On the role of the armed forces, I quote Brigadier Richard Holmes, now the Director of Reserve Forces and Cadets in the MOD, on the need for a presence:

"Not in a brassy and intrusive sense, but the daily and repeated demonstration, to the men and women who we defend and from whom we draw our strength, that we are them—and they are us: the nation's mirror, indeed."

In many parts of the country, the only adult military presence at the Remembrance day parade is provided by the TA. Cut the TA and that goes. With no national footprint, the armed forces become more isolated from the communities that they serve.

Many hon. Members want to speak in the debate, so let me conclude by quoting from the same article on the TA, which was written by Brigadier Holmes in 1995:

"But there is an irreducible minimum amount of funding: fall below it, and units are gut-shot . . . In our view we are dangerously close to this irreducible minimum, and we should be well aware that the effects of a small saving could be disproportionately destructive."

That was when the figure was 59,000, with which he expressed delight.

In the previous debate on this subject, the Minister for the Armed Forces told us that no final decision had been taken. I believe him. We hope that there is time to change what is proposed. If not, I guarantee that Conservative Members will want to return to the subject. When we do, the atmosphere may be different, not just here, but outside. I hope that the Secretary of State will now tell the House that that will not be necessary.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): I wish to announce that Madam Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

7.32 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. George Robertson): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

supports the Government in its determination to ensure that the United Kingdom has armed forces that are modern, capable, relevant and structured for the new post Cold War strategic realities; considers that the Territorial Army, like the rest of the armed forces, should continue to adapt to these realities; welcomes the valuable role played by the Territorial Army in the wider life of the nation; and is confident that the outcome of the Strategic Defence Review will be capable, relevant and even more usable reserve forces to help support Britain's foreign and security policies.

The speech by the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young), the Opposition spokesman, and the terms of the Opposition motion strike a commendably less hysterical note than much of the commentary and speculation in recent months about this one aspect of our armed forces, which have been part of a strategic defence review, which was widely welcomed by many people, including many hon. Members on both sides of the House. It is the most unprecedentedly open defence review in the recent past. It is open and consensual, and is designed to establish the widest possible agreement on what our armed forces should do in future and how best they can do it.

On that subject, we have had several good and well-informed debates and I am certain that this will be another. The Territorial Army has a long and honourable tradition in the service of our country. Generations of willing volunteers have served. Soldiers of the TA have fought with great distinction in some of the most desperate struggles that this nation has known.

Even today, individual TA members serve on special engagements with regulars in Northern Ireland and the Falklands, and in Cyprus with our commitment to the United Nations. Some 2,500 volunteers have served with the regulars in Bosnia. I pay tribute to their efforts in that stricken country, where the work of the British Army, regulars and Territorials together, and of our other services has done so much to bring hope where, at one point, there was none.

I look at that military experience, which the motion that has been tabled in the name of the Opposition acknowledges, and I see an inconsistency in the motion and in the argument of the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire. The strategic defence review does not and will not undermine the Territorial Army; it will strengthen it. We do not intend to destroy the TA; we intend to enhance it. The strategic defence review will not downgrade the Territorial Army; it will, as the motion suggests and recommends, develop it and modernise it. We intend to ensure that the TA is relevant, usable, capable, effective, integrated and valued throughout the country. I am confident that, when the strategic defence review is eventually finalised, agreed and published in a White Paper, there will be wide agreement that what we have produced is a plan for modern forces in the modern world.

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South): I am grateful to the Secretary of State for giving way on that point: the strengthening of the TA via the defence review. Is he then saying that, if there is a cut in manpower, there will not necessarily be a cut in the defence budget to the TA and that that money will be recycled within the TA, or is he saying that there will effectively be a reduction both in manpower and finance? I cannot see how he can square what he is saying if no more money is put in or if the money does not stay in, and how is it going to be used to strengthen the TA?

Mr. Robertson: Perhaps if the hon. Gentleman waits and listens to what I have to say and to tell him, he will understand precisely why it is that I say that our whole purpose and design is to ensure that the TA is strengthened and that its role is enhanced. The exercise was not done as some way of salami-slicing one section to fund another section. We have taken, unprecedentedly, as I said, a holistic view of the whole defence budget and of all the military capability that this country has and needs in future.

There are going to be winners as well as losers in any strategic defence review. The point that the right hon. Member for North–West Hampshire has underlined—that the Territorial Army and the reserves are among the only group of people who are capable of lobbying Members of this House and the populace in general—should be borne in mind. Let people come to their conclusions when they see the way in which we have reconfigured the whole picture, not one section of the picture, which has happened to put specific figures speculatively into the public domain.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Robertson: I want to make a little progress before I take all the jumping up and down on the other side. [Interruption.] I make a sensible point. I intend to be constructive because we are interested in the quality of all sections of our armed forces. I am willing to take interventions, as I am sure my hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces will at the end of the debate, so that hon. Members have an opportunity to put their view across.

When we have published the defence review, we will have reserve forces that will be integrated as part of a coherent approach to defence and will be relevant to needs today, tomorrow and long into the future. Numbers are not the only or even the main issue that is at stake here. Indeed, the previous Government made much of that fact in the reductions for which they were responsible in the reserves and in the Territorial Army.

We will also continue the invaluable local links and the wider involvement of the Territorial Army in our society. The Territorial Army draws much of its strength from its local roots and enjoys the support of the communities in which it is based. I know that the concern that has been expressed in this and other debates by hon. Members on both sides of the House reflects the concerns of those communities.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): On that point, may I tell my right hon. Friend of the anxieties of the Royal Welch Fusiliers? The third battalion TA, which I visited today, has anxieties and the communities that it serves support it. We hope for a continued strong presence in north Wales. I visited the battalion today and, as an ex-service man, I would say that it gave a brilliant demonstration. I hope that he might be able to help.

Mr. Robertson: My hon. Friend is a powerful advocate for his constituency and for the regiment based in it. When any review takes place, there is inevitably anxiety across the forces—not just in individual Territorial Army units, but in the Regular Army, the Royal Navy and the Royal Air Force. Frankly, over the past couple of decades, the only experience they have had of reviews is of exercises that have pretended to be strategy-led, but which resulted in huge cuts in capability. I ask my hon. Friend to tell his territorials that we have considered the matter on the basis of the operational capability that this country will need for the future. We will achieve that inside the budget that we have inherited.

I have no doubt that the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire, in the unlikely event that the Conservatives had won the election, would have been faced with many of the same tough decisions that I am having to make now. These are not easy options. The last Government reduced the defence budget by one third in their last seven years. There was no prospect that they would increase the defence budget.

It is true that the Territorial Army offers many in the wider community contact with the armed forces which they might otherwise not experience. Furthermore, the training it provides and the values it instils in the volunteer are of great benefit to society. I have no doubt that many hon. Members will wish to reinforce to me tonight just how important they are.

I acknowledge the importance of the TA's specific role in supporting the cadet movement, which we greatly value—not just for the youth development work which is its primary role, but for its recruiting effort on behalf of the armed forces. As a former Army cadet, I could hardly conclude otherwise. We are looking to see what we can do for the cadets, and we will increase the support that is given to them.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): The right hon. Gentleman has listed a number of benefits that the Territorial Army brings to the community, to youth work and to the public perception of the Army. Is there some mechanism whereby all that added value can be costed into the whole equation of the strategic defence review, or is he merely looking at that side of the balance sheet that assesses the TA's operational role? Significant as that is, there must be some way of measuring other benefits as well.

Mr. Robertson: We have to make exactly the same calculation for the Regular Army, the Royal Navy and the Royal Air Force, and for all the capabilities that this country has at its command. However, at the end of the day, the decision is that the budget of the Ministry of Defence will be in excess of £21 billion—the figure we inherited from the Conservative Government. There was a massive one-third reduction over seven years.

We have to consider all the measurements within the whole. We have to measure the value and the utility of the TA and the other reserves. It is interesting that tonight the Opposition have tabled a motion about the Territorial Army alone. They seem to have no interest in or concern about the RAF and Navy reserves. They all have to be measured in the equation.

All these aspects are important, but, above all, the Territorial Army is there to fulfil an operational role, and it is on the operational role that I want to concentrate tonight.

The Territorial Army has seen change since the end of the cold war. Its strength has fallen from a peak of 78,500 in 1987 to 56,700 today. The establishment of the TA in 1987, under the last Administration, was 91,000, but it was reduced to 59,000—the figure that we inherited. Therefore, if people are to make judgments about what might happen in this defence review, they would be wise to look at the Conservative party's record before doing so.

Sir George Young: The Secretary of State must recognise that there was a dramatically improved security position in Europe, and almost every NATO country was able to reduce its budget by between 20 and 30 per cent. That is not the position now, so there is no justification for such a reduction. The right hon. Gentleman must not continue to assert that the reductions under the Conservative Government were the result of some Treasury-driven craze; it was a logical and balanced response, enabling us to put resources into health and education.

Mr. Robertson: It takes formidable acting skills to tell us now that the cuts that were made under the last Administration were driven solely by the end of the cold war and not by the Treasury exacting a heavy price. The evidence of the Treasury's hand is the incoherence of the cuts that were made. Of course strategic circumstances change; of course there were bound to be reductions in defence expenditure in this country, as in other countries. The main criticism of the previous Government was of the way they left holes in capability that robbed us of the opportunity to put our troops into the right place at the right time.

Further changes are taking place in the strategic landscape, and they will increase over the next 10 to 15 years. It is because we are configuring our armed forces for the new challenges, and because of the huge operational strains, that we have embarked upon the review. Just as we have looked at every capability of each of the three services and the civilian back-up, so, too, should we look at the role of the Territorial Army.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): Does not my right hon. Friend find it rather strange that the right hon. Member for North–West Hampshire (Sir G. Young) should talk about cuts in the way he has when, from 1985 onwards, year on year, the Conservative Government cut the money available to the armed forces? If I catch the Chair's eye, I will illustrate that. The right hon. Gentleman is silly to come up with such an argument.

Mr. Robertson: The defence communities are aware of that. They want a coherent outcome that makes sense in the circumstances. They know that some reductions in capability will be necessitated by the fact that capability shortfalls must be made up if we are to send troops into conflict safely, securely and effectively. The right hon. Member for North–West Hampshire knows that, and the public know it. They will be sensible when they see the outcome.

Mr. Tom King (Bridgwater): The right hon. Gentleman knows that there was a change in strategic circumstances, and that the most significant change under "Options for Change" was the withdrawal from Germany at the end of the cold war, and the consequent number of forces that we brought back. He will also know that the architects of "Options for Change" were Lord Vincent—who was an outstanding Chief of Defence Staff, much respected throughout the Ministry of Defence, and subsequently chairman of the military committee in NATO—and the current permanent secretary at the Ministry, Richard Mottram. I should be very worried if the right hon. Gentleman were accusing them of incoherence. I have the greatest respect for their abilities.

Mr. Robertson: It is a bit much for a former Defence Secretary to blame officials for the outcome. I dare say that Lord Vincent, who has been assisting me in the defence review as a member of my expert panel—I very much value the advice that he has given—and the permanent secretary may well have assembled much of the information, but the responsibility for the outcome has to lie at the door of those responsible for "Options for Change" and for the defence cost studies. Therefore, in this debate, let us not try to blame officials. We should grant them immunity to that.

I realise that the changes and reorganisation have not been easy for territorial and reserve units, which are composed largely of people who work a few hours or a couple of days a week. Such organisations face challenges in adapting to the new circumstances. However, I should like to make two points about the position in which we have been left by the various reorganisations and changes made under the previous Administration.

First, most of the Territorial Army is currently held at low readiness against the possibility of a cold war threat—to defend against an invasion, primarily by the Soviet Union, and spetznaz attacks on vital installations in the United Kingdom. Part of the judgment in determining that readiness level was that, understandably, the Government would resort to compulsory call-out of the Territorial Army only in the most extreme circumstances. However, that begs the question of what to do if the possibility of such circumstances arising becomes so remote that we do not have to maintain any standing forces against them.

After our foreign policy analysis—which we have shared widely, and which is widely shared—that issue has arisen—[Interruption.] If Opposition Members really anticipate a massed attack by components of the former Soviet Union, I should be interested to hear their views.

Secondly, across the entire British Army, we have 73 battalions: 33 TA battalions, the majority of which are geared to fight on British soil; and 40 regular battalions.

Altogether—in one guise or another—61 battalions are light infantry battalions. Therefore, 61 battalions could not be put into the front line of a modern armoured battle. We should also compare that number of battalions with our eight tank regiments, seven air defence regiments, 14 artillery regiments, 19 engineer regiments and 16 field ambulance units.

We need many regular battalions to manage all our current operations. The House, if not the public, will be familiar with the level of commitment currently faced by our regular forces. Although we welcome the support given by individual members of the TA infantry to the regulars in all those operations, in no credible or plausibly foreseeable circumstances will we need at one time 61 light infantry battalions. Most obviously, the level of force that we are committed to fighting at home is out of all proportion to the threat.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): As my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young) said, most of our wars have been unanticipated, and the past two wars—the Gulf war and the Falklands war—were both fought in open terrain, with no civilian populations, where large ground forces were unnecessary. Let us suppose that the Balkans—where 14 Axis divisions proved to be inadequate in the second world war—were to blow up tomorrow, or that we had to invade Iraq. We should remember that the American, Australian and Canadian armies all have greater combat capabilities and more infantry in their reserve forces than they do in their regular forces.

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Gentleman—any hon. Member—can postulate a series of possible future threats and quite easily state the necessary capability to deal with those threats. However, there is a finite defence budget, which the previous Government reduced to £21 billion.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: We have to anticipate anything.

Mr. Robertson: We cannot plan for every eventuality and every surprise. We have to have a portfolio of forces that is able to deal with as much as we can currently possibly anticipate. It is perfectly sensible to take that point of view.

I tell the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier)—who speaks with some authority on the matter, and takes a very strong interest in that one key component of our capabilities—that, since the second world war, we have never compulsorily called out formed units of the Territorial Army. We did not do so in Korea, in Suez, in the Falklands or in the Gulf. We have not called out any of the formed units of our Territorial Army.

Sensibly, calmly and moderately, I make the point to the House that we have to strike a balance between our Regular Army and our Territorial Army, and between the Navy and the Air Force, taking into account the likely eventualities. There is not likely to be a Government, Conservative or Labour, who will expand the defence budget to take into account every conceivable eventuality.

Mr. Hugh Bayley (City of York): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is precisely because of the changed strategic environment that the Government have to develop a changed role for the TA? Unless the TA has a believable and a real role, there is no argument for it. Does he agree also that the role performed by the pre-formed Territorial Army battalion of the Prince of Wales's Own Regiment of Yorkshire—which went as the first pre-formed unit to Bosnia—is the type of role that the Government should be considering in their defence review, to build a real role and to give a real future to the TA?

Mr. Robertson: My hon. Friend speaks eminent common sense. We are examining precisely that type of role. As I progress towards the end of my speech, some of the thinking that has influenced us—on precisely how we will strengthen the TA—should become apparent. We are not interested simply in sidelining the TA—far from it. We shall find a new role in the new circumstances for the TA, making it much stronger and much more valued in society. I believe that we will also make it much more welcome.

Some people say that Territorial Army units are far less expensive than regular ones. Of course they are. However, no military capability is cheap. Each of the battalions costs annually between £2 million and £3 million to maintain. A total of £350 million of the annual defence budget is spent on the Territorial Army, not including the cost of their equipment, which could be valued at about £1 billion. We should remember also that Territorial Army units do not, like their regular colleagues, provide a 365-day, year-round capability.

Defence resources are limited. Moreover, there are glaring gaps in other areas of defence that—as Opposition Members know—we will have to fill.

So much for the financial balance sheet. There is another penalty to pay in maintaining units that we do not need, in roles that we do not need, against a threat that is receding and may never return. Furthermore, the penalty is paid by the units themselves.

The House will be aware of the consultations that the Government launched in parallel with the review, and will know that we have consulted widely with experts—for example, with former Secretaries of State for Defence, and Chiefs of the Defence Staff—within the services, and with members of the public.

The House may not be surprised to hear that the public's understanding of the Territorial Army seems to be very patchy. Whereas some people know a lot about it, others know very little. However, most worrying, I think, is a perception—with which hon. Members also may be familiar—of the Territorial Army as "weekend warriors". Some people say that the TA is not necessary and not serious. Such a view is sad and wrong, but it exists. I intend to change it, because the Territorial Army deserves better.

The House may recall last year's public speculation that we were about to declare the Territorial Army a leisure brigade. I hope that not only that but much other speculation is now dead. However, such speculation demonstrates my point about how the debate on the issue has been conducted.

We will do the Territorial Army no service by leaving large parts of it to languish in declining roles. However, I see an alternative to a declining role, in which the Territorial Army forms a key part of our armed forces. It is a role in which the Territorial Army can say to the public and to their comrades in defence, "You will need us, and we will be there." It is role for which, today, I say to the Territorial Army, "I need you; the Armed Forces of our country need you; and the country needs you."

The territorials—like hon. Members—have to adapt to the new strategic realities. We all know what those strategic realities are. First, we can count on much longer warning times, compared to the cold war, before a major and direct threat to the United Kingdom emerges. Secondly, the pursuit of our foreign policy objectives in this uncertain world calls for the ability to project power for many lesser eventualities. How many can we see immediately on the horizon? Thirdly, therefore, our armed forces must be structured and resourced to meet the unpredictable at short notice, when required.

We need the territorials. We need them to provide formed units that may be integrated into our Army brigades and higher formations for what we might term "power projection" operations. We also need the territorials, and the regular reservists, to provide individuals to reinforce our units for warfighting, because in war we need our units to be larger than they are in peace. Looking to the long term, we need the Territorial Army, our regulars and our regular reserves, to act as a basis from which we might expand our forces should the need arise.

Let me concentrate on power projection. We shall gain much by giving the territorials a greater role in power projection. For example, if we envisage a crisis on NATO's periphery for which we need to put a full division into the field, the presence of thousands of Territorial Army soldiers would greatly increase our capability. But if we are to do this, then we, here, must be prepared to call them out in such circumstances. In the recent past, we have not done so.

When I attended the TAVRA council seminar that was held to get over a strong message about the territorials, one thing that I heard loud and clear was that the territorials wanted to be in a position to be called up. That is one of the points of view that I have taken on board.

Mr. Brazier rose—

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Gentleman will probably have the opportunity to speak. My hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces will wind up the debate, and I should not take too long, despite the interventions I have accepted and the points to which I have responded.

As I was saying, this is an important point, and one that deserves cross-party agreement, which I hope we can get. I do not know whether the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) will agree with me about call-ups, but I hope he will. Let us make no mistake: if we go down this route, the territorials will not be just a nice add-on to a Regular Army which would be self-sufficient, anyway—they will be a vital addition to the Army.

We will need signallers, drivers, artillery men and women, military police, intelligence and survey teams. We will need TA soldiers who can repair battle-damaged vehicles, operate sophisticated military equipment, deal with local civilian populations, and engage in a very wide range of other specialist and core military tasks. Military jargon might label this "support", but it is real soldiering: dirty, dangerous, in the line of fire, and absolutely essential to any conflict in which we might be engaged.

I expect that we will conclude that we need many more medical reserves. As I said at Question Time today, the defence review has shown that there are serious weaknesses in many aspects of our medical forces, which we must address.

We are going to need units to be trained, capable and deployable at the readiness for which we require them. We are looking at how we may best bring territorial and regular training together, so that we can make better use of all the training that defence provides. However, we must recognise—this is perhaps the hardest part—that the need to defend the United Kingdom from a potential Soviet threat has diminished, and in many ways disappeared.

As most of our territorial infantry battalions and, indeed, many of yeomanry regiments are intended to fight at home, hon. Members will understand from what I said earlier that we will find it more difficult to see roles for these units than for others, but re-roling is one of the alternatives available to make these units more usable and much more satisfied.

We must also ensure that, where we do need a capability at very short notice, the unit that provides it is regular. We need to improve and enhance our management of the Territorial Army. I am thinking here of mobilisation procedures which at present are ad hoc, and need to be put on to a more dedicated footing. We also need better career management of individuals within the TA.

In previous debates, many hon. Members have referred to the work of the Territorial, Auxiliary and Volunteer Reserve Associations, as did the right hon. Member for North–West Hampshire. I join all those who have paid tribute to the TAVRAs. Their members give their time freely out of a deep commitment to this country's reserve forces. I have met senior members of the TAVRAs a couple of times in the course of the defence review.

The role of the TAVRAs—it is one that works—has much to offer the Defence Council which they exist to advise. The TAVRAs have stood the test of time in a way that few other tri-service institutions can boast, as their last reorganisation was in 1968. While we are considering some administrative changes to them, we see the attractions in retaining all the essentials of this relationship. We want to continue both their role as advisers to the Defence Council and their function in administering a range of day-to-day functions on behalf of the reserve forces.

The strategic defence review has given us the opportunity to modernise and restructure our regular and our reserve forces in a coherent—

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) rose—

Mr. Robertson: I am sorry, but time is against me, and many other hon. Members wish to contribute to the debate.

The review has given us the opportunity to modernise and restructure our regular and reserve forces in a coherent and enduring way. It has confirmed the need for many current roles and some new ones, but also the need for some changes to existing roles.

The new Territorial Army will be capable and usable, and fitted to work with regular forces on all types of operations to a much greater extent than before. It will be sufficient to meet any likely operational eventuality. Details of the new structure are now being put together against a set of principles that have been agreed in consultation with senior Territorial Army officers.

The traditions of the Territorial Army are proud, and its members are committed. It must be possible, with that pride and commitment, with the right training, the right structure and the right direction, to fashion a new future for the Territorial Army, a future in which the TA will again be a key instrument for our security policy, and a credit to the nation.

8.6 pm

Sir Edward Heath (Old Bexley and Sidcup): I strongly support the positive approach adopted by my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young). I hope that it will be adhered to for the rest of the debate, which I hope will not descend into the noisy wrangle that has unfortunately now become characteristic of the House of Commons.

My maiden speech was on European union for political, economic and military reasons. That was on 26 June 1950. My second speech was made on 18 April 1951 and it was on the Territorial Army. I had to get special permission to make that speech because, in the meantime, I had become a Whip and was not allowed to express myself without the permission of the Chief Whip. I made that speech because of my connection with the TA, which I declare to the House now.

The Honourable Artillery Company was formed in 1537 and is the oldest of all such institutions. It was formed by Henry VIII. At the end of the war, I commanded a regiment of it, and in 1947 I commanded the newly formed 2nd Regiment of the HAC for four years. I then commanded the guard at the Tower of London as master gunner. I therefore have many connections with the TA. I have been a member of the HAC for 53 years, and it is of immense importance to me and many others.

We have become accustomed to discussing the TA in rather difficult situations. We did so in the early 1950s while the Labour Government were still in office, and we did so in the 1960s when the numbers started falling rapidly. The Government of 1970–1974 managed to restore them to a certain extent, but not enough. They declined again under another Labour Government. So in our debate tonight, we are continuing a rather repetitive performance, but one that can be very healthy, as the Secretary of State said.

I was glad to hear the Secretary of State say that there is a strategic review. He went on to mention foreign policy. Of course, the two are closely interbound, and I am glad that he emphasised that, because a review is desperately needed in both respects. It must take account of our political position as a member of the European Union and of our economic possibilities as far as our defence forces are concerned. Both must be taken together.

I am afraid that, all too often, declarations from political leaders give the impression that we can deal with any problem throughout the world and, in fact, we have a mission to do so. Today, nothing could be further from the truth. We are just not capable of doing so. I have heard such declarations made by former Prime Ministers and by the present Prime Minister, who gives the impression that the world is at his feet and he will organise it. I hope that that is not really his view, and if it is, I hope that the Secretary of State for Defence will correct him, because that can lead to serious mistakes. When the review is finished, we shall examine very carefully how it is proposed that we should handle world affairs in future and where we believe that we can play a part.

The military is important in all that. We are emphasising tonight, as my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) did in an earlier debate, and as we have done before, the importance of the Territorial Army, as well as the other territorial arrangements that the Secretary of State has rightly emphasised. The Territorial Army is not, for obvious reasons, as important as the Navy and the Air Force, but that has always been accepted.

We come to the question how the strategic significance of the Territorial Army has to be assessed. It has long been widely recognised that one can review such matters, but one of the difficulties is that the representation—to use a grandiose word—and influence of the Territorial Army at the highest levels are very small. There is no point in trying to deny that, and every senior officer whom I have met and had counsel with, from the highest levels downwards, has always, when pushed to the point, accepted that. There is no conspiracy, as some people are saying. It is natural that if one has no direct relationship with the Territorial Army and one wants to find a solution, one seeks it without taking particular notice of the TA.

The Secretary of State has tonight given us many assurances, and I hope that he will be able to maintain them. I shall come to one of those assurances in a moment. As the TA has very little influence in any Ministry of Defence organisation, it is easy to see why unwelcome incidents occur.

My right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire put forward the strong argument that maintaining the Territorial Army is far less costly than maintaining the Regular Army or other forms of military activity.

The idea of weekend holiday boys was mentioned. Those are the jeers of members of the press, which were wryly reported this weekend, and of people who have no sympathy whatever with any form of military activity, regular or territorial. We ignore that, but I agree that a large operation is required to inform the public of exactly what being a territorial involves. I was glad to hear the Secretary of State say that he is determined to bring that about. I shall not inquire at this point how he proposes to do it, because he may not have made up his mind, but it will be quite a task to bring home to the public the part that the territorials play and how important they are.

That is an issue that we were dealing with when I was commanding the HAC two nights a week plus weekends and a fortnight in camp. That is quite a demand on an ordinary chap, and the return that he gets to cover expenses is not all that great. He makes a big contribution.

I come now to the important point—the general suggestion that the strategic review will examine the territorial on the basis of how he fills the gaps. That is emphasised by recent operations in which territorials were sent to Bosnia and elsewhere. They do not do so as a separate entity; they go where there is a need that regular forces have not been able to fulfil. That is what worries all the territorials I know. They do not want to be simply a stop-gap operation; they want always to be a separate entity and to operate as such, and then they will meet the requirements of the strategy, providing that it is worked out on that basis. That is why the strategic review will be of great importance.

If those at the top of the Ministry of Defence say, "We have a gap here, so we must encourage a particular body to fill it," that will not meet the needs of the Territorial Army, because it is far greater than a series of gap-fillers or specialists who may be needed. To exist at all, it must be a complete social organisation that depends on its internal relationships to produce the answer that it wants and that those outside want. It must be complete in that sense, and if it is not, it will not continue, but will gradually fragment and break down.

I hope that when the Secretary of State considers his strategic review and what is proposed, he will always bear it in mind that territorials must be entities and have their own future. He can stand up against the demands that it should always be the Territorial Army that suffers and say that the regulars could also be reduced to meet our present requirements.

As I have tried to emphasise, those requirements are important in a proper assessment. We are no longer the world power that we once were. There is no point in pretending otherwise. We are no longer able to tell people exactly what to do. Even the Americans have discovered that today they cannot govern every trade deal in the world as they want to. It was a big blow when America became the major power rather than one of two super-powers, and it still has not accustomed or acclimatised itself to its role in the world.

We must allow for that, and we must not allow ourselves to be moved to one side. We must work out our own policies as part of the European Union and with other, limited responsibilities in other parts of the world. Unless we now face up to all that, we shall simply have another period of wrangling, arguing and doing no good, particularly when we are overstretching our capabilities.

I wish the Secretary of State well in his strategic review and the decisions that he must make. From what he has said, we can rely on proper respect for the Territorial Army and its future. I also hope that he will ensure that it retains its entities and does not become simply a filler of gaps that exist for other reasons. If he does so, he will indeed be praised.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): It is a privilege to follow the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath), especially as he has such a positive approach to the problem that we are discussing. Like him, I hope that we can all contribute positively to what the Government are proposing.

I must confess that I approached this debate with a measure of hostility. As an ex-member of the Royal Welch Fusiliers, and having served in the Monmouthshire Regiment of the Territorial Army, I am very much on the TA's side—like many who have been associated with it. We know the value of it and its contribution not just in our communities but in a military sense. Now that I have listened to the Secretary of State, however, my hostility is washing away, particularly because of his positive approach and the way in which, as he described, he is considering the problem of trying to define a new role for the Territorial Army for the next millennium.

I had the privilege—perhaps—of being an Opposition Front-Bench spokesman on these matters while the right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King), who is no longer present, and some of his predecessors were chopping our military potential. That was not after the cold war had ended; it was between 1985 and 1989. The Russian problem—the cold war—still existed, yet huge cuts were made in the armed forces. More than that, we had very long-term commitments in other areas.

Therefore, it is no good the Opposition attacking the Government from a holier-than-thou stance. If we consider "Options for Change" and what the Conservative party did in power, Conservative Members look rather ridiculous when they criticise the Government in such a debate. The irreducible minimum, which the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young) attributed to Brigadier Holmes, was brought about by the Conservative Government. If there is an irreducible minimum, it is because of the previous Administration.

The Secretary of State has given me a great deal of hope by describing how he is trying to fit our forces into a role that relates to the strategic review. Time and again, in opposition, we asked the Government to do that, but all we had were substantial Treasury-driven cuts, year in, year out. Those cuts had nothing to do with the changing role of the armed forces or a strategic review, for which we continually asked. Let no one on the Opposition Benches attack the Government for not approaching the matter positively. The phrase that was trotted out was that the Government were creating a leaner and meaner machine, yet such a process produced an irreducible minimum, which left our military capability in an extreme state.

Mr. Gray: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Rogers: Others want to speak, so I shall not give way.

I hope that the Secretary of State will think about some of the points that are being made. To an ex-infantryman, the idea that the infantry will play a lesser role, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State seemed to be saying, is rather sad. I have always thought—at least I was always taught—that infantrymen were needed, after all the gunners, engineers and everyone else, to fill up space. I therefore wonder quite what the strategic role will be and why we need forces at all if sufficient infantrymen are not to play a proper role.

The most prominent example concerning the argument about the role of the reserves, how soon they can be put into action and whether they are capable, was in 1914. I am not quite old enough to remember that far back, but I have read how the British expeditionary force was wiped out. The massive input of reserves from the Territorial Army and the county yeomanry was the only reason why we managed to hold our position in France. That is a classic example of why a full civilian reserve Army is necessary.

The Secretary of State described medical skills in the Territorial Army and how they can be developed as a back-up, in making the point that civilians enter the Territorial Army with a high degree of skill that they have acquired in their civilian lives. Engineers, those with skills in new technology and the various technical regiments have been trained by industry, without the public purse being charged, and transfer their skills to the armed forces.

There is a general level of fitness, especially among infantrymen and special combat forces, and the level of ability among the TA's infantry men is very high. I have seen them in action; they can make an enormous and very positive contribution. It is not as if Dad's Army is to be called up in a crisis.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Rogers: I cannot resist giving way to the hon. Lady.

Mrs. Gorman: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that one of the enormous contributions that the Territorial Army makes is in education? Many young people who join as cadets and become full members enhance their qualifications, and therefore fit in well with the Government's drive for education, education, education.

Mr. Rogers: If the hon. Lady had been present for the Secretary of State's speech, she would have heard him make that very point. We all recognise the enormous contribution that the Army cadet force makes, using the facilities of local territorial buildings. We cannot underplay the value of such units in the community. One of the great strengths of an army—or a defence force, call it what we will—is that it is often locally based. Comradeship in the infantry is developed because regiments are county-based, and those in them have often been to school or worked together before joining the armed forces.

I am pleased with what the Secretary of State has said. We seem to have moved away from just Treasury-driven cuts and are adopting an holistic approach, to make our forces not just leaner and meaner but more effective, in a clearly redefined role. Opposition Members would do well in this debate to sit down and shut up, because their record in this area is pretty bad.

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South): I should like to pick up one of the points made by the hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers), which was also picked up by my right hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) when he asked a question about the link between the Territorial Army and the community. Sadly, the Secretary of State did not describe that future role. I should think that the majority of hon. Members would agree that there is a very strong link between TA units and the local community, and I am sure that every one of us would want it to continue. I hope that the Minister for the Armed Forces will react to that point and develop it when he replies to the debate.

We are fortunate to have the opportunity to debate the Territorial Army. I congratulate the Conservative Opposition on tabling the motion. How disappointing it is that we are debating it without knowing what the defence review is about. We were promised that, by now, the outcome of the review would be available for the nation to discuss. Had it been possible to keep to the timetable, we could have been debating the outcome of the review.

In responding to the motion, I am afraid, the Secretary of State did not go far enough for some of us to be able to support him in the Lobby. Despite many fine words, there was a lack of clarity in his response. Like the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath), I wish the Secretary of State luck. Most of us know that the defence review is in the hands of the Treasury. Indeed, one could question whether the TA is safe in its hands. One could seriously suggest that it is not. We have strong reservations.

It would have been good if the Secretary of State had been able to say that the Conservative motion was nonsense, and that the suggested 40,000 reduction would not happen in any shape or form. However, one would need to support the Government powerfully to believe that what he said would not lead to that outcome. He did not refute it, and the Liberal Democrats will support the Conservative motion, although with a heavy, not a glad, heart. We had hoped against hope—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) can smile, but some of us were optimistic that the Secretary of State's opening speech would give us some enthusiasm for the idea that the Territorial Army would be safe in the Government's hands.

Many of us—if not the whole nation—recognise the work and value of the TA. The Secretary of State was kind enough to say that it still links with regular services in Northern Ireland, Cyprus, the Falklands and Bosnia. However, despite its fine record of achievement, the force's future remains murky at best. What the Government have in mind for the TA is not clear.

The Conservatives stand convicted of making judgments of which they might now think better, because they presided over a substantial reduction in the TA between 1988 and when they left office. In 1988, its membership was 74,700; by 1997, it was down to less than 56,000. There were 41 battalions and 164 companies in 1988; there are now 33 and 95 respectively. The Conservatives cannot stand one pace removed from the blame that they are trying to attach to the Government.

TA centres play a vital role in communities, but their numbers have fallen by nearly 100 since 1988. We must all accept, as the Secretary of State and the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young) have pointed out, that there is a changing climate. We Liberals are no different; we recognise the changing climate, the peace dividend and the fact that the TA and other reserve forces cannot stand back from the realities of life.

That said, the TA does much more than support the community and the regular forces, when required. Hon. Members who have spoken—and, I am sure, those who will speak—have paid tribute to the commitment of TA service personnel, both men and women, who are serving in Bosnia. Hundreds, if not thousands, have done valiant work there. The TA's role is changing, and it has allowed itself to change from within. It has adapted, and it continues to do so.

I stress the importance of the TA in education and training, and the opportunities to return to full-time employment that it has offered to countless people whom

[Mr. Mike Hancock]

I represent, who have gained successful employment because of TA training initiatives. I spoke recently to a group of truck drivers at the ferry port in Portsmouth, and found that six out of 30 of them had gained heavy goods vehicle licences through the TA. They all admitted that they would not otherwise have been in employment, because no one—certainly not the Conservative Government, who did not put money into giving those men an opportunity—would have funded such a programme. They are now back in work, and remain committed to the TA. It was interesting to hear their thoughts on the future.

The hon. Member for Rhondda was right to talk about the skills that the TA brings to the regular Army. Officers and non-commissioned officers in the TA willingly share their skills with others, and that helps to produce many ready recruits for the regular Army; 10 per cent. of Army recruits join because of the opportunities offered by the TA and the cadet forces, and bring with them techniques that they learned in the TA.

It would be a travesty of all that the Secretary of State has said if the review seriously undermined the Army cadet force.

Mr. George Robertson: The hon. Gentleman may not have been listening, but I said that we would give increased resources to the Army cadet force.

Mr. Hancock: I am grateful for that clarification. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that I was listening, but I had hoped to hear a commitment that spelled out what that meant. What does giving more resources to the Army cadet forces really mean? Many such forces survive only because they are located close to TA units.

Mr. Brazier: And to infantry units.

Mr. Hancock: Yes, and to infantry units.

The TA has an ability to change. For example, the unit at Winchester has transformed itself, not because of any clear directive from the Ministry of Defence, but because it made a determined effort to address a changing world. The TA has not stood still, and flatly refuses to do so. It wants the Government to give a continuing commitment to ensuring its future in the defence of the country.

The TA is not only about skills and education, passing on skills or community links. It is about the jobs that are provided in the civilian world. My right hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) tells me that 30 civilians were employed by the TA in his area, and he is seriously concerned about the future of the unit and those jobs. A leading Scottish newspaper, Dundee's The Courier and Advertiser, last month claimed that the TA was bringing millions of pounds to the Scottish economy by creating jobs for part-time and regular officers—men and women—and scores of civilian jobs. That is not peculiar to Scotland; it is the same in most constituencies in which the TA is located.

The Government have made great play over the past few months with the claim that the defence review is not financially driven. If that is so, they would be wise to think of the TA as a financial success story. It has cost us £340.4 million in the past year, which is 1.6 per cent. of the entire 1997-98 budget. For comparative purposes, let me say that the average TA member cost the Government about £6,100; that is cheaper than the reserve forces for the Royal Navy, the Royal Marines and the Royal Auxiliary Air Force, but I share the view that they are equally important. As I represent a Portsmouth constituency, I strongly advocate strengthening our commitment to the Royal Marines and the Royal Navy.

Having taken those costs into account, how can the Government possibly object to the continued spending of 1.6 per cent. of the defence budget, when they are willing to accept—if not gladly—the £3 billion cost of over-expenditures contained in the National Audit Office's latest report on 25 major projects?

Ms Rachel Squire (Dunfermline, West): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Government have inherited the £3 billion costs mentioned in the NAO report because of the mismanagement and incompetence of the previous Government?

Mr. Hancock: I could accept that if, at the end of the report, the Government had said what they were going to do about it. I remember a similar report this time last year, when the Government also said that they had inherited problems. The inheritance argument can be used for only so long. There comes a time—

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. John Spellar): It refers to 1997.

Mr. Hancock: Of course it refers to schemes for 1997, but I thought that the Government came to power on 1 April 1997.

Mr. George Robertson: The hon. Gentleman makes a valid point about waste in the Department, but the report that he is waving covers the period before we came to power. In the strategic defence review, I promise that there will be radical proposals to the sort of problems highlighted in that report and to those that have been created over the years. I hope that it will be successful and that he will be able to congratulate us, but I also hope that he will not blame us for everything that went on before.

Mr. Hancock: I would not dream of blaming you for what went on before.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. I trust that the hon. Gentleman is not blaming the Chair for all those problems.

Mr. Hancock: Some hon. Members can claim no involvement, whether for or against, what went on. I was not here during the period concerned. If I had been, perhaps I might have had more to say at the time. Of course I am not blaming the Secretary of State or the Government for the problems that they inherited. I am saying that there is a more worthy response than the one that we have had to those problems rather than simply shirking and passing the blame, which is not good for anyone.

As every right hon. and hon. Member has said, the Territorial Army is a great asset to the nation and a real bargain, yet the Government fail to realise that. Buying an overpriced missile seems to be more impressive to them—some people will always prefer the Ferrari to the Ford.

The TA is truly a people's Army. It really embraces the community and men and women from all walks of life. It gives great opportunity and is worthy of support. If we are unable to give that commitment to those men and women, how on earth can the Secretary of State suggest, as he did tonight, that he will go further with them and that we will get more out of them? How does he hope to do so if the Government cannot give the assurance that they need? They offer diversity of skills and combat support enhancement and they seek a guaranteed and continuous role.

Anything short of that from us here tonight will be seen as a slap in the face for men and women who give up their time week in and week out, many of whom are prepared to put their lives on the line in Bosnia and Northern Ireland, for example, for the sake of this country's defence. Those people are worthy of more than a slap in the face. They are worthy of continuous support and of a bright and clear future.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I call the next hon. Member to speak, I remind the House that this is a relatively short debate and that many Members want to contribute, so it would be helpful if speeches were limited.

8.41 pm

Mr. Huw Edwards (Monmouth): I acknowledge the contributions made by right hon. and hon. Members to the debate. As a relatively new Member, it is a particular privilege to follow the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath), who has a distinct expertise in this matter. The debate has certainly shown that there is much expertise in the House on the subject. I confess that I do not have a military background, but simply represent an area with a fine military tradition. I wish to speak to that tradition and about the role of the Royal Monmouthshire Royal Engineers.

This should be part of a national debate and not merely an Opposition day debate, because there is considerable misunderstanding and a lack of appreciation of the role of the Territorial Army and other reserve forces. The TA has played a long and distinguished role in our armed services and will play a distinguished role in the future. I shall illustrate that by referring to the regiment in my constituency. Monmouth is the regimental headquarters of the Royal Monmouthshire Royal Engineers (Militia)—the senior regiment in the Reserve Army.

Mr. Gray: I have heard the hon. Gentleman say before that the Royal Monmouthshire Royal Engineers is the senior regiment in the Territorial Army. He is incorrect, as the Honourable Artillery Company is the oldest regiment and takes right of line, and my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) and I have both been members of it.

Mr. Edwards: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, but I have sought clarification. The Honourable Artillery Company is the oldest regiment and the Royal Monmouthshire Royal Engineers is the senior. I have that on the authority of the recently retired commanding officer, with whom I clarified the matter a few weeks ago.

The regiment can trace its history back to 1539. It is the oldest unit in the entire British Army after the Honourable Artillery Company. Last Saturday, I attended the beating of the retreat ceremony and I have attended other regimental events, notably the dining out ceremony of the previous commanding officer, Lieutenant Colonel Paul Lodge, to whom I pay particular tribute for his work to bring the regiment closer to the community in Monmouth and for work undertaken in a number of areas.

The Royal Monmouthshire Royal Engineers is one of the nine Territorial Army engineer regiments, providing general support and multi-capability support for the Regular Army. Squadrons of the regiment are based in a wide area from south Wales to the west midlands, including 100 Field Squadron at Cwmbran and Cardiff and 108 Field Squadron at Swansea. As part of the Royal Engineers, the regiment provides a wide range of skills and trades, including bridge building and the construction and repair of airfields, roads and railways, plus the skills that individual members bring from their civilian life.

I must highlight some of the achievements of the regiment at home and abroad in recent years. In Bosnia, the Royal Monmouthshire Royal Engineers was the first TA regiment to work for a full six-month secondment in support of the Regular Army when a troop of two officers and 20 other ranks under Captain Louise Clarke supported 21 Engineer Regiment in such tasks as mine clearance, snow clearance and road building. I pay a particular tribute to Captain Clarke, who is an example of the way in which many women officers have played a higher role in the Territorial Army than in the Regular Army. More recently, Captain Nevill Simpson has returned from the multinational liaison headquarters in Bosnia.

Bosnia has provided an example par excellence of the role of the TA in supporting the Regular Army which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State acknowledged and paid tribute to earlier. The regiment has also provided troops to support the Regular Army on exercise recently in Wainwright in Canada.

Of course, the Territorial Army plays an important civilian role under the military aid to civil communities programme. For example, the Royal Monmouthshire Royal Engineers has been involved in the construction of an adventure playground, in river diversion, bridge building, forestry work and woodland tracks. Those have included a track in Llanybydder in west Wales for people with disabilities, bridges over tributaries in the Wye valley and work on the construction of the new monkey house at Dudley zoo—activities that will be maintained and enhanced given the commitment—[Laughter.] I can assure Conservative Members who are laughing that I have been well briefed. I refer those who doubt what I say to the excellent report produced by the Territorial Army Volunteer Reserve for Welsh Members at a briefing that I sponsored here.

When necessary, the Territorial Army is on call for disaster relief. It could have assisted during the recent floods in my constituency had it been requested to do so by the local authorities. I was sorry to hear that, because of the financial constraints imposed by the previous Government in the early 1990s, local authorities and other public bodies are charged heavily for the use of the Territorial Army and are therefore reluctant to request the use of equipment and personnel that are readily available.

The TA also makes a valid contribution to the local community in my constituency, often without adequate recognition. In the past two years, the regimental headquarters has been the setting for productions of [Mr. Edwards]

"Macbeth", and of "Henry V", who was born at the castle in Monmouth. The Gwent young people's theatre put on those productions in conjunction with the regiment, and I encourage hon. Members to visit Monmouth in July to see this year's production of "The Royal Hunt of the Sun" at the castle. Finally, the Royal Monmouthshire Royal Engineers contributes so much to maintaining the dignity of the annual remembrance service in Monmouth.

About 70 per cent. of the Army medical service is provided by the Territorial Army. In Wales, we have 203 Field Hospital Royal Army Medical Corps (Volunteers), although I regret that, in recent years, that corps has been severely reduced from a general to a field hospital. There is natural concern that "Options for Change" imposed excessive cuts on the Royal Army Medical Corps—I know that the Government want to deal with that.

The Army cadet force helps young people to develop leadership skills and discipline, training them primarily to become good citizens. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has acknowledged its role and committed additional resources to it. Recently, I met a group of Army cadets at the opening of the new Gilwern detachment in my constituency—I look forward to visiting the cadet forces' camp in Leek, Staffordshire, in July.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): I concur with my hon. Friend's point about the inextricable link between the TA and the Army cadet force. I am sure that he will agree with the chief constable of Gloucestershire, Mr. Tony Butler, who wrote to me on the importance of that link and of our recognising the social value of the cadet force.

Mr. Edwards: I certainly agree. In my constituency, the social services have forged links with the Army cadet force, as they have appreciated the role that it can play, especially in areas of social deprivation and with children and young people who are on the edge of juvenile delinquency.

This is clearly a crucial time in the strategic defence review, and there has been considerable speculation about the future of the Territorial Army and other reserve forces. I have no doubt that the TA provides a role in supporting the Regular Army and in contributing to the civilian duties that are not adequately appreciated by the public—we, as Members of Parliament, have a responsibility to inform and enlighten our constituents and our political parties about those important roles.

The Royal Engineers has nine TA regiments. I convey the concern that I have heard that, because of successful lobbying by the infantry territorial regiments, the Regular Army is required substantially to reduce the reserve engineers—from nine regiments to perhaps three. Like those with whom I have recently discussed the matter, I believe that that would be disastrous. The engineering regiments have combat and military skills that can have immense benefits in the aftermath of conflicts, as was demonstrated in Bosnia.

The Government have said that there must be a substantial reserve force, which is properly resourced to meet the new roles and requirements identified in the strategic defence review. The reserve forces must be relevant, usable and integrated—they must be capable of being speedily deployed at times of international and national crisis. I sincerely hope that the engineering regiments, most notably the Royal Monmouthshire Royal Engineers, have demonstrated that they meet those requirements. I commend the Government's commitment to enhance, rather than to destroy, the Territorial Army.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): This debate goes to the heart of what the armed forces are for. I am proud to follow the excellent opening speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young) and the contribution of my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath), the Father of the House.

On several occasions, Ministers have suggested that the TA is the only part of the armed forces that can speak for itself. As the son of a Regular Army officer, I find it particularly hard to make two harsh comments about the conduct of a small group of regular staff officers—neither of which, I believe, were what Ministers wanted. First, a decision was taken to make no comparative appraisal of the relative cost-effectiveness of regular and territorial combat units such as have been carried out in other countries. From the outset, it was decided to avoid any appraisals—the downgrading of the role of the Territorials from combat was never intellectually challenged.

Secondly—and more unedifying—we had the spectacle of a regular major-general openly boasting about leaking to the press proposals to decimate the Territorial Army. He must have known that that would hit TA morale and that the TA has no general officers to defend it. The TA had to turn to Members of Parliament—it had no one else. Many parts of the TA, including the infantry, had better recruitment records than their regular counterparts but, needless to say, TA recruitment has plummeted in recent months because of that dreadful publicity.

On the big picture, the armed forces have very important peacetime duties. As we know, they are overstretched because of Ulster and Bosnia—Ministers were right to take full account of that in the strategic defence review. However, grave as those duties are, the most important function of the armed forces is to participate in major conflicts, which, sadly, we almost never foresee. The first world war was unforeseen a few weeks before it happened; the Gulf war was unforeseen a few days before it happened.

The two most recent conflicts—in the Falklands and in the Gulf—were both fought over open, unpopulated terrain. Not since the Indonesian confrontation have we needed a large number of soldiers on the ground—of course, the Regular Army was much larger then. However, we may need substantial forces again, especially if the Balkans catch fire or if it proves necessary for the west to invade Iraq on the ground, which no Minister of the Crown should rule out.

As third-world countries steadily acquire weapons of mass destruction, the prospects of our suffering heavy casualties in defending our vital interests from some totally unanticipated threat are increasing, not declining. This is no time to bank on optimistic projections. Recent events in India and Indonesia are further reminders of the dangerous instability of the world in which we live.

Reserves are critical for two reasons. First, as is widely accepted, they provide military understanding in the wider civilian community—I know that the Minister is very conscious of that. Given the demise of the Royal Naval Reserve and the Royal Auxiliary Air Force, which are now very small, that frail link is largely provided by the TA. Secondly, and even more importantly, the high cost of modern manpower means that we can afford only a small Regular Army in peacetime. Today, there are only two regular divisions; we should remember that 14 Axis divisions proved totally inadequate to pacify the Balkans in the second world war.

The combat arms are by far the most important element of the reserves. I do not underrate the importance of logistic and supporting units—many of them, particularly the medical units, play an important role in bolstering inadequate regular functions. The fact remains, however, that those regular units at least have civilian counterparts—from the national health service, BT and so on—who can, in principle, be put into uniform, whereas there is no civilian equivalent to combat units.

In America, comparisons were made between regular and National Guard combat units. When the excellent performance of the National Guard artillery in the Gulf war was examined, it was decided that more than 70 per cent. of American artillery should in future be held in the reserve forces. In a recent trial in the Nevada desert, a National Guard tank unit completely outmanoeuvred and thrashed a regular tank unit. The Americans have identified how to get more bangs for the buck.

In Australia, a largely reserve brigade is being stood up for deployment at 90 days for overseas power projection, which the British Government also want. At a fraction of the cost of their regular counterparts, reserve combat forces are regarded in Australia as highly cost-effective. Why, I repeat, was no appraisal carried out of reserve brigades in this country? From the beginning, it was argued by an almost entirely regular staff—most of whom had no experience of the TA—that the TA should be pushed out of combat into logistic roles.

Each country's circumstances are, of course, different. None the less, we are not alone in the fact that regular defence staff want to plunder the reserves to favour regular forces, under the guise of allegedly objective advice to Ministers. Many regular officers, serving and retired, disagree with the advice of that small group of staff officers.

In America, Congress unearthed the details, which had been concealed by the Pentagon, of the exhaustive trials that had taken place in 1992, showing that the performance of the National Guard armoured infantry battalions was very close to that of their regular counterparts. American Ministers recently overruled their chiefs of staff to enhance two National Guard divisions for short notice power projection abroad.

It would be very sad if MOD Ministers were to accept their advisers' line that proud British reserve units should be seen as gap-fillers to the Regular Army. Territorials are pleased to serve in Bosnia, but that is not why they enlist. They join—as speaker after speaker in another place remarked—to serve with their friends as members of their local units, generously preparing to serve Britain in the next major conflict.

The Minister for the Armed Forces knows that I have the highest respect for him. When I was a rebellious Government Back Bencher, he and I joined forces more than once. I ask him and the Secretary of State to ask themselves, and to press their regular staff officers and ask, why does an up-to-date role for reservists in America and Australia mean combat brigades of reserve troops, while in Britain it means driving trucks for the regular Army?

Mr. Hilton Dawson (Lancaster and Wyre): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for the brief opportunity to take part in what has been a restrained and serious debate on a serious subject. We have had much discussion across the Floor of the House about the Territorial Army's role. A person from Lancaster does not need to hear many lectures on the Territorial Army's importance to the well-being of the United Kingdom. People in Lancaster were angered and demoralised by a previous Government who made regular cuts but failed to review roles, and who stretched vital defence responsibilities more tightly over decreasing resources.

In Lancaster, we are very proud of the Territorial Army. Lancaster is the home of the fourth battalion of the King's Own Royal Border Regiment. We are steeped in history. We have had a volunteer force in Lancaster since Napoleonic times. In the two world wars this century, three Victoria Crosses, six Military Medals and two Distinguished Conduct Medals were awarded to Territorial Force/Territorial Army soldiers of the King's Own.

However—despite the excellence of the King's Own Royal Regiment museum—we do not live in the past. I won the most recent general election in Lancaster openly and explicitly on a platform that emphasised the need for a strategic defence review to provide for effective defence, led by foreign policy to react speedily to events, to co-operate with allied forces and with the United Nations.

Despite all the worries about the future of the Territorial Army, I really hope—indeed, I think—that the TA has nothing to fear from the challenges of modernisation, from the demands of new tasks and from the requirements to take on new skills and to respond quickly and flexibly as a vital part of a coherent, properly resourced defence force.

The fourth battalion of the King's Own Royal Border Regiment does not live in the past. It is a substantial force of some 422 soldiers, who occupy a new, purpose-designed headquarters, which was also a very effective base for the local Army cadet force. In recent years, the number of women serving in the TA in Lancaster has doubled. A few weeks ago, on 27 April, 23 men of the fourth battalion returned from an invaluable six months' service in Bosnia. Ten of those soldiers will be staying on in the Regular Army.

The party that made defence cuts year on year—however Conservative Members might portray it—does not do much service to the bravery and integrity of the Territorial Army when—

Mr. Blunt: What will the hon. Gentleman do if the fourth battalion of the King's Own Royal Border Regiment pays the price for the Government's unwillingness to increase the defence budget to accommodate a TA of 55,000?

Mr. Dawson: It is slightly absurd that such an issue is raised by an official Opposition who made cuts year on year when in government.

[Mr. Dawson]

It is essential that in the debate we consider the national interest, strategic defence policy and effective defence policy. I believe that the fine women and men of the Territorial Army will meet the challenges of the future, welcome newly defined roles and responsibilities and serve this country well as a substantial reserve force. We need to ensure that they have an effective future, and I very much hope that Lancaster has a very effective future as a base for a modern Territorial Army. Ultimately, however, the national interest, the strategic interest and the defence interest of the United Kingdom will lead the way, and it is essential that we have a modern, well resourced reserve force to meet the UK's interests.

9.5 pm

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): In the 1970s and 1980s, while many of the Labour Members and their supporters were attending Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament rallies, hundreds of thousands of men and women—among whom I was proud to include myself, having served in the TA for 18 years—were supporting the regular forces and supporting a commitment from a Conservative Government and a commitment through NATO which, in due course, led to the disintegration of the Warsaw pact and the collapse of the Berlin wall. What the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson) calls defence cuts were in fact a substantial peace dividend, accumulating because we had shown the determination to ensure that the Warsaw pact would disintegrate and collapse. Significantly, many of those countries now wish to join NATO, and NATO exercises frequently take place in erstwhile Warsaw pact countries.

This is a short debate, and I simply wish to make two or three points. First, for a long time the Regular Army has required the support of the TA in many specific roles. I have the privilege of being honorary colonel of my unit. When all the men and women in my unit are on parade, they manage to muster between them every campaign medal from Aden to the present day, because they have no equivalent in the Regular Army. They are the laundry squadron—not an especially glamorous unit, but the only unit to provide laundry for field hospitals and to provide support for men and women training in them. There are several such units.

I say to the Minister for the Armed Forces, the members of that squadron and all members of the TA fear that the current defence review is Treasury-driven, and they are worried that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) said, the Regular Army will protect its Budget and its back, and has pushed the cuts down to the Territorial Army. Not only will there be cuts in the infantry units, but the specialist units will be rendered inoperable because they will not have enough training days. If we call upon people to carry out specialist tasks, they require sufficient training days for the purpose. Without an allowance of enough training days, commanding officers may be tempted to keep on their books men and women who are less than effective so as to use their training days for others who are effective and efficient.

The Secretary of State talks of re-energising the Territorial Army. I hope that the Minister will ensure that units are given a decent number of training days. It is impossible to provide the regular Army with specialist support on a shoestring.

Those of us who have been involved with the armed forces must continually repeat that we cannot see into the future. Almost every conflict in which we have been involved has been unforeseeable. If the Regular Army is to have the right support, it will require fully trained men and women—and much of that training will apply to TA general units. It is not possible to train up men and women with good signalling or other military and disciplinary skills in a matter of days—they take time to acquire.

Of course I understand the temptation to say that the threat has disappeared so the needs of the Army have changed. We all recognise that they have—but who would have envisaged UK troops staying in Bosnia for as long as they have? We are, after all, a permanent member of the Security Council, and there is always the temptation, or the need, to punch above our weight in the world and to send troops to parts of it where we never imagined they might be needed.

Only recently, we debated in the House whether to send troops to Albania. Had we done so, among their number would have been many members of the Territorial Army. If the Government chip away at the backbone of the TA to such an extent that it can no longer provide generalist units to serve overseas in support of regular units, they will undermine the effectiveness not just of the TA, but of the Regular Army, too.

Ms Squire: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Baldry: I was about to conclude, and many other Members are waiting to speak.

When considering the defence review the Government will appreciate, I hope, that this is not just a matter—those of us who have been Ministers understand the financial pressures—of taking a budget and wondering how to shoehorn the TA into what the Treasury has allowed. The Territorial Army is a priceless asset, and we destroy it at our peril. It is based on a culture of tradition and discipline, passed on from generation to generation, from sergeant major to gunner. Once destroyed, that culture can never be rebuilt. By reducing the TA, the Government will damage the whole of our armed forces. I hope very much that they will think again.

Ms Rachel Squire (Dunfermline, West): I agree with the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) that the Territorial Army and our reserve forces are a priceless asset. I would certainly not support the Government's strategic defence review and examination of the future role of those reserve forces if they thought otherwise. It is, however, rather bizarre to hear Conservative Members arguing that the TA should not just be kept at its present size but enlarged, on the ground that we cannot foresee future conflicts. After all, it was the Conservative Government who cut our regular forces by as much as one third, arguing that they were no longer required in the same numbers because of the end of the cold war. There seems to be a contradiction there.

I should like to make my points in the spirit of those of the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath), who said that we should debate the issue in an atmosphere of mutual recognition of our commitment to, and admiration for, the TA and the reserve forces. I would welcome more time for such debates. I support the comments about their key role in the community and their educational role.

Although I have had limited contact with the Territorial Army in its Dunfermline and West Fife area, I have listened with keen interest to the contributions of other hon. Members, and I have been closely involved with the reserve forces of the Navy and the Air Force. I should declare an interest with respect to the Maritime Volunteer Reserve Service, which was formed as a result of the previous Government ending the Royal Naval Auxiliary Reserve. I am well aware of the negative emotions that that produced.

Our reserve forces are invaluable and should be given an enhanced role in the future defence of the country. We live in an unpredictable world, and we must recognise the changed nature of conflict. I was interested to read an article in the RUSI Journal—the Journal of the Royal United Services Institute for Defence Studies—by Brigadier Richard Holmes, the director of reserve forces and cadets. He states:

"In place of quantifiable threats we have more elusive risks. In place of a war of necessity, we have the prospect of wars of choice, where the decision to intervene—and, no less important, at what level and for what duration to intervene—is seldom likely to be simple."

That encapsulates the changed nature of the defence and security environment, the importance of the strategic defence review and the need to consider the future role of both regular and reserve forces.

Our reserve forces must not be allowed to feel that their role is being downgraded or, as was said by the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup and others, that they are being used to fill the gaps in the role that should be played by our regular forces.

There are three aspects worthy of our consideration, and I support the approach to them taken by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence and my hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces. The first is the increased need for rapid reaction. We require a substantial, highly trained and well-equipped force that can respond quickly. The training of our regular and reserve forces is crucial for them to fulfil that role.

The second aspect is recruitment. I have been delighted by the success of the Army recruitment centre in my constituency in attracting more young people into the armed forces, in line with our new deal initiative, and in providing the initial gateway training that transforms those people's lives and ensures that they can meet the standard. The reserve forces must work in tandem with the regular forces, but we need to be clear about the balance between quality and quantity.

The third aspect concerns the regular forces' need for greater logistical and technical support. The reserves could play a role in that area. We must build up the defence medical services, which I think all hon. Members will agree were reduced drastically beyond the level necessary to provide vital back-up in the field of conflict.

I am well aware that other hon. Members wish to participate in the debate. I support the Government in their review because I think that it will enhance the role and the reputation of our reserve forces. We have an opportunity to show the Territorial Army that we recognise its value and that we are determined that it shall continue to make a vital contribution to the defence of this country. To do that, we must include the Territorial Army in the strategic defence review, and we must work with the Territorial Army to strengthen, develop and modernise its role.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk): Virtually every hon. Member who has spoken tonight has said that the Territorial Army is very important in terms of the operational effectiveness of our armed forces, the role that the Territorial Army plays in linking with civil society and its general social support role. That is not the area of disagreement. The Government's amendment argues that the Territorial Army must be seen as "relevant and even more usable reserve forces to help support Britain's foreign and security policies."

If we are to examine the Territorial Army, we must return to those basic issues. I am sorry that I must reiterate the point, but we still do not know what the foreign policy baseline is. The Government have failed to provide that information. Until we know what the baseline is, we have no idea what our security policy is.

I agree with the Secretary of State and other hon. Members who said that the Territorial Army must not be preserved in aspic: it must change and be made relevant. We do not disagree about that. The problem is that the Opposition believe the Territorial Army will be squeezed to fund other areas of the armed forces because of the constraints on the defence budget. The strategic defence review has still not been published—and I do not think it will be published until July. There is no more money available.

Unlike my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier), I do not necessarily blame those staff officers in the Regular Army who, upon being faced with having to provide extra combat support for the Regular Army under the general framework of the strategic defence review and upon being told that there is no more money, have logically looked to the Territorial Army to find those cuts. I suspect that the Secretary of State's speech has cast great gloom over many men and women who serve in our infantry and armoured corps Territorial Army units. They realise that there must be changes and reductions, but they believe that they will occur because the defence review is ultimately Treasury-driven.

Several hon. Members have stressed that if the combat capability of the Territorial Army infantry and armoured corps falls below a certain critical mass, it will not be able to cope with the sorts of unexpected emergencies that have arisen all too often in the past. My former colleague and old friend Brigadier Richard Holmes, the director of reserve forces and cadets, has been quoted several times tonight—and who am I not to do the same? In his Royal United Services Institute lecture on 21 January 1998, he said:

"If there is a need to retain a reserve without commitment as to future employment, one could do worse than hold back some infantry battalions."

I fear that the strategic defence review may be one cut too many for the TA. I fear that it will consist of individuals and specialist units who will provide a great deal of support for our Regular Army, but will not be able to reconstitute our armed forces in response to a major national emergency. That could be the result of a cut too many for the TA.

[Mr. Keith Simpson]

I declare an interest in that I am an honorary colonel of the Royal Military Police TA, which comprises 1,100 men and women. Many have served in Bosnia, Northern Ireland and elsewhere. I am conscious while wearing that hat, and as a constituency Member, of the role carried out by the TA centres, many of which are threatened with being cut. If these centres are cut, along with the cadets, the Ministry of Defence will be cutting off its nose to spite its face.

In Norfolk alone, about 50 regular soldiers every year come from the TA and the cadets. I urge all right hon. and hon. Members to support the Opposition's constructive motion. I fear that the cuts proposed for the TA are based not on modernising it and preparing it for new operational roles but on providing the necessary money to fund the Regular Army for its new commitments following the strategic defence review.

Ms Dari Taylor (Stockton, South): Much of the debate centres on the competence of the Territorial Army and reservists generally and on their relevance as a modern-day fighting force. It is often said—sometimes, I am sad to say, in the House and often among the public—that the volunteers represent a fighting force of the past. It is said that they are more to do with keeping retired soldiers busy than with providing an active soldier force. I find that offensive, although I am not a reservist and I am not a member of the TA. However, I have seen them at work and I acknowledge their commitment. I find it offensive when people make casual and cutting comments about the abilities of members of the TA and reservists generally.

There is a clear belief that modern warfare is not warfare for reservists. It is felt that we need rapid reactionary forces and that the reservists do not form part of that concept. I see no evidence of that. It is felt also that the reservists are not part of high-tech surveillance. The fact is that many people move from the outside world of high-tech to give the Army information and techniques that it does not have. Accordingly, there is no evidence that reservists are not part of high-tech surveillance.

There is a belief that the infantry is a highly trained team-based war machine of which reservists cannot be part. I see no evidence of that. Surely Bosnia especially told us that there is no evidence of that.

Many of our experts talk about the future of warfare, and somewhere we seem to be falling between the potential for guerrilla war on the one hand and high-tech surveillance on the other. There is the notion that perhaps we are moving towards casualty-less war. Surely recent evidence tells us that that is not the case. Bosnia, especially, tells us that.

I have seen the British Army at work in Bosnia. It was made up of regulars and reservists. There was no differentiation. No one knew who was what. Everyone was working together as a team, and an extremely effective one. There was an incredible volunteer organisation. I am speaking of people who gave their time and commitment. They gave Bosnians—both Serbs and Muslims—a belief that they had a future. I saw our reservists in a war-torn, frightening country. Houses and gardens were ribboned off because they were mined. Blocks of flats were no more than shells, and hospitals, schools and homes were rubble.

To see our reservists working there gave me a sense of pride. One cannot pretend about that sense of pride; one looks at them and knows that they represent the best of Great Britain in the Army. They were committed, concerned and determined, and there was no differentiation between reservists and regulars. I would hate to believe that we will start to make that differentiation.

My honourable colleague, the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier), is right: the Ministry of Defence has many people—experts, generals and others with a history in the armed forces—who blind it to the quality of the reserve forces in Great Britain and to the fact that those people give so much more than simply the time in which we see them perform. Their quality is their professionalism in so many different spheres.

I should have loved the opportunity to speak for longer, but I am being told to wind up. I should like to have said how valuable the reservists are in my community. In the north of England, more than 4,000 youngsters are involved, and it is all down to the TA. I should hate to see them denied a sense of pride in their regiments and squadrons. They work within the community, they raise funds and they have fun, which is everything that we want youngsters to do. The reserve forces must be sustained and built on. They have a good future.

The Secretary of State made a clear statement that the TA has a future. It is now up to us to keep reminding him that we want a commitment in terms of the reservists' value and tremendous future. I am sure that he will say that they can face new challenges and are up to those new challenges. I am sure that we shall see an expanded reserve force, not a contracted one.

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Ms Taylor), because her central thesis was right. If she discovered in Bosnia that members of the Territorial Army were giving excellent service and were every bit as good as the Regular Army in their support roles of driving HGVs and providing a service in the Royal Logistic Corps and the Royal Engineers, she is absolutely right to conclude that members of the Territorial Army infantry units can give the same valuable service to the Regular Army infantry battalions if they are trained to do the job.

The Ministry of Defence used to consider the TA battalions to be an invaluable part of the infantry fighting forces. I was proud to serve in the 51st Highland Volunteers. I could probably take the Minister back to a particular part of Germany and show him the piece of ground that my platoon was allocated in the late 1970s and early 1980s. I could show him the trench that had been planned for me, as platoon commander—not 50 miles behind the line or back in the KP, but on the front line—as part of a battalion committed to 1st BR Corps. We were committed on the expectation that, if the enemy forces came across, we would be wiped out within the first 12 hours, along with all the regulars.

If we could train for a combat infantry role then, surely we can now train for a combat infantry role in the new, changed circumstances. The Secretary of State seemed to say that, as so many of our TA battalions now play a home defence role, and there is no real home defence role for them to play, they must either be scrapped or we must boost the support role of TA battalions and have more HGV drivers and Royal Logistic Corps people.

A few years ago—before the Berlin wall fell and we had the peace dividend—the bulk of our territorial infantry was committed to Germany and front-line forces. The Minister is a reasonable man. I gave him a standing ovation when he performed admirably at the annual dinner of the London Scottish a couple of years ago. I shall remind him what he said there.

We used to have that combat role, and we can have it again. We cannot have a viable TA made up only of support troops, although Welsh Members, who argued for their engineering battalions, should look at the history of the Royal Engineers, especially those engineers from Wales who were caught up at Rorke's drift. They thought that they were engineers first, but they were soldiers first and engineers second. Every person serving in the Army should be a solider first and a specialist second.

There is scope to maintain the current level of TA infantry. I should not regard it as strengthening and enhancing the role of the TA if the number of infantry were cut and the number of HGV drivers increased. I know the reserve forces and I apologise, through the Minister, to the general in charge of recruiting: I have not sent back my yellow form yet, because I could not find the right boxes to tick when asked for my specialist skills. I am tempted to take up my HGV course, because then I would have a relevant skill that the TA might need. It should not be that way. There is still a need for infantry soldiers, and I look forward to the Minister honouring the commitments that he made at that wonderful London Jocks dinner.

9.35 pm

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): It was always intended that the debate would be constructive, and so it has proved. The Secretary of State gave little away in his opening speech, except some rather disturbing pointers of which we shall hear more anon. He said that the strategic defence review would strengthen the TA and used the words "relevant", "usable", "capable", "effective" and "better integrated". We all, of course, agree with that. He also said, however, that numbers were not the only or even the main issue. We could probably agree with that proposition, but we do not know enough about it to know what it means.

The Secretary of State mentioned cuts to the TA under the previous Administration. He realised that there were bound to be cuts in the defence budget—that is true—but the Labour party in those days wanted even bigger cuts to the post-cold-war defence budget. That seems conveniently to have been forgotten, as history has been rewritten.

It was a pleasure to listen to my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath), the Father of the House, who is my constituent when he is not in his constituency. He has a feel for the history of our nation and our communities and for the TA. We have always acknowledged his deep knowledge, which, fortunately, has not been shared by successive generations: because of the sacrifice made by his generation, they have not had to engage in warfare on the same scale as his generation did. We acknowledge his wise words, and I agree with him that the TA should be a complete social organisation, not a bunch of gap-fillers.

As ever, I listened with pleasure to the hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers): his was a loyal speech from an old soldier. The hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) made a good speech, in which he said that the White Paper should by now have been published. Of course it should; it should have been published when it was promised—months ago. He also accurately said that the strategic defence review is in the hands of the Treasury; of course it is, even though we are told that the consultation is still going on. He was also right to draw attention to the Army cadets. We shall welcome his support in the Lobby.

The hon. Members for Monmouth (Mr. Edwards), for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson) and for Dunfermline, West (Ms Squire) made sincere speeches, but my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) made an exceptional speech, as one would expect from an hon. Member who has been unstinting in his support for the TA and is recognised for the depth of his knowledge on the subject. His speech was cogent, succinct and pithy.

My hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry), who is honorary colonel of a TA regiment, was right to say that we cannot foresee the future and must remember the lessons of the past. He gave us an understanding of and an insight into the history and traditions of military activity, which are a feature in families with members of the TA, often generation after generation.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) made the crucial point that the foreign policy baselines remain secret. I shall return to that. He also said that the Territorial Army must not be frozen in aspic. None of us wishes to see that.

Ministers seemed to say that they do not listen carefully to their advisers. I know that a senior regular infantry officer offered advice and said, "I believe that there is logic in discussing the increased use of TA infantry in innovative ways." We have not heard much of that in the debate. The hon. Member for Stockton, South (Ms Taylor) graced the debate with wise words, and we look forward to hearing from her again soon on the subject.

It has been widely reported that last week, when the Foreign Secretary was in the eye of the storm over Sierra Leone, Defence Ministers were boasting that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office had 10 times as many parliamentary questions to answer about the affair as the Ministry of Defence. Rather than boasting, they should have asked themselves, "What is the cause of that?" One reason for fewer questions to Defence Ministers is that hon. Members know that it is not worth asking questions, because Ministers will not give answers. Apparently, they have few friends in the Cabinet. They are embarrassed, and they have much to be embarrassed about.

The big promise of a six-month defence review has been so seriously broken that Defence Ministers have a credibility problem. They should be embarrassed every time they repeat their mantra that the strategic defence review is the most open policy-making process and the widest consultation exercise that has ever been held by the Ministry of Defence. It is no such thing. They know that people rumbled them a long time ago. The strategic defence review was an extraordinary consultation exercise. One cannot consult unless one starts with some givens. We have not been given any foreign policy guidelines. A couple of speeches skating round the Foreign Secretary's pantomime on ice are about as credible as a Foreign Office Minister's policy on Sierra Leone.

We were not given any guidelines on the amount in the kitty for defence. The review has spawned a small industry among academics and journalists, who have been delighted to oblige with a period of free thinking and a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to get their dreams and prejudices off their chests and on to the desks of Ministry of Defence officials and, with luck, on to the desks and perhaps into the red boxes of a Defence Minister or two. The strategic defence review that matters is the one that is carried out within the Ministry of Defence itself, and that has been entirely different.

As usual, all three services responded magnificently to the challenge and completed their input on schedule. As usual, the internal strategic defence review that was completed by the military and the Ministry of Defence has been clinical and merciless. Unlike the rest of us, they knew the baselines and the arithmetic. They considered every option that they were asked to consider. They were told, "Rule out any increase in the TA budget or in TA strength, but consider all other options from a baseline of about 20,000 and float upwards to an irreducible minimum, viable figure of about 40,000." The professionals have had their say, and now it is a political issue for Ministers to handle.

The Government's proposals for the TA are being subjected to scrutiny by hon. Members who face the reality of ministerial dreams. In recent weeks, an increasingly bad-tempered Minister for the Armed Forces has criticised the TA for unfairly arguing for its existence. That is unfair, because the process was started by Ministers. This afternoon, the Minister for the Armed Forces described this debate as a cheap publicity stunt. It is far from that.

The Minister for the Armed Forces (Dr. John Reid): I did not say that.

Mr. Key: The Minister will see it in Hansard in the morning.

Dr. Reid: I did not refer to this debate as a cheap publicity stunt. I shall stand corrected if I did. [Interruption.] I shall check it in Hansard, and if the hon. Gentleman is wrong, I take it that he will apologise.

Mr. Key: Of course. Similarly, I hope that, if the Minister is wrong, he will apologise to the House. He will find that I was absolutely right.

Much has been said about the importance of the territorials' footprint. Dots on a map of the UK representing military presence are getting fewer every year. Largely because of the Northern Ireland situation, there are fewer uniforms on our streets. That is likely to be the case for many years, however much we all hope that the Northern Ireland settlement will hold after Friday's referendum. When I was a child in Salisbury in the 1950s, it was very much a garrison town. Military uniforms were the norm, not the exception. These days, service men and women are more likely to go to work in civvies and, if they wear uniforms, they will be under a mac. Less than 2 per cent. of the adult male population has any direct contact with the military.

I note the total absence tonight of the Scottish National party, yet again. As usual in defence debates, it is absent.

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Key: Oh. One has turned up. I certainly will not give way. The hon. Gentleman has the gall to turn up at the last minute and to expect me to give way when he has not been here.

Mr. Welsh rose—

Mr. Key: Well, as I am such a nice chap, I give way.

Mr. Welsh: I have not just arrived; I have been listening to the hon. Gentleman's speech. He got it wrong with me. I hope that he has not similarly got it wrong with the Minister for the Armed Forces. He should get his facts correct.

Mr. Key: Is that the sum total of the hon. Gentleman's contribution on behalf of the Scottish National party? He has been watching the television set in his room, instead of participating in the debate.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House paid tribute to the role of cadets. The cadet force is a vital and vibrant part of our community. I was in the cadet force a very long time ago. I rose to the dizzy heights of company sergeant major in the Combined Cadet Force. For many people, it was, of course, drudgery, but for most of us it was a challenge that we enjoyed.

Almost 40 per cent. of young men in my year at school went into the services. Many of them have had distinguished military careers. Commanders of nuclear submarines and the commander of the Desert Rats in the Gulf war, Paddy Cordingley, were among my friends who joined the CCF with me. Fifty-six per cent. of warrant officers and regimental sergeant majors started as cadets.

Often, cadets eke out their existence under the shadow of a TA unit. They use its buildings and equipment. They learn skills from TA professionals. We must be sure that those cadets continue.

There are many ways in which one could define viability for the TA. I must mention the whole question of a proper promotion structure within the TA. If the TA shrinks, so do promotion opportunities. We should also not forget that the regulars and the TA have a long history of rivalry. That rivalry is, I am sure, reducing: I think that we have seen in Bosnia that the old rivalries are no longer treated in the way they were. The rivalries were not always a happy thing to see.

When the Conservative Government reduced overall force levels, it was a clear and logical response to the end of the cold war. The figures were replicated throughout NATO, and the Ministry of Defence operated in its usual clinical and merciless style. The territorials were reduced as much as anyone else. They understood that. For the past three years, their position has stabilised, and we have solid, sensible and successful TA units.

The Secretary of State asked whether we would agree with him tonight. The whole point is that there is not enough yet to agree with. The strongest message that we have received from him is that the combat role of the TA as formed units is over. If that is true, it is against much of the advice that he has received from his Regular Army professionals. No wonder the Labour party will not be voting for our motion.

I urge my right hon. and hon. Friends to illustrate their support for the future of the Territorial Army and to express their confidence in that priceless national asset by voting for our motion. Let us give the Government the opportunity to think afresh about the future of the Territorial Army.

The Minister for the Armed Forces (Dr. John Reid): I think that we all expected a lively and well-informed debate, and, by and large, we have not been disappointed. I certainly have not been disappointed with the public intimation from the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) that, as he is not receiving satisfactory answers, he will no longer table parliamentary questions. That was the best news that I heard tonight.

Like many hon. Members here, I have a Territorial Army and a cadets movement in my constituency, and I want to preserve, to fortify and to enhance the TA. I want to give it a future that is not just a monument to the past, but where it has a clear, recognisable, usable and relevant role. Indeed, it is more so than in the past.

I want first to refer to the speech of the Father of the House, the right hon.—indeed, tonight I would say right hon. and gallant—Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath). He was originally a gunner, was a major by 1945 and, between 1947 and 1951, he was commander of 2nd Regiment of the Honourable Artillery Company. He speaks with seriousness, gravity and import in these affairs. I understand that he was mentioned in dispatches, so he has practical as well as theoretical knowledge.

The right hon. Gentleman said two things that were important. First, he said that we must be careful when viewing the world from our present position, because we cannot do everything. I wholly accept that. Indeed, one of the problems for those who ask why we spend money employing the forces is that it is not so much a question of what the armed forces do, as of explaining to a public, keen to see us play a role in the world, that the armed forces cannot do everything. There is a constant demand upon them. However, because we cannot do everything does not mean that we should not do what we can to discharge our responsibilities in the world, both as a citizen of the world in defending our rights and discharging our responsibilities, and as a member of the permanent five of the Security Council.

The point that the right hon. Gentleman made about the Territorial Army is that we do not want it to be a stopgap; we do not want it to be used merely to fill the gaps in the Regular Army. That accords with what the Government believe. If Opposition Members would stop for a minute and listen to what we are proposing, they would understand that we are proposing a radical enhancement of the Territorial Army.

The reality is that, over the past 50 years since the right hon. Gentleman served in the armed forces, the TA has been used in a voluntary capacity, either as individuals or as larger units, to fill gaps in the regular forces. We have been told tonight about the unpredictability of the world. Many hon. Members asked who could have foreseen the Falklands, the Gulf, Malaysia or Cyprus. What they did not point out was that no Territorial Army units were called up in the Falklands, the Gulf, Malaysia or Cyprus. In other words, for many years we have not been able to call up the Territorial Army, whatever the circumstances, unless it were for a major full-scale war with Russia. Does anyone genuinely believe that we are about to face a major full-scale war with Russia?

Mr. Keith Simpson: The legislation was changed.

Dr. Reid: The legislation was indeed changed, but thus far no Government have stated their intention to make the Territorial Army so usable, so relevant and so enhanced in its role in the British defence forces that the threshold would be lowered and the Territorial Army called up. That is our radical proposal for bringing the Territorial Army into the mainstream of our defence forces and enhancing its role in a way that has not been done in the past half century.

Mr. Rogers: I am sorry to be unhelpful to my hon. Friend—[HON. MEMBERS: "As ever."] No, not as ever. Surely the point of the Territorial Army and its relationship with the regular forces is that, when our regular forces have to be deployed abroad, the role of the territorials is upgraded and they act as our home forces.

Dr. Reid: I take my hon. Friend's point. The essential point that I am making tonight is that, in a strategic defence review, not only do we want to derive from our foreign policy a configuration that is relevant, but we want the units within that defence posture to be relevant. It so happens that our proposals on the Territorial Army are relevant.

I stand second to no one in my respect for the Territorial Army, and would never have called today's debate "a cheap publicity stunt". I told the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) that, in 10 months, all we have had from the Opposition is three debates on the TA, because they think that cheap popularity is to be gained in having such debates. Will the hon. Gentleman now apologise, as he promised?

Mr. Key: Yes, of course—I unreservedly apologise. However, I hope that the Minister will get the message that, if he uses such words unwisely, it will do neither the TA nor his own position any credit.

Dr. Reid: Nothing is more demeaning than a grudging apology when someone is proved wrong.

I should like to deal with some of the points that have been made in this debate. As for cheap popularity, I realise that an argument can be made for taking the low road. An argument can be made for saying: "Fifteen thousand, 10,000 or 5,000 people will possibly be without a job. Regardless of the strategic merits, that is their Achilles heel, and we will run the popularity con." However, if we do not have the courage to configure our defence forces to meet today's threat and security needs—and to find the money to supply the defence medical services, the second line of logistics and heavy lift—we shall be putting our soldiers lives at risk, which is something that the Government are not prepared to do.

Mr. Blunt: The real problem is that the Government are proposing to cut 16,000 people from the Territorial Army. In subsequent years, the problem will be magnified as the number of people in the United Kingdom without military experience increases. That is the strategic problem.

Dr. Reid: The hon. Gentleman was the special adviser to a Secretary of State who cut 35,000 regulars from the British Army. [Interruption.] Today, he has the audacity to come here—

Mr. Blunt: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Minister has misled the House. Will you advise me on how he can put the matter right?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. No hon. Gentleman would mislead the House.

Dr. Reid: I will not ask for another grudging withdrawal or apology. However, it seems that the Opposition, not me, are becoming irritable.

At great length, the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) told us that he does not know: what the outcome of the review will be; the configuration that we are suggesting; or the roles that, he complained, we are imagining. He was also not aware of the enhancements that we might want to make, and did not have a clue—because we did not outline it—about the footprint. He said that, on the basis of all that knowledge, he will steadfastly vote against our proposals at the end of this debate. His argument was not an entirely convincing one on which to build a case.

Mr. Brazier: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Reid: I have only three minutes left, and the hon. Gentleman has had his opportunity to speak.

We have made it plain that we want to enhance the role of the Territorial Army. We want to make it more relevant, more usable, more modern and more integrated.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): And smaller.

Dr. Reid: We want to raise the Territorial Army's profile and importance—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) will not shout like that in the Chamber.

Dr. Reid: We shall ensure that those adjectives describe the modern Territorial Army. We shall make it more relevant by reducing its outdated home defence role and focusing on a role comprising skilled trades. We shall make it more usable by lowering the call-out threshold, and by ensuring that, for the first time in half a century, we can call the Territorial Army into action when we need it. We shall make it more integrated by making it one combined force of regulars and territorials, rather than separating them. We shall make the TA relevant, usable, integrated and modern. The entire purpose of the strategic defence review has been to produce modern forces for a modern world.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Reid: The Opposition are seething because, year after year, the Treasury led them by the nose. Cuts were proclaimed in advance. The previous Government cut personnel by 32 per cent. and finance by 30 per cent., and they reduced the Territorial Army by 31,000 members, but they still ended up with a force configuration that did not meet the security needs of the day. This Government will not take that road. Our Army, Air Force and Navy, regular and reserves, will be combined in an integrated framework that is coherent beyond any of their expectations.

Mr. James Arbuthnot (North-East Hampshire) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question, That the Question be now put, put and agreed to.

Wright, Dr Tony (Cannock)
Wyatt, Derek

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Kevin Hughes and
Mr. Jim Dowd.

Question accordingly negatived.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 31 (Questions on amendments) and agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House supports the Government in its determination to ensure that the United Kingdom has armed forces that are modern, capable, relevant and structured for the new post Cold War strategic realities; considers that the Territorial Army, like the rest of the armed forces, should continue to adapt to these realities; welcomes the valuable role played by the Territorial Army in the wider life of the nation; and is confident that the outcome of the Strategic Defence Review will be capable, relevant and even more usable reserve forces to help support Britain's foreign and security policies.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): With permission, I shall put together the motions relating to delegated legislation.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

– BANKS AND BANKING

That the draft Cash Ratio Deposits (Value Bands and Ratios) Order 1998, which was laid before this House on 27th April, be approved.

That the draft Bank of England (Information Powers) Order 1998, which was laid before this House on 27th April, be approved.— [Mr. Clelland.]

Question agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Thursday 21st May, Standing Order No. 16 (Proceedings under an Act or on European Community documents) shall not apply to the Motion in the name of the Prime Minister relating to the Common Agricultural Policy and the Speaker shall put the Questions necessary to dispose of proceedings on that Motion not later than 3 hours after their commencement.— [Mr. Clelland.]

PETITION

National Health Service (East Kent)

10.14 pm

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): I wish to present a petition, bearing 54,000 signatures, on behalf of people in east Kent who are against the proposed rundown of the Kent and Canterbury hospital. As it is so voluminous, I have brought just a small part of it into the Chamber. I understand that a further 140,000 signatures have been delivered to the offices of East Kent health authority.

The petition states:

The petition of the people of East Kent declares that the proposed substantial reduction of NHS services in East Kent conflicts with Government policy.

The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urges the Secretary of State for Health to:

(i) reject the proposed downgrading of Kent and Canterbury Hospital and the relocation of specialist services outside of East Kent, and

(ii) support general practitioners and consultants wanting to retain acute services in Thanet, Canterbury and Ashford.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

Nursery Education

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Clelland.]

10.15 pm

Sir Michael Spicer (West Worcestershire): This is a problem largely of the Government's own making. It threatens the very existence of nursery education in this country, and it is causing growing consternation and alarm in Worcestershire.

The voucher system was far from perfect, but its introduction was a firm step in the right direction towards parental choice, and it provided an opportunity for radical improvement in the education of very young children. The scheme's abolition for politically motivated and doctrinaire reasons has been disastrous. Local education authorities have taken full control of both provision and regulation of nursery education, and have used their new powers to devastating effect.

In Worcestershire, they have virtually obliterated nursery education for four-year-olds, and much the same can be said of the rest of the country. If the effect were an improvement in the early life of young children, that would be the end of the matter, but the plain fact is that it has been a massively retrograde step.

First, and probably least important, there is a budgetary question. Each year, £1,100 is made available for each child under five. By working 52 weeks a year, and employing nursery-trained teachers, rather than mainstream teachers, nursery schools are able to accommodate that subsidy in their budgets, but the same is not true of mainstream schools. Assuming a teacher-pupil ratio of 15:1—which is twice as high as the permissible ratio in nursery schools—the funding will not cover a teacher, let alone a teacher and an assistant.

Extra funds must therefore be provided by deflecting moneys from the budget allocated for teaching over-fives. Head teachers, especially in counties such as Worcestershire, argue that budgets are already overstretched. Money, however, is not the main issue. Much more important, most of the children whom local authorities are forcing out of nursery schools and into mainstream schools at the age of four are receiving a much lower standard of education.

The schools are not subject to the Children Act 1989, and therefore have no statutory limit on pupil-teacher ratios. Nurseries are compelled to maintain a ratio of 8:1, but schools can apply whatever ratio they think fit. Typically, that results in ratios of between 15 and 20:1. What is more, teachers in schools, although they are much more expensive than nursery teachers, are often not much better qualified to teach really young children. Certainly that is true of the often totally unqualified assistants who work with them.

What is more, as a recent Channel 4 programme vividly illustrated, the structure and environment of the school is often totally inappropriate to tiny children. A body of evidence is even emerging, especially from Scandinavia and Switzerland, that the semi-formality of the teaching of four-year-olds in schools is a severe impediment to their further development.

One does not have to accept entirely the pre-eminence of the theory of learning through play to have a feeling for the force of the argument that children in large establishments can be educationally force-fed prematurely, to their permanent damage. There is a special requirement with the very young to treat the needs of each child individually, which is so much easier in small nursery groups.

The whole problem is compounded by the fact that the regulation of nursery and early education is controlled by local education authorities which, because of present demographic factors resulting in falling rolls, are struggling to attract more children to their schools and thus help their argument for further funding by the taxpayer.

Put bluntly, since this Government took over the schools, the LEAs have been forcing parents to send their four-year-olds to schools. Frankly, it is a scandal. Under the voucher scheme, it has to be said that parents were increasingly persuaded to send their four-year-olds to schools for fear of losing a place for them later, but at least under that scheme they had a choice. Now, they do not have any choice at all. The idea that, in those circumstances, there can be a genuine partnership between nursery schools and LEAs, as the Government seem to pretend, is at best disingenuous and at worst a deception.

In their recently published consultation paper on the regulation of nursery education, the Government are showing some signs of awareness of the problem and the anomalies, which is at least a start. The question is, what is to be done? It seems to me—this is the purpose of raising the matter tonight—that, first, a uniform system of regulation for all nursery education is needed, whether it is provided through the schools, nurseries or play schemes.

It is illogical, to say the least, for the conditions of the Children Act 1989, for instance with respect to teacher ratios, to be applied to nursery schools and not to nursery education within mainstream schools. Also, it is wrong that mainstream schools should be exempt from having to employ properly trained nursery teachers. It is also unacceptable that there should be unspecified cross-subsidisation of nursery teaching within schools from budgets allocated for the teaching of children over five years old.

It is essential that common standards should be regulated independently. At present, social services act as the LEA's agent in most authorities in much of the regulatory process. That role should be handed over in its entirety to an independent regulatory organisation, such as the Office for Standards in Education.

Above all else, what is required is that the Government should throw away their electoral rhetoric and political dogma, and recognise that, if parental choice, which is the only real alternative to control by the LEA, is to be reintroduced, some form of voucher system will have to re-emerge. If that forces the Government to swallow too much pride, perhaps vouchers will have to be given some other name. The Government have not been slow in other areas to rebrand Conservative policies.

The future of little children is what matters. Conservative Members must acknowledge that the voucher scheme had its flaws. Because of loopholes in the Children Act 1989, LEAs could, using often unfair and inaccurate prospectuses, seduce parents to send their four-year-old children to mainstream schools. Parental choice must be reinstated, and nursery schools put on a par with mainstream schools. The Act must be amended so that mainstream schools are compelled to comply with the same regulations that apply to nursery schools—the two must be put on an equal footing. LEAs should also be told that they will not receive extra funding if they deflect into nursery education moneys that have been allocated to mainstream teaching.

The Government should start to think of children first and ideology second—the interests of the two are, in this case, antithetical. The Government should be big enough to admit that, in abolishing the voucher system, they made a mistake. They should introduce an even better voucher scheme than the one that we Conservatives left behind.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Ms Estelle Morris): I congratulate the hon. Member for West Worcestershire (Sir M. Spicer) on raising this important issue. I had thought that the House had reached unanimity in our consideration of early years education. Children, not political point scoring, should be at the centre of the debate. I regret the fact that, in some of his remarks, he reverted to political point scoring, and failed to deal with the debate in which, over the past 12 months, I have been very happy to take part.

Sir Michael Spicer: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Morris: No. I want to make progress, although I may have time to give way later.

Let us consider a few facts. I accept that Worcester changed its admission arrangements in September 1997 to admit younger children. The notion that it decided to do so on 2 May after the election of a Labour Government is surely misplaced. The admission arrangements were changed as a direct result of the Conservative Government's nursery voucher scheme, which had an in-built incentive for local authorities to take young children into schools.

The money to fund the voucher scheme—bureaucracy and all—had come from local authorities in the first place. On the whole, it had come from local authorities that had done well by young children in providing early years education. To ensure that that money returned to the maintained sector, they had to compete for kids—money followed four-year-olds. I fail to see why Conservatives Members are surprised that the organisations that wanted to provide early education competed in the market that the Conservative Government created.

We inherited a situation in which, because of the nursery voucher system, local authorities throughout the country were changing admission dates, so that they could take younger and younger children into sometimes inappropriate placings. We cannot be held responsible for that; we can be held responsible only for what we have done in the 12 months since the general election.

Sir Michael Spicer: The hon. Lady said that I had been making political points, but the Labour party made massive political points about the voucher scheme during the general election—they conducted a major campaign on it. I accept that the scheme was flawed, as I have said, but at least it allowed for parental choice. Because LEAs now control the system, parents are compelled to send their children to LEA schools. That is the fundamental difference, as I hope the Government understand.

Ms Morris: If that was the case, I would share the hon. Gentleman's concerns. All our actions show that I have not spent the past 12 months trying to squeeze out good private or voluntary sector providers.

Among the things that we have done with the money saved by the abolition of the nursery voucher scheme is to help to meet the costs of seven early excellence centres that we have opened—many in partnership with the voluntary sector. Playgroups contribute to those centres. We have been able to use money that was tied up in bureaucracy to develop EECs. No hon. Member in any part of the House has argued that early excellence centres, which are beacons of excellence in early years education and which show the way in integrating child care, early years education, working with families, the family literacy scheme and support for families, are not a good way forward.

Early years development partnerships have replaced nursery voucher schemes. The new Worcestershire unitary authority has produced an excellent scheme, and the chair of the Worcestershire early years development partnership, Professor Christine Pascal, is one of the best known people in the field of early years education. I assure the hon. Member for West Worcestershire that every provider that received money from the public purse for educating four-year-olds under the nursery voucher scheme has had the opportunity to be part of an early years development partnership, and that many—if not all—have taken that opportunity.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): Will the Minister give way?

Ms Morris: Not yet; I shall finish this point.

In every instance where a member of the private or voluntary sector has not transferred from being a provider under the voucher scheme to being a provider under the partnership scheme, my Department has specifically gone to them and found out why they have withdrawn. Some have withdrawn because they do not want to aim at the desirable learning outcomes; some have not wanted to participate because they did not especially enjoy the experience under early years vouchers; but no provider has told my Department, "We are not part of the partnership scheme, because we have not been made welcome."

We have a choice. Do we want a system that brings those providers together on the basis of market economics, in which they will compete with one another and drive one another out of the market, as happened under the voucher scheme, or do we want to bring those providers together in partnership, in the interests of children and parents? We have tried to do the latter.

However, the key point, from the viewpoint of the hon. Member for West Worcestershire, is that the choice that existed under the voucher scheme—the same providers, from all sectors, as well as new providers from the voluntary and private sectors—is still available in partnerships. It is necessary to co-ordinate those partnerships; the administration and co-ordination are done by a local authority.

However, in the hon. Gentleman's local authority, Worcestershire, the partnership is not chaired by the chair of the education committee or by a local authority official, but by a woman whose standing in early years education is unparalleled in the country. Her standing is widely respected, and I defy the hon. Gentleman to find anyone who knows about early years education and lives in his constituency who does not accept that the leadership of his local partnership is in good hands, and is committed to making the partnership cohesive.

Mr. Hayes: The Minister speaks with her usual clarity and honesty, but, as private sector playgroups are closing by the day and by the week, will she give us some feel for the numbers that have closed since she came to office? If partnerships are so important, why did Labour local education authorities, of one of which I was a member for many years, fare so badly at providing such partnerships, when their discretionary powers gave them a perfect opportunity and right to do so?

Ms Morris: Far too many playgroups are closing, but the hon. Gentleman should not pretend that that did not happen until 2 May 1997. Playgroups closed last year because of the nursery voucher system. The hon. Gentleman should read the material sent out by the Pre-School Learning Alliance. It does not pretend that the closure of playgroups did not hit the nation until the past 12 months. The divisive, competitive nursery voucher system began the closure of playgroups.

The hon. Gentleman should remember that the provision that started in September 1997 was planned before the general election, and that anything that happened in the year starting in 1997 in terms of kids in settings was planned well before the general election. I cannot see how hon. Gentlemen can fail to draw the conclusion that that was a direct result of the system that the Conservatives had in place.

I am not happy that playgroups are still closing; neither is my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. That is why, only last week in a speech to the Pre-School Learning Alliance, he announced that a further £500,000 would be provided to stop good intermediate stage playgroups closing. We need those playgroups for the expansion in three-year-old education that we want, and for the work we want to do to extend child care and wrap-around provision. To prevent their being squeezed out of the market, we will be talking to partnerships and the PLA to see how best to ensure that they are not.

I will now try to reassure the hon. Member for West Worcestershire in several respects. He is right, for instance, about the mess of regulations. What is fair for one should be fair for another: they are the same kids, no matter whether they are in the private, the voluntary or the maintained sector. The system has grown up over the years in patchwork fashion, and nobody has ever taken it by the scruff of the neck to see what could be made of it.

We deserve some credit for having published, some months ago, a discussion document that honestly faced up to the difficult issues to do with regulating child care and early years education. The two are not the same: the hours are different, the expectations of parents are different, the training of the professionals is different. What might be suitable in terms of teacher/pupil ratios for two-year-olds might not be for a four-year-old.

To be generous to our predecessors, I suspect that they did not tackle this area because it is so complex. We, however, have done it. We have asked the right questions; and I will take the hon. Gentleman's comments this evening, if he so agrees, as a response to the consultation that we have launched. I shall ensure that they are incorporated in the relevant document. The hon. Gentleman was also right to question the wisdom of four-year-olds learning in classes of 30, given that, in another setting, they might be in smaller groups.

I congratulate the partnership in Worcestershire on taking steps to ensure that the ratio in its reception classes will be 1:15. We have not made Worcestershire do that: it is ahead of the game. I also congratulate the county on the partnership's innovative idea of creating a central pool of supply staff, so that teachers from all sectors—private, maintained and voluntary—can undertake training. Those are the actions of a group of people, led by a good chair, who are committed to making partnership work.

As for inspection, qualifications, initial teacher training for working with three, four, five, six, seven and eight-year-olds, and the curriculum—they all need examining. I will say, however, that in all those areas we have taken action. We are reviewing the qualifications with a view to making them more coherent. We are reviewing desirable learning outcomes. We are reviewing the inspection framework. We want to bring together the inspection of child care and of early years education.

I also take seriously the hon. Gentleman's point about the necessity for child protection of the utmost rigour. I shall make that point forcefully in the consultation process, in the cause of enhancing rigorous child care and early years education inspection.

Sir Michael Spicer: The review is good news, and I am glad that the hon. Lady has listened to the arguments and responded accordingly. However, since there was a change in regime, education for four-year-olds in nursery schools has been obliterated in Worcestershire and, as I understand it, virtually throughout the country.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) raised the serious matter of playgroups closing, but the situation is worse than that: for four-year-olds, nursery school education has ceased to exist. The fear is that, with all the problems, which the Minister has shown she understands, nursery school education will be wiped out entirely, even for three-year-olds. That is the real worry. If the Minister has grasped that point tonight—she may have grasped it before—that will be a tremendous achievement.

Ms Morris: May I reassure the hon. Gentleman that I do not envisage three-year-olds in reception classes? That does not go on, as far as I know, and if it came to my attention that it was happening, it would be a matter of great concern.

We have taken action this year to provide places for four-year-olds. Now we want targets to be set so that we can provide places for three-year-olds. In the provision for three-year-olds, where reception classes cannot cater for kids, we will need the wealth of experience that exists in the maintained sector. There is good maintained nursery provision for three and four-year-olds. Not all kids walking through a school gate are going into a reception class at three and four. Some are going into a properly staffed, good-quality, rigorous nursery. We should not do down the maintained sector.

Because we realise that we will need the strengths of all the sectors to extend provision for three-year-olds, we have secured partnerships. That is why we provided the £500,000 of hang-on money last week to keep the playgroups going.

I imagine that the hon. Member for West Worcestershire and I will never agree on the reasons why, in September 1997, more four-year-olds went into reception classes than previously. I defy him to find any local authority that changed its admission age in the last two months of the summer term. Time would have been needed, to notify staff, to offer places, to take appeals and to allow parents to buy uniforms for their children and meet the infant class teacher. That does not happen in a six-week half-term.

Where the decision was made, as in Worcestershire, to change the starting point to four-year-olds rather than five-year-olds, it was made before 1 May last year. That is the legacy we inherited, and the turn-around that we have tried to achieve. We have not managed to do it within one year, but we have managed to give a clear signal to those in the field, but most of all to parents, that we are deadly serious about top-quality education for children.

That is the best start that we can give a youngster. Children are entitled to a proper setting, a curriculum that is appropriate to their needs, and staff who are properly trained to give them a good start. Families have a right to expect that their children will be in well regulated places, where high standards are maintained, and where the regime of child care and early years education meets the changing social and economic patterns.

I am sorry that we finish this Adjournment debate without agreement on the essential issues that caused the hon. Gentleman to call for it. When I knew that I would be responding this evening, I took the opportunity to look again at the Worcestershire plan. I know that, over the next year, the hon. Gentleman will have contact with the early years development partnership and with Christine Pascal. I hope that he will find that the seeds of partnership that have been sown will grow, in the interests of children and their parents. If they do not grow over the next 12 months, I would want to hear about it.

I assure the hon. Gentleman that we would take action to ensure that what we have done this year to lay the foundations can be built on year after year, until we achieve our eventual objective of a good quality nursery place for three and four-year-old children whose parents want it, as a start to the children's school life.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at seventeen minutes to Eleven o'clock.

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

SCOTLAND

The Secretary of State was asked—

Investment

1. Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate): When he next expects to meet representatives of Scotland's financial services industry to discuss investment. [41250]

7. Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire): When he last met the CBI in Scotland to discuss prospects for investment in Scotland. [41256]

The Minister for Education and Industry, Scottish Office (Mr. Brian Wilson): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I maintain regular contact with Scotland's financial services industry on a whole range of matters. He last met the Confederation of British Industry in Scotland on 30 January when several issues were discussed, including the favourable climate for investment in Scotland.

Mr. Blunt: Is the Minister aware of weekend press reports showing that Edinburgh is slipping down the league table of European financial centres? Does he agree with the chief executive of Scottish Widows that that will be accelerated if the Government keep giving in to nationalist demands?

Mr. Wilson: I do not accept either of the premises of the hon. Gentleman's question. The financial services industry in Edinburgh, and the rest of Scotland, is in very good health, and employment has increased since the downturn of 1994. No doubt that will continue. I also have no doubt that a constitutional settlement for the United Kingdom is no threat to the financial services industry. The Scottish financial industry does a high proportion of its business in other parts of the UK, and it has no wish to see those places turned into a foreign country.

Mr. Lansley: Has the Minister seen the Scottish chambers of commerce report for the first quarter of 1998, which shows a reduction in investment intentions among manufacturers in Scotland? Does he understand that the Government's high pound policy, combined with their intention to allow taxes and costs on business to rise, is causing manufacturing investment—the wealth-creating sector of the Scottish economy—to decline?

Mr. Wilson: Again, the hon. Gentleman has been badly briefed. There is no intention of allowing taxes on business to rise. The chambers of commerce survey shows the rate of growth in Scotland over the past year at its highest level since—again—1994.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): As my hon. Friend knows, 510 jobs are being lost in my constituency following Mitsubishi's decision to close its colour television factory at Haddington—[Interruption.] I wish that Conservative Members would take issues like this seriously; it is a very serious matter for my constituents.

Following my hon. Friend's visit to Haddington on 6 April—the day of the announcement—can he report on the progress made by the task force in creating new jobs for people in Haddington and in finding new enterprises for the factory that has been closed?

Mr. Wilson: Mitsubishi's decision was regrettable, but the company had provided employment in Haddington for more than 20 years. The circumstances that led to the announcement related not to the Scottish economy, but to a restructuring of Mitsubishi, which is taking place in several other countries as well as Scotland. We have adopted a task force approach, and that has worked reasonably well so far. According to the latest figures, 35 per cent. of the work force have already found other employment.

My hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) attended a successful jobs fair at the weekend, and a further 50 jobs are in the pipeline as a result of it. We continue to work on finding an alternative use for the Mitsubishi factory. All that has happened in advance of closure, and it is a proper response by the Government and our partners. The situation in Haddington is unfortunate, but my hon. Friend is contributing to a solution.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): May I draw my hon. Friend's attention to something that has had remarkably little notice in the Scottish media—the funding package for the Forth and Clyde canal? Various bodies had put together a substantial amount, but the project was in danger of collapse until my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and his colleagues intervened to ensure funding that will bring jobs to my area and along the length of the canal.

Mr. Wilson: I am delighted that my hon. Friend has taken the opportunity to draw attention to an important funding decision—one of several that have been taken in recent weeks, which will have long-term beneficial effects on the Scottish economy. I pay particular tribute to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, who played a crucial role in ensuring that outcome, when other sources of funding did not prove as successful as we had hoped. We did the right thing by the project and by the Scottish economy. All that will be good news in the future for jobs and the economic dynamism that will flow from the canal project.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): Given the importance to the Scottish economy of exporting, and especially exporting to Europe, is the Minister aware that some Scottish companies must reduce their prices by 20 to 25 per cent. in overseas markets to remain competitive? How does he see profit being generated to fund future investment in Scotland, including important investment in training and in research and development?

Mr. Wilson: I am aware of the difficulties that some exporters are facing, and I am aware of the excellent efforts of Scottish exporters to deal with that problem. They are finding it necessary to trim their costs and to compete even more effectively. Despite that, Scottish export records are extremely good and we are continuing to encourage new exporters. The Scottish export campaign that I launched recently aims at getting 500 more companies exporting by the turn of the decade. I have no doubt that we can do that. We must diversify, encourage existing exporters and help far more Scottish companies to overcome the psychological barriers that dissuade them from becoming exporters.

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): Scotland has ambitions to be a world-class competitor in targeted industrial sectors. At the same time, Locate in Scotland has targeted certain industrial sectors for foreign direct investment. What assurance can my hon. Friend give me that those are not the same sectors, and that taxpayers are not being asked to pay out money to attract foreign investment into our country, at the expense of crowding out indigenous companies that we are trying to make into world-class competitors?

Mr. Wilson: I have repeatedly invited examples of indigenous companies being crowded out by the allocation of money and support—on exactly the same terms, incidentally—to inward investors. I want more Scottish companies to grow and invest, as well as a healthy inward investment sector. We owe the wonderful success of winning the Cadence and Project Alba for Scotland to the fact that we already have a strong electronics base in Scotland.

All the pieces fit together. The occasional setback to inward investment should be viewed in a mature way. It is not a disaster, and no one should dance on the grave of inward investment because of the occasional setback. Of course there will be setbacks. We are not immune from what is happening elsewhere in the world, but, overwhelmingly, inward investment is a magnificent success story for the Scottish economy. Hundreds of thousands of Scottish families depend on inward investment for their livelihoods and prosperity.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex): What assurances did the Government give the Scottish financial services sector about the consequences of devolution? Have not the sector's fears been vindicated by the fact that the Scottish National party has overtaken the Labour party in the opinion polls? Now that both of the Government's former referendum partners are actively campaigning for a referendum on the full independence of Scotland, what assurances can the Minister give the financial services sector?

Mr. Wilson: It would be an extremely odd financial services company in the shrewd business community of Edinburgh that formulated its policies and actions on the basis of an opinion poll. Perhaps the Tories think that that is how financial services companies conduct their affairs, but I doubt very much whether it is.

The assurance that the financial services sector was given, like everyone else in Scotland, was that there would be no differential business taxes within the United Kingdom. That is exactly what it wanted to hear. As I have said already, if the financial services sector in Scotland, which has the vast majority of its business in England, faced a differential tax regime, of course it would take flight. However, it will not face that, because it is within the United Kingdom and that is where it will remain.

Mr. Alasdair Morgan (Galloway and Upper Nithsdale): Given that some Scottish financial institutions have already located part of their operations in Dublin, does the Minister agree that that is partly because the Irish Parliament has passed some 40 pieces of pro-business legislation over recent years? Does he agree that it would be a good thing if the Scottish Parliament had similar powers?

Mr. Wilson: I imagine that some companies also have business in Ireland, so it is natural that they would locate some of their operations there. I can only point to what the Government have done in terms of corporation tax. The financial services industry is very happy with the Government's performance. The hon. Gentleman conspicuously fails to address the fact that the majority of business for the Scottish financial services industry is in England. I do not think—and I imagine that the hon. Gentleman agrees—that they would want to see the rest of the United Kingdom become a foreign country, as he proposes.

Hospital Waiting Lists

3. Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West): If he will make a statement on hospital waiting lists in the Highland health board area. [41252]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Sam Galbraith): Highland health board's waiting list at 31 March 1998 was 3,616. More than 80 per cent. of people on the list in Highland are seen within three months.

Mr. Kennedy: I thank the Minister for that reply and acknowledge the welcome progress that has been made in most areas both in meeting the agreed patient targets that were set between the Scottish Office and the health board and in reducing waiting times. Nevertheless, I draw the Minister's attention to two areas that are causing concern: the waiting time for gynaecology appointments and for orthopaedic out-patient appointments. In both cases, the numbers are falling significantly short of the agreed targets. The Minister has been very helpful regarding the issue of surgical services on Skye and their future provision. Given that the health board is meeting to discuss that matter today, will he—like me—urge it to bear in mind those more disappointing statistics when it comes to deciding on the correct nature and level of future provision for Skye?

Mr. Galbraith: As the hon. Gentleman knows, I was a surgeon at the hospital on Skye and I had a most splendid time on the island. [Interruption] Thank you very much indeed. The Highland health board is trying to integrate the service in Inverness with that in Skye and to open up the service and expand the range of facilities on Skye. I heartily recommend that, as it will have the added benefit of reducing waiting lists and waiting times in the area. We have allocated £44.5 million to tackling the problems that the hon. Gentleman has highlighted. He has my assurance that waiting lists and waiting times will come down in the very near future.

Mr. Malcolm Savidge (Aberdeen, North): Regarding hospital waiting lists, will the Minister make a statement about how Government policy is affecting hospital provision in the north of Scotland?

Mr. Galbraith: That question is very wide and I think that Madam Speaker would be upset if I took too much time to answer it.

Madam Speaker: I certainly would.

Mr. Galbraith: I shall highlight only one area. Aberdeen is to have a new children's hospital. That has come about because Government policy has led to co-operation between the trusts. If it were not for a Labour Government, that hospital would never have been built.

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes): Given the Government's failure to meet the targets referred to by the hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy), who raised this question, given Labour's pledge at the general election that they would cut NHS waiting lists not in the longer term but as a first step, and given that waiting lists in Scotland have increased by 5,000 overall, rather than being disappointed—as he expressed himself to be—is the Minister now ashamed?

Mr. Galbraith: I do not think that I need to take any lessons about waiting lists or waiting times from the right hon. Gentleman. Under his Government, waiting lists rose month by month and year by year. We shall reverse that trend. In Scotland, we have allocated £44.5 million to tackling that problem. The right hon. Gentleman should be a bit careful about what he says because, when waiting lists are lower than the level that we inherited from the previous Government, I will expect him to come to the Dispatch Box and congratulate us heartily.

Mr. Ancram: I do not want to give the Minister a lesson in what direction is up and what is down, but the current figures do not seem to match the pledge given at the election. Can the Minister tell the House why the pledge to cut hospital waiting lists was strangely absent from a recent consultative survey issued by the Labour party asking people how they thought that the Government were performing in relation to their pledges? As that has disappeared, does the hon. Gentleman not think that he should do the honourable thing and go, too?

Mr. Galbraith: I am a bit surprised by the right hon. Gentleman: I thought that he was a bigger politician and would not use such cheap jibes. We have put £44.5 million into waiting lists. We shall get them down until they are lower than the level that we inherited from the right hon. Gentleman's Government.

Manufacturing

4. Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): If he will make a statement on the level of business confidence in the manufacturing sector in Scotland. [41253]

The Minister for Education and Industry, Scottish Office (Mr. Brian Wilson): I have frequent discussions with many manufacturing firms across Scotland. Underlying business confidence remains strong.

Mr. Swayne: Does the Minister agree that the problems experienced by Mitsubishi and by Lite-on reinforce the need for Scottish Enterprise and Locate in Scotland to retain their autonomy and not to be subject to empire building by the Department of Trade and Industry, which would run counter to the devolution policy for which we are both such enthusiasts?

Mr. Wilson: I am astonished to hear such sound common sense from the hon. Gentleman. It is important for Scottish Enterprise and Locate in Scotland to maintain their ability to work so effectively for Scotland. There will be setbacks with inward investment, just as there are setbacks with indigenous companies, but there is a lot more good news than bad, and that will continue.

Mr. David Marshall (Glasgow, Shettleston): Does the Minister agree that, under the previous Government, Locate in Scotland's record of attracting manufacturing jobs to the city of Glasgow was dreadful, probably directly as a result of the anti-Glasgow bias of Tory Ministers in the Scottish Office? Will he give an assurance that he will make every effort to attract manufacturers to locate and expand in Glasgow and that the previous policy will be reversed?

Mr. Wilson: I have no knowledge of such a policy having existed. Locate in Scotland does extremely well in bringing companies to Scotland, but the location that a company prefers is very much a matter for the company, so I shall not go down that road. I can speak only for the past year: Locate in Scotland and the Government have done extremely well in bringing extra jobs into Glasgow through inward investment. I intend that to continue and I assure my hon. Friend that there is more good news on the way.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): How can any hon. Member or anyone outside the House accept the Minister's assurances on manufacturing when it is technically in recession, inflation is at a six-year high, class sizes are going up, waiting lists are going up and the Scottish nationalists are on the march—all as a result of this incompetent Administration?

Mr. Wilson: I can only sympathise with the hon. Gentleman on the doom-laden world in which he lives. I assure him that if he comes up to Scotland he will find that quite a lot of things are going very well.

Land Reform

5. Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus): How many responses he has received to his consultation document in relation to land reform in Scotland. [41254]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Donald Dewar): So far, more than 300 written replies have been received from individuals and organisations right across the country.

Mr. Welsh: Has the Secretary of State read the Shelter report on land reform and the housing crisis in rural Scotland? Does he agree that current forms of land ownership block access to and provision of badly needed housing in Scotland's rural areas? What steps is he taking to make available land and homes for Scotland's rural communities?

Mr. Dewar: I accept that there is a problem and I am aware of the points that have been fairly put by Shelter. As the hon. Gentleman knows, a review is going on and a land reform working party is in place and operating. We want the problem to be one of the aspects of the review that is taken on board. I accept that there is work to be done.

Child Care

6. Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries): What steps he is taking to ensure the continuance of child care provision, following the withdrawal of urban aid funding. [41255]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Sam Galbraith): As part of our strategy for child care for the financial year 1998-99, we will be making almost £4 million extra available to local authorities to develop and encourage child care in their areas. That could be used, among other purposes, to provide funding for child care projects previously funded through the urban programme.

Mr. Brown: Today, high-quality child care provision, right across the country, has been announced. Does my hon. Friend agree that what rural areas have not received in the past will come through the actions of the Government? Under the previous Administration, rural areas were sadly neglected.

Mr. Galbraith: I most certainly agree with my hon. Friend. Today, we launched our child care strategy which is designed to ensure that affordable, accessible, high-quality care is available for those who need it—right across society.

There is no absolute blueprint because needs differ and provision and diversity vary in rural areas, and it will be for local partnerships to deal with matters. We have put in large extra amounts, starting with £5 million this year, and there will be £50 million for next year. There is also the child care tax credit, which, for Scotland, alone will be an additional £30 million for the sector.

Mr. Donald Gorrie (Edinburgh, West): Will the Minister consider bringing more Departments together to approach such subjects? This country seems to have the fault of isolating individual problems. If we brought together the health service, housing, education, recreation, social work and voluntary bodies, we could deal better with problems than we can by isolating them and having a little fund here and a bigger fund there.

Mr. Galbraith: May I suggest to the hon. Gentleman that he reads the Green Paper and the child care strategy document because that is exactly what is being done? Why does he think that I am the Minister with responsibility for children? It is because I am able to co-ordinate all Departments. Other parties talk about altering government, but we have produced joined-up government to produce joined-up solutions that result in benefits for the whole of society.

Lockerbie

8. Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): What discussions have taken place between the Lord Advocate's office and the US State Department relating to (a) evidence for the Libyan involvement in the Lockerbie bombing and (b) the reliability of witnesses' memories of the event. [41257]

The Minister for Home Affairs and Devolution, Scottish Office (Mr. Henry McLeish): It is not appropriate to disclose details of discussions between the office of my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate and United States officials.

Mr. Dalyell: Why not? At what level are they having discussions with the Americans?

Mr. McLeish: In my first response I made it quite clear that we cannot disclose details. The Government position remains that those who are accused of acts of terrorism should not be able to dictate the venue or composition of the court before which they are to be tried. Scotland and the United States have exercised jurisdiction in this case, and Libya should now surrender the two accused for trial in either of those countries, as it is required to do under the relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions.

Scottish Parliament

9. Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): When he last met representatives of political parties to discuss procedures for the Scottish Parliament. [41258]

The Minister for Home Affairs and Devolution, Scottish Office (Mr. Henry McLeish): I met yesterday representatives of the political parties in Scotland at the third meeting of the consultative steering group on the Scottish Parliament. That group is charged with taking forward consideration of how the Parliament will operate.

Mr. Robathan: I am glad that the Minister has met the political parties as we proceed towards the Scottish Parliament. The Government have stated that they believe in the Union, but there is a great deal of uncertainty about procedures. Is the Minister not concerned that, given the opinion polls in Scotland, his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State could end up as Leader of the Opposition in the Scottish Parliament? The Scottish nationalists could be the largest party and might use the uncertainty of procedures to undermine the whole business of the Union and the Scottish Parliament.

Mr. McLeish: The hon. Gentleman's main question related to the procedures in which we are involved and the relationship with other political parties. The realpolitik in Scotland is that parties are co-operating on a way forward. The consultative steering group is looking at Standing Orders, working methods and procedures. The Scottish people value their Parliament and want it to work for them. The nation does not want the Parliament to work for any political party.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): Does my hon. Friend agree that it is important for the new Parliament to present a modern, efficient vision of itself in the 21st century? Therefore, can he assure us that there will be no fancy costumes; that in a multi-religious society there will be no prayers; and that modern technology will be used for voting and in many other aspects of the work of that Parliament?

Mr. McLeish: I do not want to pre-empt the work of the consultative steering group. In a sense, the issues that my hon. Friend raises are the ones which we are tackling. There is no point in having differences between Westminster and Holyrood simply for the sake of difference. We are convinced that this will be a modern substantial Parliament with tremendous law-making powers. The people of Scotland will be proud of it, but, more importantly, we have to make sure that it works properly because legislating will be the essence of the new Parliament.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): What constitutional and legislative safeguards are there for the people of Scotland in a one-chamber system?

Mr. McLeish: As part of the work of the consultative steering group, we are keen to explore that issue, because, in terms of constitutional development in the United Kingdom, the Parliament is a significant step. We are looking at the situation that will arise with a single chamber in the new Parliament. I think that a single chamber will work well, but it requires proper built-in safeguards and proper consultation. I take the right hon. Gentleman's question seriously and I can tell him that we have asked the expert panel that is advising the consultative steering group to look at that issue.

Land Ownership

10. Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East): What assessment he has made of the advantages of (a) reforming and (b) abolishing the feudal system of land ownership in Scotland. [41259]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Calum Macdonald): The Government favour the earliest possible abolition of feudal tenure in Scotland and have asked the Scottish Law Commission to accelerate its review, which will now be completed by the end of this year.

Mr. Connarty: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Getting rid of this scurrilous system, which is a hangover of the feudal relationships that once bedevilled Scotland, is long overdue. He will be aware of the campaign that is run by my hon. Friend the Member for Clydesdale (Mr. Hood), but is he also aware of the campaign that is run by the Association of Retired Persons Over 50 for people in my constituency and others, who have bought their houses in retirement and have a feudal superior who is abusing the right to charge them extortionate prices for repairs and other landlord-based provision? Can my hon. Friend give me an assurance that his revision will deal with that type of scurrilous landlord for ever?

Mr. Macdonald: I should like to tackle that problem ahead of the Scottish Law Commission final report. As a result of my hon. Friend the Member for Clydesdale (Mr. Hood) raising this issue in the House, the commission was asked to make a report on the specific problem of leasehold casualties. That report was published on 30 April and we are looking urgently at its recommendations and at the possibility of legislation at the earliest possible date.

Ms Roseanna Cunningham (Perth): Among the various options being looked at by the Government for land reform, will the Minister specifically look at the prospect of introducing a way of freezing controversial land purchases such as Knoydart to allow full investigations into the circumstances before the purchases are finalised?

Mr. Macdonald: The circumstances around the Knoydart sales certainly raise questions that cause concern to everyone who has the interest of the community at heart. That is exactly why we set up the policy group—to try to find solutions to exactly that sort of situation.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): In his reform, will the Minister ensure that there is a time limit beyond which people cannot go back to revived redundant titles, so that we can avoid people being pressured and indeed ripped off by clever, legally qualified people who have made no contribution to wealth creation, but have robbed people who thought that they had clear title?

Mr. Macdonald: That is also being looked at as part of the Scottish Law Commission's report. These situations create severe injustices, and the main point of the report is to try to find solutions to that problem.

Special Advisers

11. Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield): If he will make a statement on the employment of special advisers in his Department. [41260]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Donald Dewar): All special advisers are employed under the terms and conditions that are set out in the model contract for special advisers, a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Mr. Grieve: I thank the Secretary of State for that rather bland statement. Would he care to indicate how many special advisers he has and how he envisages that the role of special advisers will develop when there is a devolved Parliament in Edinburgh? Will it, because it is an inclusive system, not require the use of political advisers at all?

Mr. Dewar: It is difficult to envisage a situation in which Ministers, whether they be in this Parliament or in the Scottish Parliament, will not require advice and help in formulating policy. That is the role of special advisers. That is certainly what is done by the three special advisers whom I have in my Department. [HON. MEMBERS: "Three?"] These cries of astonishment suggest, if they are genuine, that Conservative Members are far off the pace. Those people advise me and they do it very well.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, Pollok): Has the Secretary of State considered appointing a personal grooming adviser and, if so, would he make that adviser's services available to all members of the Scottish parliamentary Labour party?

Mr. Dewar: I do not believe, because I have great faith in my hon. Friend, that there is in that question any implication of criticism of my standards, although I confess that my other good and honourable friend, my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), once confided to me that he thought that, apart from him, I was the worst dressed Member of the House of Commons, but, of course, since I have become a Minister, it is all different.

Economy

12. Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): When he last met the Confederation of British Industry, the Scottish Trades Union Congress and Scottish Enterprise to discuss developments in the Scottish economy. [41261]

The Minister for Education and Industry, Scottish Office (Mr. Brian Wilson): My right hon. Friend last met the CBI Scotland on 30 January, the STUC at its annual congress, on 20 April, and the chairman of Scottish Enterprise on 15 April.

Mr. Salmond: Why did the Minister find himself quoted in the BBC as attacking the Scottish National party for criticising Locate in Scotland about the inward investment setbacks in Scotland over the past few weeks? Can he produce any statement made by the SNP criticising Locate in Scotland? If not, was he misquoted on the BBC, or was he only running at the mouth? Does he understand that it is not Locate in Scotland that we do not think is up to the job, but the Industry Minister?

Mr. Wilson: Whenever the people of Scotland might be deluded into thinking that the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) is filling the role of statesman, he falls back into his normal behaviour. If he thinks that name calling is a substitute for policy, he has a personal problem, with which he will have to deal. Instead of asking me such questions, he should speak to the hon. Member for North Tayside (Mr. Swinney), who is sitting next to him, who will tell him that, on the night of the Lite-On announcement, he called on television for a review of inward investment policy—end of story. However, if the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan would like the video, I am sure I can help him.

Mr. Malcolm Chisholm (Edinburgh, North and Leith): May I welcome the fact that we have the first Government ever in the history of the United Kingdom to consider child care as an essential part not only of economic policy but of equal opportunities and children's policy? Will not today's first-ever national child care strategy lead both to more jobs in child care and to opportunities for parents to enter the wider labour market?

Mr. Wilson: I not only endorse my hon. Friend's comments but pay tribute to the considerable part that he personally played in the origination of that strategy. He is absolutely right that, if people are to be liberated to work, and especially if women are to be liberated to fulfil their potential in education and in the jobs market, it is essential that child care is available. Child care must be integrated with the needs of the individual and be properly resourced, and the Government are doing all of that. Ultimately, the people of Scotland are interested in child care, education, health and housing. It is those great issues on which they vote—not on the juvenile nonsense that we heard a few moments ago from the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Does the Minister acknowledge the contribution made to the Scottish economy by the textile sector? When he next meets the STUC, the CBI and Scottish Enterprise, will he undertake to raise with them the issue of creating a strategy for future stabilisation of the textile industry? Will he include in those talks representatives from some of the bigger companies, such as Dawson International? Will he meet those representatives to try to stabilise our current manufacturing capacity, and to help some of the communities built around the textile industry to diversify for the future?

Mr. Wilson: I fully endorse those comments, as there are difficulties in the textile industry. I should like first to apologise directly to the hon. Gentleman for having to cancel a return visit to the borders, which has been rescheduled for early June. However, as I said, I endorse all his comments and realise the very specific problems that the borders area is currently experiencing. I also agree that we must together take action to try to deal with those problems. There are various employment problems both in the hon. Gentleman's constituency and in other border areas, and together we will have to take action to build better prospects.

Mr. Desmond Browne (Kilmarnock and Loudoun): My hon. Friend will be aware that, last week, the last shoe manufacturer in Scotland, Clansman Shoes of Kilmarnock, announced short-time working for its 128 skilled workers. The principal reason for the announcement was that the firm's main customer, Hush Puppy (UK) has sought to source its shoes from India. The announcement was made against a background of increasing uncertainty about manufacturing jobs in my constituency. Given the Minister's prompt and effective intervention when 380 jobs were lost, when British Aerospace stopped aeroplane manufacturing in Prestwick, will he consider a similar initiative for my constituency?

Mr. Wilson: The task force approach has worked well in Prestwick, as it has in Haddington in response to the major job losses, which we discussed. In the short term, I should be delighted to meet my hon. Friend and the local authority. I recognise that there are concerns in some of the traditional industries in Kilmarnock and east Ayrshire, and we shall certainly consider whether there is more that we can do. Let us take it one step at a time; have a meeting to discuss the problems; and see where we go from there.

EU Representation

13. Mr. John Swinney (North Tayside): If he will list the meetings on the subjects of fishing, agriculture, education and economic development during the United Kingdom's presidency of the EU which he or one of his Ministers has chaired. [41262]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Calum Macdonald): The Minister for Education and Industry will represent the United Kingdom at the joint Education and Social Affairs Council on 4 June. The Minister responsible for health, the arts and children will chair a health conciliation meeting with the European Parliament on 27 May. I have represented the UK presidency in bilateral meetings on the European spatial development perspective with eight member states. In addition, the Secretary of State will represent the UK on 9 June in the regional policy discussions at the informal ministerial meeting in Glasgow.

Mr. Swinney: I thank the Minister for his reply. Does he believe that that is satisfactory representation of Scotland's distinctive interests in those policy areas? What are his expectations about the incidence of Scottish Ministers representing the Scottish Parliament in such forums after the passage of the Scotland Bill?

Mr. Macdonald: The hon. Gentleman misunderstands what is involved in chairing such meetings as part of the UK presidency. The chair is not supposed to advance national interests as such, but, rather, to look after the interests of all member states at the meeting. I expect that arrangements will continue satisfactorily after devolution, just as they do at the moment.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire): Is the Minister aware that the Scottish Fishermens Federation has expressed strong concern that Scotland will lose its independent voice in Europe after devolution? Is it not a matter of regret that, after devolution, Scottish Ministers will attend European bodies only by invitation, and not by right as they do at the moment?

Mr. Macdonald: Attendance will be on the same basis as at present, which is by mutual agreement between different Departments. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State met the federation recently, and they had a very constructive discussion on just that point.

NHS Acute Services Review

14. Mr. Michael Moore (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): When he expects the NHS acute services review to be completed; and if he will make a statement. [41263]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Sam Galbraith): The acute services review will be completed on time, at the end of May. The report will be published some time in June and will be made widely available.

Mr. Moore: I thank the Minister for that reply. Will he comment on whether Sir David Carter has looked at the future of the Princess Alexandra eye pavilion in Edinburgh? Will he give a specific assurance that, contrary to recent rumours, the eye pavilion's services, which are respected throughout the world and serve a wide range of people in the borders, Edinburgh and elsewhere in Scotland, will not be dispersed and that the site will not be sold simply to reap maximum development value for somebody else?

Mr. Galbraith: I should explain to the hon. Gentleman that the acute services review is not about specific details for each health board. It is a template and the basis for principles on which acute services are organised, in order to ensure that, no matter where one enters the system, one gets the best possible care. Although the eye pavilion is a matter for Lothian health board, I assure the hon. Gentleman that nowhere in the health service is a decision made simply to make money from development. All decisions are made in the best interests of the patients whom we all look after.

Local Government

15. Ms Sandra Osborne (Ayr): What plans he has to encourage greater community participation in local government. [41264]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Calum Macdonald): The Commission on Local Government and the Scottish Parliament is looking radically at how councils can best make themselves responsive and accountable to the communities that they serve.

Ms Osborne: May I draw to the Minister's attention to South Ayrshire council's new initiative in which more than 1,000 local residents regularly give feedback on council policy? From that, a citizens jury has been set up, which looks in depth at council and local issues. We are currently considering the issue of drinking in public places. Does the Minister agree that the initiative is excellent and should be encouraged in a modern democracy?

Mr. Macdonald: I completely agree with my hon. Friend. South Ayrshire council is conducting an exciting experiment, to which other councils could look. I hope that the independent commission will take the initiative into account as it completes its deliberations and takes evidence from councils.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest): In encouraging greater participation in local government, does the Minister have any plans to introduce gender balance in the selection of candidates? If so, is he aware that the vast majority of people consider such an artificial exercise to be purely in the interests of public relations and to be of no benefit whatever to the Scottish people?

Mr. Macdonald: It is for political parties to decide on gender balance. I notice that the Conservatives have managed to achieve a gender balance in their representation of zero.

Local Government Finance

16. Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): What proportion of local government spending in Scotland is raised by council tax; and what plans he has to change this proportion. [41265]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Calum Macdonald): Just over 20 per cent. of local authority net expenditure in Scotland is funded by the council tax. There are no plans to alter that proportion at present.

Mr. Bruce: Surely Government policy is to extend the amount being collected locally compared to the amount provided by the national Exchequer. The English borders are subject to that policy, but Scotland is not. There is already an enormous inequality between the amount given by the central Exchequer to local authorities in Scotland and the amount given to those in England and Wales. As a result of devolution, must we not re-examine the Barnett formula and come up with a fair distribution of central funds to local funds, because, otherwise, the United Kingdom will come under enormous pressure?

Mr. Macdonald: The Conservative Government were happy to sustain and support the Barnett formula. It is odd that Conservative Members should stand on their heads and try to attack it now that they are in opposition. We will consult in the summer on proposals to return some local control over the business rate, but, if that is implemented, there will be strong safeguards to protect the interests of local businesses.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

The Parliamentary Secretary was asked—

Law Centres

27. Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): What proposals he has to increase financial support for law centres. [41279]

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): To deliver the Government's manifesto commitment to create a community legal service, we are seeking to refocus legal aid on social welfare issues. We expect law centres to benefit from that if they are franchised and able to win contracts.

Mr. Mitchell: I am sure that my hon. Friend agrees that law centres are valuable and are the best way of providing good, cost-effective and efficient legal advice for the mass of ordinary people who are being priced out of paying for legal services by escalating costs. As we agree that law centres are to become the kernel of the community legal service that we are committed to providing, is it not necessary now to provide them with more money to expand their number from the present 50 or so towards the 250 envisaged at the end of the war, and to extend the range of legal services that they can provide to fill the gaps in legal aid?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his observations. I agree that we should like more money to be made available to law centres, but clearly a prerequisite is that we control the costs of legal aid. We already provide grants to nine law centres and £1.7 million under the green form scheme. If we are to release resources to be made available to law centres, it is important that we are able to control the costs of the traditional legal aid scheme.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): What will be gained by making more legal services available to the general public when the need to travel—for example, in Shropshire, where it is proposed to close the court in Shrewsbury—makes access impossible for ordinary people?

Mr. Hoon: No decisions have yet been taken about the court in Shrewsbury. It is important that there should be a balance between the availability of courts and expense. Courts are expensive capital assets which the Government have to maintain. In supporting courts and making sure that as many people as possible have access to them, we have to ensure that the taxpayer is getting value for money. That balance must be struck.

Ms Hazel Blears (Salford): Although law centres are a key element in improving access to justice, many other advice services such as citizens advice bureaux, housing advice centres, welfare rights centres and debt counselling are funded and co-ordinated by local authorities. Will my hon. Friend ensure that, in the shaping of the future of the community legal service, local government plays a key role in ensuring that services are accessible and relevant to local people?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that helpful question. Clearly it is crucial that we provide local high-quality legal assistance; indeed, to deliver a community legal service is a manifesto commitment of the Government. We are examining the range of help that may be necessary with issues such as social welfare, benefit advice, debt, housing and employment, and there is a task force in the Lord Chancellor's Department working urgently to develop a range of proposals to enable us to deliver such legal advice where it is most needed, to the most vulnerable people in our society.

Legal Aid

28. Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest): How many responses his Department has received to the consultation paper on conditional fee arrangements which were (i) in favour of the Government's proposals and (ii) against them. [41282]

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): Consultation closed on 30 April 1998, by which time we had received 233 responses. That includes the response from the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier), but not the bundle that he submitted of private correspondence between Opposition Members and various law firms, some of which was written before the consultation paper was published, and some of which was clearly aimed at soliciting unfavourable comments. Analysis of all the responses to our paper is being undertaken and we will consider the results in due course.

Mrs. Laing: Can the Minister assure the House that, despite the clearly party political inference that he put into his answer, when the analysis takes place he will note the significant body of opinion, of which the Opposition are aware from our postbags, that opposes the Government's policy? Having done so, will he change the policy accordingly—or is the consultation exercise just a public relations exercise?

Mr. Hoon: It has been made clear—indeed, I have made it clear myself in a letter to the hon. and learned Member for Harborough—that we shall take into account all the representations that we receive. There has been a prolonged consultation period. The Lord Chancellor first suggested the changes that we are considering as long ago as October, and there has been a further consultation paper, a statement in the House and extensive discussion involving Opposition Members on how to take the proposals forward. Only when we have considered all the representations will we reach any decisions.

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon): Mention is made in the consultation paper of the continuation of legal aid for defendants and its withdrawal in business cases. Will the Minister assure the House that legal aid will always be available to defendants such as Mr. Gerald James, formerly chairman of Astra Holdings plc, who had to defend proceedings that were subsequently found to be unsound and collapsed, although he had had to face the might of the state in those circumstances?

Mr. Hoon: Legal aid will continue to cover a range of cases, including family cases, housing cases, judicial review and actions arising from the misdeeds of public authorities, as well as to enable people to defend proceedings. I hope that that list is sufficiently wide to encompass the hon. Gentleman's concerns.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): I thank the Parliamentary Secretary for giving publicity to the work that I have done as Opposition spokesman. From my perusal of the press, it seems that I get a rather better press than either the hon. Gentleman or the Lord Chancellor—which I agree is not difficult. Does the Minister realise that it is now widely accepted that the Lord Chancellor's plans for conditional fees, although long on misdirected ambition, are woefully incoherent? Will he undertake not only personally to read every response to the consultation paper—including the letters from solicitors that I forwarded under the consultation process—but to pay attention to, and act upon, the criticisms contained in those responses?

Mr. Hoon: I am delighted to discover that the hon. and learned Gentleman is so pleased with his own publicity. I understand that a reshuffle is in the offing and I hope that his comments are in no way an advertisement of his skills for the attention of his leader, who no doubt reads Hansard as regularly as the rest of us. I shall certainly read all the various comments that have been made before reaching a decision on the consultation paper. It is vital that we have a reformed modernised legal aid scheme; indeed, the hon. and learned Gentleman knows that he supported a Government who regarded the costs of legal aid as utterly out of control, and the legal aid system as in urgent need of reform. It is astonishing that in such a short time he has become so used to the ways of opposition.

29. Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): What action he has recently undertaken to make transparent levels of charges for legal aid work. [41283]

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): The level of charges is published annually in regulations and in the legal aid handbook.

Mr. Viggers: Was it not misleading and totally unrealistic for the Lord Chancellor to say in an article in The Independent on 18 February that legal aid assistance should be focused on cases either involving novel and significant points of law or with wider implications? As the Lord Chancellor is cutting legal aid across the board, would that not mean that individuals involved in normal cases would pay even more and receive even less?

Mr. Hoon: The reference was to ensuring that legal aid was available in cases in which there were novel or significant points of law. Central to the proposed reforms is the belief that everyone should have access to a lawyer and that scarce taxpayers' money should be concentrated on cases in which it can do most good. It is right and proper that the availability of legal aid should be restricted in that wide range of money-related cases where, we believe, conditional fees are an adequate way in which to provide people with representation. Scarce taxpayers' funds should be concentrated on the cases in which they are justified, such as those involving novel and significant points of law.

Mr. Steve McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green): Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a world of difference between the vast majority of solicitors engaged in legal aid work, who make a valuable and often unrecognised contribution and receive modest incomes, and the tiny proportion of people engaged in such work who can claim fees of up to £750,000 a year at taxpayers' expense? Will he join me in commending the contribution of that vast majority, and will he assure the House that, under the reforms, individuals will no longer be able to extract such exorbitant funds from the public purse?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his observations. I entirely agree that the great majority of lawyers working through the legal aid system provide a valuable and consistent source of advice and representation—I am the first to pay tribute to that. My hon. Friend is right to point out that the fact that as much as £750,000 of taxpayers' money can be paid into the pocket of one lawyer in one year is a matter of concern. It is absolutely right that the Government should publish such figures, as, indeed, our predecessors did.

Medical and Personal Injury Insurance

31. Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey): What estimate his Department has made of the impact on the legal aid budget of compulsory (a) medical insurance and (b) personal injury insurance; and if he will make a statement. [41287]

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): Although the Government are keen to see an expansion of legal expenses insurance generally, the Lord Chancellor's Department has not made any estimate of the impact of compulsory insurance on the legal aid budget, because that is not a realistic prospect. The Government prefer to modernise the civil justice system to make it quicker, cheaper and simpler—we want to encourage the development of voluntary insurance, wider access to membership schemes such as those provided by trade unions and other organisations, and increased availability and use of conditional fee agreements.

Mr. Hughes: In considering the legal aid system in general, will the Parliamentary Secretary bear in mind the fact that, every day, people bring cases against health authorities throughout the country? Some of those cases are legally aided and others are not, but they all involve a huge amount of public money. People want a simple way in which fault can be recognised when the health service gets something wrong. Will he talk to his colleagues in the Department of Health to ensure that people's ability to enforce their rights when things go wrong in the health service is streamlined and made far less traumatic?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his suggestion. The Lord Chancellor's Department and the Department of Health have been engaged in discussions along those lines. In the most recent consultation document, we stressed the importance of channelling legal aid funds to those who specialise in medical negligence cases. Lawyers who deal daily with such issues do a far better job not only for the individual plaintiff but, crucially, in providing a proper and effective service to society.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a strange irony in the fact that the Labour Government adopted Tory spending plans and introduced the possibility of cutting legal aid, but are now being condemned for it by Tory Members? Is there not a moral here—that it is time we stopped using Tory spending plans?

Mr. Hoon: I had considerable experience of disagreeing with my hon. Friend in the days when I had the privilege to represent him in the European Parliament. The important point is that the Government do not intend to cut legal aid. Our ambition is to refocus it and save money on traditional legal aid, to ensure that we can help the most vulnerable in our society, many of whom live in Bolsover.

Mr. John M. Taylor (Solihull): When will the Legal Aid Board become subject to the late payment legislation that is currently before the House?

Mr. Hoon: We are considering that.

Indonesia

3.30 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Derek Fatchett): With permission, Madam Speaker, I would like to make a statement on the current situation in Indonesia.

Our top priority remains to ensure the safety of British citizens in Indonesia. Throughout the recent unrest, the embassy has kept in close touch with the British community through the warden system and through regularly updated travel advice. That advice has also been broadcast by the BBC World Service. Emergency telephone lines have been set up in Jakarta to provide up-to-date information 24 hours a day.

Advice to resident British nationals caught up in the unrest has been kept under constant review. From Friday 15 May, Britons were advised to consider leaving Indonesia. Early this morning, in view of the latest political developments and the demonstrations expected on 20 May, we issued advice that British citizens should leave Indonesia, preferably avoiding travel on 20 May. At our ambassador's request, an additional British Airways 747 flight has been arranged by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, leaving Jakarta later today for Kuala Lumpur. Other scheduled flights are also available.

British citizens with safe access to the airport were advised to make their own way there, where an embassy team will be available at the British Airways office to give advice. The embassy also chartered a fleet of buses to transport British citizens from central Jakarta. As an extra precaution, a police escort was requested and provided.

We were greatly saddened by the tragic death of a British citizen in Jakarta on 14 May. Our deepest sympathy goes out to his family. The motive appears to have been robbery, as the evidence suggests that the death was unrelated to the political violence. We have asked the Indonesian police for investigation reports as a matter of urgency. We have also heard rumours of the possible death of a second British national, but that has not yet been confirmed. Our embassy in Jakarta is working in extremely difficult circumstances to try to establish the full facts.

I would like to thank the staff of our embassy in Jakarta for their hard work in the face of enormous difficulties and a very unpredictable political situation. They, and many of their spouses, have been working tirelessly round the clock since 14 May to help the local British community. Many of them also have dependants in Indonesia to worry about. Although their work is not yet over, I would like to take this opportunity to thank them now for their continuing efforts and their support to the British community. We are also very grateful to British Airways, and especially to Claire Hatton and her staff in Jakarta, for their great efforts to help many Britons leaving Indonesia.

The situation in Indonesia is changing very rapidly. President Suharto told the Indonesian people in a television address today that there will be general elections as soon as possible and that he will not stand again. We call on the Government of Indonesia to ensure that the new elections are free and fair. Political reforms are needed that will do justice to the aspirations of the people of Indonesia. The tragic violence that we have witnessed over the past week must be stopped, before more innocent lives are claimed. We urge Indonesia to introduce the necessary changes quickly, so that calm and stability can be restored.

The British Government have been following developments in Indonesia closely over recent months. Ministers have made our concerns clear to the Indonesian authorities. I visited Jakarta in March, and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer was also in Indonesia at the beginning of this month. He took the opportunity then to underline the importance of political and economic reform. Together with our European Union partners, we issued a statement on 13 May calling on the authorities to exercise maximum restraint and to respect individual rights. That message has been conveyed to the Indonesian authorities through our embassy in Jakarta. I summoned the Indonesian ambassador on 13 May.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister took the opportunity of the G8 summit to discuss the situation in Indonesia. As the House knows, leaders called on the Government of Indonesia to refrain from using lethal force and to initiate political reform. We have stressed the importance of political and economic reform. The two are now essential to recovery in Indonesia. I am sure that the House will want to support the Government in calling for peaceful transition in Indonesia.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe): I am grateful to the Minister for the way in which he gave me advance notice of his statement. I join him in expressing deep sympathy with the family of the British citizen who was killed in Jakarta on 14 May. I express also my sympathy with the families of other nationals, including Indonesians, who have lost their lives in the tragic disturbances.

The Minister was right to thank the staff of our embassy in Jakarta and of British Airways. I would particularly like to associate myself with his tribute to Claire Hatton, the British Airways employee who kept her office open throughout the disturbances and helped some 2,000 people to leave the country.

I agree with the Minister on the importance of early, free and fair elections and of respecting human rights in Indonesia. Have the Government offered any assistance for the conduct of those elections? What consultations have the Government had with Indonesia's regional neighbours? In the light of events, does he think that the package of assistance offered by the International Monetary Fund and the World bank, and the terms on which it was offered, were well judged? What action, if any, have the Government taken to ensure that the assistance from those bodies is reviewed in the light of these events? Will the Government pay particular attention to the warnings given by the Government of Australia on these questions, to which I drew the attention of the Foreign Office some two months ago?

Finally, will the Minister comment on the Foreign Secretary's statement last week that none of the British-made vehicles used by the Indonesian Government has been exported since Labour came to power? Does he associate himself with the explanation of the Foreign Office spokesman that that statement was made during a compressed interview that made it difficult to go into the sort of depth that this complex issue requires, or will he be more forthcoming and simply say that the Foreign Secretary got it wrong again?

Mr. Fatchett: I thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman for his early remarks. He is right to express sympathy not only to UK nationals but to those of other countries caught up in these events. I share his congratulations and thanks to Claire Hatton, British Airways staff and embassy staff. We are grateful for all their work on behalf of UK citizens. I agree that we need early, fair elections in Indonesia. I am not optimistic that they will take place, but I agree that we should continue to push in that direction and to urge on the Indonesian Government a greater respect for human rights and a great improvement in their record.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman asked three specific questions. We have as yet had no request for assistance with elections, but if we were convinced that there would be free and fair elections in Indonesia, we would be willing to play a part, in the way in which Britain and the European Union have on other occasions. We have been in constant contact with Indonesia's regional neighbours. The right hon. and learned Gentleman knows that, as part of the EU presidency, I visited Indonesia's neighbours a few weeks ago, as did my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman asked about the IMF programme. I think that the worst possible sign that we could give to the Suharto regime, and the worst possible way of developing human rights and democracy in Indonesia, would be to give the impression that that programme is now negotiable. The programme is important, to lever in political and economic reform. Without that, there will be no accountability and transparency, and those are developments that we desperately need in Indonesia.

Finally, the right hon. and learned Gentleman referred to export licences. I am always impressed and intrigued by his brazen audacity at the Dispatch Box. It might be worth while reminding the House that no equipment used in recent events has been licensed since 1 May 1997. All the equipment used to which attention has been drawn was licensed by Conservative Members, and it is about time that that party took responsibility for what is happening in Indonesia.

Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): If a new Indonesian regime were to apply to the Government to freeze the assets of the Suharto family here, on the basis that those assets had been illegally transferred from Indonesia, would my hon. Friend look favourably on such an application?

Mr. Fatchett: My hon. Friend raises a number of hypothetical issues that may well become important as developments take place. I can say that we shall support the principle of accountability and transparency not merely in Indonesia, but here in the United Kingdom if that is relevant.

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park): Does not the Minister think it a bit rich to call on the Indonesian Government to refrain from using lethal force now, despite this Government's ethical foreign policy, which, frankly, has carried on the policy of the previous Government and that was repeating Baroness Chalker's mantra that arms should not be sold that could be used for internal repression? Does he realise that, tomorrow, when the student demonstration takes place, students are likely to be killed and maimed using British riot control agents, British nerve gases, British batons and British water cannon?

Mr. Fatchett: It is absolutely right to urge restraint on the Indonesian authorities. I do not think that any hon. Member would take a different view, and any movement towards democracy and respect for human rights in Indonesia would be a step in the right direction; we would all support that.

The hon. Lady seems not to have done her homework as she normally does. To aim her criticism at the Labour Benches rather than the Conservative Benches is a mistake on her part. I repeat that the water cannon, to take the example that she used, was equipment licensed under the previous Government. It is about time that the hon. Lady looked at what happened and clearly differentiated between the record of this Government and that of the previous Administration.

Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): What Baroness Chalker actually said was that once one sends weapons to a country such as Indonesia, one cannot possibly monitor their end use. Why did we not revoke the licences given by the previous Government when we had the opportunity to do so last year—when our policy states clearly that we will not sell arms for internal repression? It is true that the licences granted by the previous Government are responsible for the use of British-made water cannon on the streets in Indonesia against unarmed students as recently as April. Why, despite all the knowledge that we were propping up a rotten, corrupt regime, which was responsible for the most terrible human rights abuses, did we still not revoke those licences?

Since May last year, we have agreed another 56 licences for all sorts of military equipment which, in 18 or 24 months' time, might be used on the streets in Indonesia. It really is not good enough to say that we are not responsible for the equipment that is being used now, when, in 18 months' time, equipment that we have supplied may also be used against the very same people who are now fighting for democracy and human rights on those streets.

Mr. Fatchett: I very much respect my hon. Friend's views and know that she has a long-standing interest in Indonesia and developments there. She is absolutely right to make the differentiation she made in terms of licences. The new licence criteria that were introduced last July, despite Conservative opposition, are tougher, and it is now extremely difficult to imagine that the Labour Government would ever grant a licence for, for example, water cannon; that would simply not happen. My hon. Friend points the finger and lays the responsibility exactly where that responsibility rests.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is readily apparent, even from only watching newsreels, that the spectrum of demonstration and violence extends from students, protesting as students sometimes will, to criminal elements, who are frankly exploiting the situation; that that is something which we have seen in Europe, for example, in France in the 1960s; and that it is not simply an Indonesian phenomenon? Whatever President Suharto's shortcomings as a Westminster democrat may be, the record will show that, judged in the context of the country within which he operates, he has raised the condition of his people, and history might come to a slightly different judgment from the one being expressed here today. In short, is not the situation a great deal more complicated than many hon. Members and some commentators think?

Finally, it is the Minister's position that he had no choice but to go ahead with the export of particular types of equipment because the previous Conservative Government had granted a licence; but if he believes the material supplied by the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Ann Clwyd) and is now satisfied that the equipment was used in breach of the licence conditions, surely he could revoke the licence. That was the point he avoided when responding to the questions asked by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard).

Mr. Fatchett: I am surprised that there is one apologist for the Indonesian regime in the House, but if I had had to predict who it would be, I might well have pointed my finger at the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls). His defence of the Indonesian regime, despite its lack of democracy or respect for human rights, even brought embarrassment to his own Front Benchers.

Mr. Roger Berry (Kingswood): Does my hon. Friend agree that Conservative support for the military regime in Indonesia is a disgrace to the House, not least given the events in East Timor in recent decades and the current conflict within Indonesia itself? Does he further agree that we should condemn the previous Conservative Government for their policy of granting, willy-nilly, export licences for arms that are now being used against the Indonesian people? How is that policy to change under the present Government?

Mr. Fatchett: My hon. Friend is right to express his surprise at the support for the regime in Indonesia and the reluctance among Conservative Members to back the programme of political reform that is so desperately needed in that country. He is also right to make, yet again, the crucial differentiation between the records of the two Governments. The arms sales criteria that we introduced last July are tougher and have played out tougher in practice. My hon. Friend knows that, and I am grateful for his support. He will know that the hoo-hah about one issue that we have heard in recent weeks contrasts sharply with the Conservatives' support for arming Indonesia, despite its past record; that contrast will be very obvious to hon. Members and to the general public.

Mr. Alasdair Morgan (Galloway and Upper Nithsdale): The Minister referred to the need for political and economic reform in Indonesia. Does he agree that such reform must include self-determination for the people of East Timor? Will he undertake to continue to press for the implementation of United Nations resolutions in respect of East Timor?

Mr. Fatchett: As the hon. Gentleman knows, we have taken an initiative during our EU presidency on the issue of East Timor. That is why we sent EU troika ambassadors on a visit to East Timor and why we have continued to take an interest in East Timor. We share the broad aspirations that the hon. Gentleman set out in his question.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): My hon. Friend will be aware that some ethnic minorities in Indonesia are being singled out by the mob for special treatment. What help can the outside community give to people such as the ethnic Chinese, who are receiving no protection whatever from the police or security forces in that country?

Mr. Fatchett: My hon. Friend talks about one of the more alarming developments taking place in Indonesia. I think that all of us will express deep sympathy for the Chinese ethnic minority, which has made such an important contribution to development in Indonesia. It is important that, in whatever way possible, we offer protection to all those people, because they have an absolute right to live in Indonesia and an absolute right to have the contribution that they have made for years recognised and respected. We shall urge restraint and urge the Indonesian Government to give the fullest possible defence to those people.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): The House will have noted with approval that the Minister gave priority in his statement to ensuring the safety of British citizens in a situation that must have been dire for them and their families—witnessing the destruction, in many instances, of their livelihood and the way of life that they had established as expatriates in Indonesia. Is the Minister satisfied that the chartered jumbo jet and the scheduled services with airlines other than British Airways will be sufficient to transport out of Indonesia all British people who wish to accept his Department's wise advice to leave?

Is the Minister aware that, in situations of this kind that can deteriorate even more, the necessary form of military back-up should always be present, and in that connection, can he confirm to the House that his Department advised the strategic defence review that the Royal Air Force should have a heavy-lift capability?

Mr. Fatchett: I am very grateful for the first part of the hon. Gentleman's comments. Obviously, it is our primary responsibility to look after the security and well-being of British citizens, and we shall do our utmost to discharge that responsibility. I am confident that we can discharge that responsibility. I believe that the steps so far taken by the ambassador and his staff have worked very well toward that objective. I am confident that the new steps that we have announced and the advice that we shall give will ensure that every British citizen who wishes to leave Indonesia will have the opportunity to do so.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Is the Minister aware that those of us who were lucky enough to go to Indonesia 30-odd years ago are really dismayed by what has happened in the past 15 years, and by the way in which events have turned out? However, does he recognise that it may now be a Javanese problem rather than an Indonesian problem? What advice is being given to British citizens in Sumatra, Lombok, Flores, Sulawesi and Kalimantan, where circumstances may be entirely different, away from the Jakarta mob?

Mr. Fatchett: Our advice to all British citizens, in whatever part of Indonesia and on whatever island, is to leave. We still feel that that is the most appropriate advice, whether in Jakarta or one of the other islands; we are not differentiating between them. I believe that it would be risky for us to try to differentiate. The important thing is to get British citizens out if they so wish, and we wish them to come at this stage, for their safety.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): I am sure that the Minister appreciates that many people in this country are worried about the well-being and whereabouts of relations and friends in Indonesia. Is an information line available at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, which the public may contact to get such information?

Mr. Fatchett: There is, and we shall ensure that that information line is made available for the public, and for the use of Members if they wish to take up individual cases.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge): Will my hon. Friend assure the House that he will continue to insist on the importance of human rights and political democracy to Indonesian Ministers when he meets them, and is not that in sharp contrast to the policy of the previous Government, who did not think it necessary to mention those things?

Mr. Fatchett: My hon. Friend is right, and I believe that the tone of the questions this afternoon shows that to be very much the case. We have constantly talked about the need for political reform, accountability, transparency and a respect for human rights, and we shall continue to do so. I do not think that we shall hear from the Labour Benches any support for Suharto, the regime in Indonesia and the mistakes that have been made over the years. I believe that that contrast will be widely understood and respected.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): Perhaps the Minister will think again about the advice that he gave his hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). There are 13,000 islands in Indonesia, so to suggest that everyone is at the same risk is surely incorrect. Will he also comment on the G8 suggestion that the Indonesian regime should use non-lethal force? Is the Minister saying that water cannon should be used to control the rioters? Clearly, the vast majority of those who died did so because rioters set fire to shops and suchlike.

Mr. Fatchett: I repeat the point that I made to my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell): we advise all British citizens to get out of Indonesia, wherever they are. We see that as the best advice to offer.

The hon. Gentleman referred to water cannon, which many people would see as lethal equipment. If the Government were faced with a licence application for similar equipment to be exported to Indonesia, I do not expect that we, unlike the previous regime, would agree to it.

Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston): Will the Minister confirm that the Labour Government refused to permit the export of machine guns and tear gas to Indonesia?

Mr. Fatchett: The answer is yes. That is part of the policy that we have adopted over the past 12 months.

Mr. Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East): Does my hon. Friend recognise that many non-governmental organisations have highlighted the situation in the rural areas of Indonesia? We have all seen what has happened in Jakarta this week, but many people in rural areas are starving as a direct result of Indonesian Government policy. Will my hon. Friend make representations that go beyond what is happening in Jakarta and which touch on abuse of human rights in the rural areas?

Mr. Fatchett: My hon. Friend makes an important point. When I was in Jakarta a few weeks ago, one of my concerns—it was also expressed to me by others—was the fact that Indonesia may be unable, because of changes in its infrastructure, to deliver enough food to people in the outlying islands. There may be a state of near famine in many of those islands, and the international community must address that issue with some urgency.

Concessionary Travel Schemes (Scotland)

3.56 pm

Mr. Alasdair Morgan (Galloway and Upper Nithsdale): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to require Scottish local authorities to make reciprocal arrangements for the operation of bus and rail concessionary travel schemes for visually impaired and blind people within their areas; and for connected purposes.

Because of local government reorganisation under the previous Administration, there are 32 separate travel schemes for blind people in Scotland. Most of those independent schemes offer free or concessionary schemes to registered blind residents. However, the anomaly lies in the fact that the schemes are not co-ordinated or interchangeable across local authority boundaries.

To put it simply, blind or visually impaired people can travel at a concessionary rate within their own local authority areas, but when they travel outside those boundaries, there is no guarantee that they will receive their customary benefits. The only substantial impediment to geographical equality is that there is no statutory requirement on local authorities to provide schemes similar to those enjoyed by their own residents for non-residents who visit their areas.

My Bill would require Scottish local authorities to establish reciprocal agreements to extend their schemes to blind and visually impaired people who visit their areas. That would create equality and consistency across Scotland for all registered blind and visually impaired citizens. The scheme would extend to all bus and rail transport in Scotland.

For many years, the National Federation of the Blind has highlighted the need for a co-ordinated scheme, and it recently met the Scottish Office and the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities to press for action. Despite broadly favourable responses from both, there has been no concerted effort to implement the principles of such a scheme. My Bill offers the opportunity to establish a fair and workable scheme that will end a glaring omission from the Disability Discrimination Act 1995, which required local authorities to plan only for their own blind residents. The Bill should not impose any significant additional financial burden on local authorities, and it would be jointly administered by the Scottish Office and COSLA.

There are more than 30,000 registered blind people in Scotland, of whom 9,000 are partially sighted. More than 85 per cent. of those people are over the age of 60, and many are unable to travel unattended, so it is important for them that their companion can travel with them. Therefore, I propose that the basic provisions of the Bill should be extended to include a companion card scheme, which is currently operated in 23 local authority areas, to assist the stress-free movement of the blind and visually impaired throughout Scotland.

To put the proposal in a broader context, there are many worthwhile examples of similar schemes throughout Europe. The best example of workable schemes lies across the Irish sea. Both the Republic of Ireland and Northern Ireland operate free concessionary travel schemes throughout the country to all registered blind and visually impaired people. Those schemes have been in operation for several years without significant problems, and have been warmly welcomed by blind and visually impaired residents of those countries.

Concessionary travel schemes are available throughout the public transport network to registered blind people in Belgium, Finland, Germany, Greece, Luxembourg, Spain, Sweden and Switzerland. In addition, free companion travel schemes are available to blind people who purchase a ticket for travel in Denmark, France, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands and Switzerland. International travel has been made significantly easier through the Voyager Plus programme, whereby a blind person purchasing a first or second-class ticket for travel to more than 20 European countries is automatically entitled to a free companion ticket. If we can learn from our European partners, we, too, can have a national scheme of which to be proud.

I recognise Scotland's long tradition of concessionary travel, dating back to 1922 in Edinburgh and following on to other cities. I also recognise the contribution made by all parties to the development of such schemes in their local council areas. The points that I am making are clearly not party political, as is demonstrated by the cross-party support for a number of early-day motions on the issue and the cross-party sponsorship of the Bill.

As we contemplate the new millennium, I see such a national scheme as a timely reminder of the importance of our community values and as an encouragement to use and enhance our public transport network. It is certainly an area where the Scottish Parliament can move forward, if this House fails to respond to the needs of blind and visually impaired people across Scotland. The proposal could lead the way for the adoption of similar schemes in the other nations of the United Kingdom, as is demonstrated by the support of English and Welsh Members for my Bill.

It is encouraging that COSLA and the Scottish Office have expressed their support for such a scheme, but unfortunately little progress has thus far been achieved. Clearly, the Minister for Home Affairs and Devolution, Scottish Office supports the principles of my Bill, as he has stated:

"This Government is very much committed to partnership and we want transport operators to help us address social exclusion from transport services which still affects many blind people. I am calling on them to introduce a free concessionary travel scheme which will go some way to helping blind people enjoy a better quality of life."

However, words are not enough. The Bill offers a route for action.

I understand that the Scottish Office is to publish

"the Integrated Transport White Paper in the summer. This will be the most significant single event in postwar Scottish Transport."

I hope that the Scottish Office will seriously consider integrating the principles of my Bill in order to engender consistency and equality across Scotland. It is a small but important step towards making travel for the blind and visually impaired more accessible and less stressful. I am encouraged by the cross-party support for this important measure.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Alasdair Morgan, Mrs. Margaret Ewing, Mr. Donald Gorrie, Mr. Peter Bottomley, Mr. Dafydd Wigley, Mr. John McAllion, Mr. John Swinney and Mr. Michael Moore.

CONCESSIONARY TRAVEL SCHEMES (SCOTLAND)

Mr. Alasdair Morgan accordingly presented a Bill to require Scottish local authorities to make reciprocal arrangements for the operation of bus and rail concessionary travel schemes for visually impaired and blind people within their areas; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 3 July, and to be printed [Bill 191].

Written Questions

4.4 pm

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I am sorry to trouble you again with a matter that I raised yesterday regarding the answering of written questions. I said yesterday that Ministers continue to abuse the system of named days by failing to answer questions on the day that is named. I received an answer to a question yesterday, which appears at column 260 of Hansard. Madam Speaker, I know that you are not responsible for answers given in this place, but the answer provided bears absolutely no relation to the question that I asked concerning an important matter. Will you issue an instruction to Ministers through the Leader of the House that they must try to answer the questions that are asked and do so on the day that answers are due?

Madam Speaker: As the hon. Gentleman points out, answers to questions are not my responsibility. I know that he has raised this matter before. He might put his question directly to the President of the Council when she deals with business questions. I cannot commit myself, but I shall try to look his way at the appropriate time.

Orders of the Day

Scotland Bill

[3RD ALLOTTED DAY]

As amended (in the Committee), further considered.

Clause 34

STAGES OF BILLS

4.5 pm

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes): I beg to move amendment No. 7, in page 16, line 35, leave out from beginning to end of line 7 on page 17 and insert—

'.—(1) Each Bill considered by the Parliament shall comprise the following stages—

(a) a general debate and vote on the principles of the Bill;

(b) a committee stage for members of the Parliament to consider and vote on the detail of the bill and for interested bodies to make representations to the Parliament;

(c) a further stage for interested bodies to make representations to the Parliament;

(d) a report stage to consider any amendments subsequent to the committee stage in subsection (1)(b) and the further stage for representations in subsection (1)(c);

(e) a final debate and vote on the Bill at which the Parliament can either pass or reject it.

(2) A period of not less than three calendar months shall separate the stages of the Bill mentioned in subsections (1)(b) and (1)(d) unless otherwise provided for by a resolution supported by the votes of not less than two-thirds of the total number of seats for members of the Parliament.'.

As we near the end of this long road, we must feel rather like those in history who embarked on long marches. I hope that we can deal today with those matters that have not been covered since we began this process on 12 January. Amendment No. 7 is designed to fill what we believe is a serious gap in the provisions of the legislation. I suspect that the Minister will say that the procedures of the Scottish Parliament are a matter for that Parliament and for the committee that is advising him. I simply remind him that the Bill—rather unusually at this stage—requires the Standing Orders to contain certain provisions. We think that that is right: the House should have an overview of the general way in which the Scottish Parliament will operate.

Clause 34, which I am seeking to amend, already includes provisions governing the stages through which legislation must pass in the Scottish Parliament. My amendment is before the House because we believe that those provisions are inadequate in very specific and important ways. The amendment seeks to address the fact that the Scottish Parliament is unicameral.

When the Bill leaves the House today, it will go to another place where the noble lords will examine our work closely and, for all I know, may ask the House to think again about certain measures that have been passed. That is right, because that is the proper role of a scrutinising Chamber. The ability to require the main House of Parliament to reconsider legislation that may be inadequate, badly drafted or fundamentally wrong is an important safeguard within our constitution.

That facility does not exist for the Scottish Parliament. According to the Bill, legislation will pass through the stages set out in clause 34. Subsection (1)(a) essentially provides for a Second Reading debate, subsection (1)(b) provides for a Committee stage and subsection (1)(c) provides for a Third Reading.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): I am following the right hon. Gentleman's argument quite closely. He seems to be cutting across the purpose of the consultative group that is examining those aspects, which includes Conservative representatives and the Minister of State as chairman. Why is the right hon. Gentleman cutting across his own party in Scotland, which is attempting to agree those matters, by trying to be so prescriptive in this place?

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman may not have been listening when I said that I expected that to be the answer given to me by the Minister. The hon. Gentleman should look at clause 34, which already does precisely that. I merely think that it does it inadequately, so it is important that we point out the inadequacy.

Report stages, let alone a second chamber, are missing from the Bill. Report is a useful stage for legislation. Hon. Members should look at the amendment papers for last Tuesday and for today: the vast majority of amendments are Government amendments to areas that they failed to get right when the Bill was drafted or failed to adjust sufficiently in Committee. They have an enormous amount of revising work to do on their own Bill on Report.

When the Bill reaches the House of Lords, even more Government amendments may be tabled. I make no complaint about that, because a procedure that takes a Bill through Parliament in such a way that faults can be cured before it reaches the statute book and becomes law is an important protection of the quality of legislation.

If such omissions occur during those three stages when a Bill goes through the Scottish Parliament, however, there will be no way to correct them, other than by amending the original primary legislation through further primary legislation. That cannot be satisfactory, from anyone's point of view. The only people who might find pleasure in such a situation are in my old profession, the law, which lives on the mistakes made by Governments and omissions in legislation. That is the basis on which they can earn a good living, but we must try to ensure that such a situation does not arise.

In my view, there is no case for a second chamber in the Scottish context. We would all agree that, if anything, there is too much politics and that there will be all sorts of layers of politicians in Scotland. To create yet another layer would not meet with the approval of the Scottish people, whatever form it might take and whatever its context and powers. We considered whether, in terms of the Scottish Grand Committee, which is exclusive to Scottish MPs, there might be a role for Scottish Members of Parliament elected to this place by the Scottish electorate, but we decided that that might be difficult and cumbersome. The amendment is simple: it would add two further stages to the three in the Bill.

The first stage would be a period of reflection and consideration. When Committee consideration—the stage described in clause 34(1)(b)—had been completed, legislators could reflect on the nature of the legislation for three calendar months. More important, those concerned with the legislation's effect and those with an interest in its working properly would have a chance to make representations and suggestions to the Scottish Parliament which could be taken into account before the Bill completed all its stages. The second stage would be Report. Following the period of reflection and the making of representations, the Parliament would have the chance to table or to consider amendments reflecting such representations and, indeed, to press for some reconsideration by the Administration.

The amendment would not tie the hands of the Scottish Parliament; we are making more sense of something that is deficient. Although the Minister's record in acceding to amendments has not been good, we have tabled the amendment in the hope that he will realise the sense of it and accept it. It is in the interests of everyone in Scotland that the Parliament produces quality law.

Perhaps I should declare an interest. Although I have not practised since 1979, I am a Scottish advocate who admires the Scottish legal system and who often boasts about the quality of Scottish law. It would be sad if devolution resulted in less considered laws being passed, because that would lead to a diminution in the quality of Scots law. For that reason and to give a greater say to bodies in Scotland that might have an interest in the legislation, I commend the amendment.

4.15 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): The process would not be difficult and cumbersome, as the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) would have it. It would be politically impossible, and we must rule out straight away any idea that the Scottish Grand Committee or anything like it could possibly be a revising body, because that would lead to all sorts of political difficulties and frictions. It is not clever either to suggest a body that is equivalent to the House of Lords. I do not know what it would be called—possibly the House of Thanes. That is out. However, there is a real problem and it would be much more satisfactory to have some kind of revising mechanism.

I have a question for the Government. We read about a new body called the council of the isles. I do not know what substance there is in that or the form that such a body would take. Is it envisaged anywhere, as has been suggested in some sections of the press, that that council could take the place in the legislative process of the House of Lords? The answer may be no, but I should like to have an answer.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): The amendment's motives are no doubt well intentioned. They are to try to ensure that the laws that are passed by the Scottish Parliament are understandable and effective. Like the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram), I declare an interest as I am a member of the Faculty of Advocates. However, I am not sure that legislation is necessarily the greatest jewel in the crown of Scots law. I am sure that there are many ways in which we could improve our law making. We could try to frame our legislation in language that is much more readily understood by lay people. I hope that the Scottish Parliament will address that.

My objection to the amendment is that it is far too prescriptive. I acknowledge that provisions in clause 34 have to be included in Standing Orders, but the amendment goes too far and would tie the Parliament's hands and, in the meantime, those of the consultative steering group. That group could do much imaginative work about how legislation should be treated, not least by pre-legislative Committees, which are completely missing from the Bill.

All of us who were involved in the constitutional convention and in discussions in the constitutional steering group, most recently yesterday, agree that there should be proper, widespread consultation before Bills are laid before the Scottish Parliament. That would go a long way towards giving the reassurances that were sought by the right hon. Member for Devizes. Legislation should address the needs that have prompted it. I fear that some of the time scales could be unrealistic, although there is a let-out clause for a two-thirds vote.

I hope that the Scottish Parliament will not be hidebound by a requirement to pass all its legislation in one year. There should be provision for rollover into the following year if that makes sense. That, in itself, would provide further opportunities for consultation. The consultative steering group and the Parliament should not be tied by the type of structures that are employed in this Parliament. They may work well here, but we are starting with a clean sheet and we should be allowed to engage in some lateral thinking to see how things could be done differently and, I hope, better. I oppose the amendment.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield): The difficulty that has been faced throughout this legislation is that there is a desire to give Scotland the maximum devolved government within the ambit of the Bill, but it is a devolved Parliament, and the buck will stop back in this place, which is one of the problems that the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) has touched on frequently during our debates. Therefore, the difficulty that we face is the extent to which we should try to go into the procedure of the Parliament to ensure that it works properly.

The amendment is a good one because it does not stray so far into procedure. That is not a matter which can be left solely to the Scottish Parliament. It is essential, if we have a unicameral Parliament in Scotland, that there should be procedure for proper scrutiny, so that, if complaints arise, we can at least say, "There is a perfectly clear system for dealing with this in Edinburgh. Don't come bleating to us about it. The system is there and the scrutiny has properly taken place."

Mr. John Swinney (North Tayside): I do not feel that the hon. Gentleman has learnt many of the lessons of the referendum. People in Scotland voted for a particular type of Parliament, as set out in the White Paper, and that Parliament should be allowed to take its decisions. If the Conservatives had reflected more on the feeling in Scotland and the demand in the referendum for a Parliament of the nature that is being established, the problems that he says the Parliament is incapable of addressing of its own free will would not arise. It seems a rather supremacist attitude.

Mr. Grieve: I think that the hon. Gentleman has misunderstood the point that I am making. What is more extraordinary, he has misunderstood his party's position in the referendum. It backed a devolved Parliament. It did not back a sovereign Parliament. As Ministers have said on countless occasions, the Parliament is devolved and residual responsibilities will remain here. I believe that they will remain here in practice. When complaints arise, they will still be ventilated in this place, although how we are ever going to deal with them, I do not know. It is certainly not a supremacist attitude.

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): Will the hon. Gentleman explain to me, as I am a bit slow on the uptake, where it says in the Bill that the way in which the Scottish Parliament conducts its business is a reserved matter for Westminster?

Mr. Grieve: The way in which the Scottish Parliament conducts its business is not a reserved matter. If badly drafted legislation goes through the Scottish Parliament, and there are complaints about it which are brought back to this place, that will be a matter for us. It is bound to be a matter for us; that is one of the central difficulties of this whole legislation.

Mr. Salmond: Can the hon. Gentleman, as a relatively new Member, think of any badly drafted legislation that has gone through this place—pioneered by the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram), in the case of the poll tax legislation—and through exactly the processes that he is trying to impose on the Scottish Parliament?

Mr. Grieve: I cannot think of any in the past 12 months. I can certainly think of stacks of badly drafted statutory instruments that have gone through the House. I have to look at them once a week. There is much bad legislation being passed. That is not a reason why we should not try to set up systems for Edinburgh that are workable. The matter is of particular importance because it is going to be a unicameral assembly.

Mr. Wallace: The hon. Gentleman said that if legislation that is passed in Edinburgh is bad and does not work, it will have to be tidied up or brought back to the House. By what mechanism does he see that happening?

Mr. Grieve: I did not say that. If the hon. and learned Gentleman had listened, he would have realised that that was not what I said. I said that if bad legislation is passed, the fact that sovereignty is remaining with this Parliament will, by implication, lead to problems that arise in Scotland being brought back to this Chamber. They will be raised in the House by Members of Parliament for Scottish constituencies. The matter simply will not go away, and I wish to minimise any adverse consequences. The best way of doing that, if it is necessary to do so, is for hon. Members to be satisfied, when we devolve power to Edinburgh, that the scrutiny system is such that we are wholly happy with it—which is the purpose of clause 34 and amendment No. 7.

The Minister for Home Affairs and Devolution, Scottish Office (Mr. Henry McLeish): I shall attempt to be helpful. In devolved matters within the legislative competence of the Scottish Parliament, the Parliament will be in a position to make good or bad legislation. In my judgment, it will be good legislation. There will be an opportunity to interface with Westminster only when there is an issue of vires or of, for example, Scots law impinging on reserved matters. Otherwise, hon. Members will have no locus in the Scottish Parliament's deliberations on legislation in devolved matters.

Mr. Grieve: I am grateful to the Minister for teaching me, as a new hon. Member, to suck eggs. However, we have been discussing the point dealt with in the amendment throughout the passage of the Bill. I appreciate what the Minister is saying—that that is how the system should work. Nevertheless, if there is a problem in Edinburgh with badly drafted legislation, or with a range of other issues, I do not share his confidence that, in practice, those matters will not resurface in this place.

As I wish for such consequences to be minimised, and as I think that amendment No. 7 is innocuous in establishing a procedure that the House could broadly agree with, I commend it to the House. The amendment is not straying too far down the road of fettering procedure, but simply acknowledges the fact that the Edinburgh Parliament will have competence on a range of devolved issues and that it will be unicameral. Therefore, it is desirable that, from the outset, there should be a clear set of guidelines on the consideration of legislation, so that that issue should not thereafter be a contentious one, either within the Edinburgh Parliament, or between the Edinburgh Parliament and this place. That is the purpose of amendment No. 7, which is why the Minister should pay attention to it.

Mr. Salmond: I can describe the speech by the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) only as an "us and them" speech, about what us in this place should prescribe for them in the Scottish Parliament. Perhaps, after the advice of the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), I should be speaking as a thane of Buchan.

The Conservative party is in a state of political schizophrenia. Although there is no cure for schizophrenia, and it is very difficult to diagnose, I have been able to diagnose it in the Conservative party. When I speak to Conservatives in Scotland—in, for example, the Minister's consultative committee—they are enthusiastic, or say that they are, about developing new processes for the new Scottish Parliament, to try to do rather better and to pass less bad legislation than this place has done in the past 20 years or so. However, Conservative Members here seem to have absolutely no awareness of the arguments that have been accepted, and in some cases promulgated, by the Conservative party in Scotland.

Mr. Ancram rose—

Mr. Salmond: I give way to the man who piloted through the poll tax.

Mr. Ancram: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. He likes polishing that cherry from time to time, but it is getting fairly rotten and will not last much longer. Earlier, I told him that he was not listening to what was said. He is also not reading what is on the amendment paper. He keeps saying that we are proposing the procedures of this place for the Scottish Parliament. If he can tell me where in our procedures there is mention of a three-month period between Committee stage and Report stage, during which interested parties—such as trades unions and businesses—can make representations on legislation, I should be interested to hear it. Such a period is a new idea, which I believe is worthy of consideration for the Scottish Parliament. I am surprised that, whenever any proposal is made by the Conservative party, the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) seems to become blind and deaf, but, unfortunately, not dumb.

Mr. Salmond: Definitely not dumb; and I am not foolish enough to believe that the poll tax will disappear from the public memory in Scotland as quickly as the right hon. Gentleman hopes. He has missed the point entirely. The point is not whether his ideas in amendment No. 7 are good or bad. The point is that it is not properly the province of this place to dictate any ideas on procedure to the new Scottish Parliament. A steering group, on which the Conservative party is represented, is debating such things.

Mr. Ancram: The provisions are in the Bill.

Mr. Salmond: The provisions are in the Bill in outline form—precisely because the Minister of State is keenly awaiting ideas from the steering group that he has established. The last thing that he needs is to be pre-empted by these foolish and rather ill-thought-through amendments tabled by the Conservative party in this place.

The Minister is anxious to get to his feet, so I shall provide just one example to illustrate my point—not that of the poll tax, but of electricity privatisation. In 1988, I served on the Select Committee—which had a Tory majority—that appealed to Lord Parkinson, the then Secretary of State for Energy, and to Sir Malcolm Rifkind, the then Secretary of State for Scotland, to delay legislation on electricity privatisation to allow an investigative committee to consider the issue. Both Secretaries of State declined that invitation, and, as a result, what the Committee described as "spatchcock legislation" was passed.

The Minister of State has described a framework, and we should support him. We should allow his consultative group to do its work, and not attempt to wreck it with such foolish amendments.

4.30 pm

Mr. McLeish: I shall respond first to my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), who asked about the council of the isles as a revising chamber. I am not aware of any proposal that the council of the isles should act as a revising chamber instead of the House of Lords.

Although I acknowledge the unicameral nature of the Scottish Parliament and therefore see some of the sense behind the issues proposed by the Opposition Front-Bench team, the Government believe that amendment No. 7 intrudes too far into the legislative processes of the Scottish Parliament. That point has been echoed in the debate.

The amendment would impose requirements that could prove burdensome and unnecessary. It would require all Bills, no matter what their content, to be subject to at least three months of public consultation in the middle of their passage through the Scottish Parliament, unless two thirds of the Parliament voted to provide otherwise. By introducing further stages of detailed scrutiny, it could cause an unacceptable delay in the passage of Bills.

Ultimately, it is for the Parliament to decide on its procedures, including arrangements for the scrutiny of legislation. None the less, the Bill requires the Standing Orders of the Parliament to make provision for three stages of parliamentary scrutiny. These are, first, a general debate on a Bill, with an opportunity for Members to vote on its general principles; secondly, consideration of, and opportunity to vote on, the details of the Bill; and, thirdly, a final stage at which the Bill may be passed or rejected. Those are the minimum stages which must be prescribed in the Bill. Further details should be left for the Scottish Parliament to decide.

The White Paper explains that the Government expect Committees to play an important part in carrying out parliamentary business, and the Scottish Parliament will have power to establish such Committees as it considers appropriate. Ultimately, it will be for the Parliament to decide precisely what role Committees should perform, but we envisage that they could be involved in considering proposals for legislation before the formal legislative process has begun, including, in appropriate circumstances, taking evidence before a Bill is prepared. Their task will be to scrutinise and amend all proposals before the Parliament. Such a role will mean that the Scottish Executive's legislative and other proposals will be appropriately scrutinised before they are enacted.

The all-party consultative steering group on the Scottish Parliament, which has been alluded to, agreed at its first meeting that arrangements for pre-legislative scrutiny should be introduced. The exact form that that might take will be considered carefully in the coming months. With cross-party agreement on the principle of pre-legislative scrutiny, amendment No. 7 becomes redundant. Pre-legislative scrutiny involving interested parties will result in the emergence of a greater consensus on legislation before it is introduced. Therefore, the need for a period of public consultation in the middle of the progress of a Bill through Parliament, as proposed, will not be necessary.

It is useful to stress the work that is being done by the consultative steering group, which involves representatives of all parties, who are all making an excellent contribution. They are aware of the unicameral nature of the Scottish Parliament. They are keen to achieve consensus on legislation. Indeed, they are keen to improve radically on the Westminster model, which is important.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): Can the Minister name any genuine Parliament in the world that does not have a true revising chamber?

Mr. McLeish: I can furnish the hon. Gentleman with details on that question. We are not talking about the nature of a unicameral Parliament per se. We are talking about the right of the Scottish Parliament to decide on its legislative scrutiny and process.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex): It is inadequate.

Mr. McLeish: We hear from a sedentary position that that is inadequate. The model that the Scottish Parliament will adopt will be a huge improvement on the Westminster model. It will involve people and experts, it will aim for consensus and it will ensure that we have the best possible legislation. I ask the House to reject the amendment.

Mr. Ancram: The Minister has answered my point in his own way. He said that there will be pre-legislative scrutiny in the Scottish Parliament. If ever legislation has had pre-legislative scrutiny, it is this Bill. There was a detailed White Paper last summer, a referendum campaign during which the proposals were discussed at length, and a three-month period before the Bill was produced, yet amendment after amendment has been tabled by the Government on Report. If this were a Bill in the Scottish Parliament, it would be too late and there would have to be further legislation. The amendment is much needed, and I ask my hon. Friends to support it.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Mr. McLeish: I beg to move amendment No. 46, in page 20, line 8, at end insert—

'( ) The First Minister shall not seek Her Majesty's approval for any appointment under this section without the agreement of the Parliament.'.

Amendment No. 46 fulfils the commitment that I gave in Committee to my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Connarty), and will provide a role for the Parliament in the appointment of junior Scottish Ministers. That will bring the appointment procedure for junior Ministers into line with that for other Scottish Ministers.

The Bill requires the Parliament to nominate the First Minister, who will be appointed by the Queen on the recommendation of the Presiding Officer. The First Minister will have to obtain the agreement of the Parliament and the approval of Her Majesty before appointing Scottish Ministers, and the amendment provides a similar role for the Parliament in the appointment of junior Scottish Ministers.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 47

THE CIVIL SERVICE

Mr. McLeish: I beg to move amendment No. 133, in page 20, line 18, leave out from 'appoint' to end of line 19 and insert

'persons to be members of the staff of the Scottish Administration'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 134 to 136, 146, 235 to 241, 246, 250, 252 to 255, 213, 216 and 217.

Mr. McLeish: The amendments are technical and clarifying—I shall explain them as quickly as possible, as I know that the House has yet to consider other important groups.

Government amendment No. 213 clarifies what is meant by the term "Scottish Administration". Government amendments Nos. 134, 146, 236, 238, 239, 189, 199, 216, 217 and 245 are consequential. The Scottish Administration is an umbrella concept to describe what is, in effect, Her Majesty's Government in Scotland in relation to matters that are not reserved. It is important that the definition is clear—Government amendment No. 213 puts beyond any doubt who belongs to the Scottish Administration.

The Scottish Administration is defined as the office holders in the Scottish Administration and their staff. Office holders in the Scottish Administration are defined as members of the Scottish Executive—that is the First Minister, the Scottish Ministers and the Law Officers—junior Scottish Ministers and holders of non-ministerial offices. Non-ministerial offices are defined as the Registrar-General of Births, Deaths and Marriages for Scotland, the Keeper of the Registers of Scotland, the Keeper of the Records of Scotland and other offices where the holders exercise functions that are conferred by an enactment and who are appointed by a member of the Scottish Executive—for example, the Accountant in Bankruptcy.

The definition of the Scottish Administration can be changed by an Order in Council, which will be subject to parliamentary control by this Parliament and the Scottish Parliament, to take account of any future developments. I urge hon. Members to support these technical but necessary amendments.

Government amendments Nos. 133 and 134 are designed to clarify the Government's policy that staff serving the Scottish Administration will be members of a unified home civil service. Amendment No. 133 makes it clear that Scottish Ministers may appoint not only staff in the Scottish Executive, but other staff of the Scottish Administration. Amendment No. 134 specifies that such staff and non-ministerial office holders of the Scottish Administration will be members of the home civil service.

Government amendment No. 135 is a technical amendment to ensure that Scottish Ministers have the same delegated powers as Ministers of the Crown to deal with superannuation schemes affecting staff of the Scottish Administration. Government amendment No. 136 avoids ambiguity by making it clear that the Act referred to in clause 47(8) is the Civil Service (Management Functions) Act 1992.

Government amendments Nos. 237, 240, 241, 246, 250 and 253 to 255 constitute a technical group designed to ensure that redundant references to Treasury consent and the Secretary of State are removed, and that appropriate powers are transferred to the First Minister and Scottish Ministers.

Government amendments Nos. 240 and 241 clarify that the Secretary of State for Scotland's statutory power to appoint the Keeper of the Records, the Keeper of the Registers and the Registrar-General will transfer to Scottish Ministers. Government amendment No. 246 removes a function of the Secretary of State in relation to schools inspectors that will transfer by administrative action to the First Minister. Government amendment No. 250 clarifies that the Scottish Ministers will appoint the Accountant in Bankruptcy. Government amendment No. 252 makes similar changes in connection with the provision of prison staff.

Government amendments Nos. 253 to 255 are technical amendments to the list of repeals in schedule 8. They are related to the amendments made in schedule 7.

Mr. Jenkin: This group of amendments underlines how fantastically complicated it is to define a civil servant in the Scottish context and to specify which members of staff, who may ultimately be answerable to the Scottish Executive, count as members of the home civil service. Will the Minister say whether the definition of the home civil service is being expanded?

While the hon. Gentleman is thinking about that—it may require some thought—will he also bear in mind the fact that, because this huge raft of amendments, which underlines the scale of the undertaking, has been brought forward at such a late stage, the House will not have the opportunity to consider them in much detail? We shall have to rely on the second Chamber to ensure that the amendments are appropriate. I have a sneaking suspicion that the Government may yet table one or two more amendments—indeed, there may be tens or hundreds of them. There will be pages and pages of changes to the Bill, which we have not been able to perfect in the House of Commons.

Mr. Donald Gorrie (Edinburgh, West): Will the Scottish Parliament be able to introduce a more open ethos in the Scottish civil service than the one that conventionally obtains in the United Kingdom civil service? There has been much talk of the Scottish Parliament operating in a new way and being more open and consensual, so civil servants may have to respond differently. Will the Minister assure the House that they will be able to do so while continuing to be members of the United Kingdom civil service?

Mr. Dalyell: I am not alone in thinking that there is a real problem. Both Sir John Garlick and Sir Michael Quinlan, the civil servants who were brought in last time when such matters were dealt with by the Cabinet Office, expressed their concern at various academic seminars in the 1980s—I suspect that the problem remains—about not only the unity of the British civil service, but who will be the "master" of these civil servants. It is very far from clear whether crucial civil servant appointments will be made by the Cabinet Secretary of the day, the head of the home civil service or the Scottish Executive. I ask for some comment on that.

I do not know whether this is the right opportunity to ask this, but how many junior Ministers will there be, and what will they be paid? Will they be paid along Westminster lines, or is there another idea for payment?

Mr. McLeish: As the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) said, the Bill is extraordinarily complex—that has become obvious during the eight days in Committee and the three days on Report. However, I think that it is substantially well worked out. As we are talking about civil servants, I should say that they have made an extraordinary contribution of the highest quality to achieve what I believe is our success in moving in 53 weeks from the general election to, I hope, the Bill's Third Reading.

On the specific question posed by the hon. Member for North Essex, the base of the home civil service will not be extended. The matter is being dealt with entirely by transfer from the Scottish Office to the Scottish Executive.

[Mr. McLeish]

On openness, I stress that people who serve the Government are often much maligned. Our experience in government has shown us that openness is not an issue. I believe that there is a consistency of provision throughout the United Kingdom. I have no doubt that, whether the operation is in Scotland, England, Wales or Northern Ireland, we receive a high-quality response. I believe that the civil service will embrace and make an excellent contribution to the new politics in Scotland.

My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) asked about junior Ministers' pay. The Senior Salaries Review Body must deal with that. We want to generate confidence in Scotland in what we are doing on pay, pensions and conditions.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State asked the SSRB to provide guidance, on the basis of its excellent knowledge, on salaries, pensions and conditions for Members of the Scottish Parliament and, indeed, the Scottish Executive. That is absolutely right, because we want to start off on the right footing. I remember the unedifying sight of Members scurrying through the Lobby here to vote on pay rises, conditions and allowances.

With the SSRB report, I hope that my right hon. Friend will be in a position to make judgments for the Scottish Parliament, and that it will proceed quickly to fill in the detail of what is required for the future. There needs to be some objectivity in relation to sensitive issues that can be misconstrued, so Holyrood should not be involved in some of the decisions.

There are often complaints about the number of Government amendments tabled at a late stage, on Report. The complexity of the legislation meant that we could not get the detail right any sooner, but we have made a comprehensive response on the question of the Scottish Administration and its staff. We believe that we have got it right. Although time must tell, we know that there is an excellent civil service in place, and that it will serve the Scottish Parliament well.

Mr. Dalyell: There is a critical question as to who makes the decisions. Is it to be an organisation based in Scotland, with its own chief executive, or is it to be the head of the home civil service in London?

Mr. McLeish: The Scottish Executive will be responsible for appointments. That is a reasonable demarcation of responsibilities. What is good and unifying about our approach is that there is a home-based civil service throughout the United Kingdom. That is good for Westminster, for Scotland, and, indeed, for civil servants.

Mr. Grieve: The Minister slightly sidestepped the question about possible changes in the civil service ethos. It was suggested that the ethos in Edinburgh might be different from that in London. If there is a unified home civil service with central control—even if civil servants are working with different masters—there can be no room for a different ethos, because everyone will have to follow the guidelines laid down by the central civil service in London.

Mr. McLeish: That proposition is premised on the assumption that we need to change the ethos. After my first year as a Scottish Office Minister, I am not entirely convinced that that is so. There is a pejorative aspect to the talk of ethos, suggesting that something is substantially wrong, and I do not accept that. No matter where civil servants are working, I am convinced that we will get the same quality of active advice and thorough professionalism.

Mr. McLeish: I beg to move amendment No. 147, in page 26, leave out lines 31 to 32 and insert—

'( ) The Fund shall be held with the Paymaster General.'

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 272, 148, 273 to 279 and 281.

Mr. McLeish: In Committee, I said that I would consider carefully the points made by the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (Mr. Davis), the Chairman of the Public Accounts Commission, with a view to tabling amendments designed to strengthen the independence of the head of the audit service of the Scottish Parliament, and to provide for the appointment of accounting officers in the Scottish Administration. I hope that amendments Nos. 273, 274 and 278 will fulfil that undertaking.

Amendment No. 273 provides that the independent person who is to undertake, or supervise the undertaking of, audit and related functions will be the Auditor General for Scotland, established by amendment No. 278, which also provides that the Auditor General will be appointed by Her Majesty on the nomination of the Scottish Parliament, and that he or she can be removed from office by her Majesty only after a resolution of the Parliament. Taken together with the existing provision in clause 66(4), these proposals ensure considerable independence and status for the audit service, and provide that its head cannot simply be removed by the Executive.

The second part of amendment No. 274 deals with accounting officers. It provides that Scottish legislation must provide for officials to be designated as answerable to the Scottish Parliament for the expenditure and receipts of each part of the Scottish Administration. Thus, the Parliament and its Committees will have direct access to officials.

The first part of amendment No. 274 clarifies that it is the auditors who must, under Scottish legislation, be given access to documents that they may reasonably require for their functions. The previous drafting was imprecise on that matter.

Mr. Salmond: Can the Minister confirm that he is not suggesting a local authority set-up, with an outside body appointing the auditors, and that the Parliament will look after its financial affairs properly without being overseen by a higher authority, as though it could not be trusted to conduct its affairs efficiently?

Mr. McLeish: Yes, that is the case. The intervention of the Chairman of the Public Accounts Commission highlighted the seriousness with which any parliament must take those issues. The Government considered that the legislation had not treated the matter with the appropriate seriousness, and tabled amendments accordingly.

Amendment No. 147 is essentially technical, designed to make it clear that the Scottish Consolidated Fund will be held with the office of the Paymaster General. The existing provision is misleading, since the office, although it provides payments and receipt services for the Government, does not provide banking services as such.

The new provision makes it clear that the fund will be held as an account with the office of the Paymaster General, ensuring that overnight balances are available to be swept back to the National Loans Fund, thus reducing overall Government borrowing. However, the Scottish Executive will be able to maintain subordinate bank accounts with commercial banks if that makes sense.

Amendment No. 148 is for clarification. It makes it clear that Scottish legislation must provide for persons receiving money directly from the Scottish Consolidated Fund to account for all their expenditure and receipts. That would include receipts obtained by them but not paid into the fund because, for example, Parliament had authorised alternative disposal or accounting under clause 61(4).

Amendment No. 279 inserts a new subsection in clause 66, to ensure that Scottish legislation is not required to make provision for accounts to be prepared by cross-border public authorities, when they are specifically dealt with under clause 84 or another enactment, or generally to impose accounting or auditing requirements when other legislation makes provision for accounting and audit. That is to avoid any clash between clause 66 and such other legislation.

The new subsection also means that Scottish legislation will not have to provide for the Auditor General to audit his own accounts, which would clearly be wrong. It defines two new terms: "parliamentary accounts" and "Scottish legislation", which are used to simplify the drafting.

[Mr. McLeish]

Amendments Nos. 272, 275 to 277, and 281 are consequential on the others and amend references to make use of the new terms "Auditor General for Scotland", "parliamentary accounts" and "Scottish legislation".

Mr. David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden): I thank the Minister for that explanation. Amendments Nos. 278 and 274 implement the concessions that he made in Committee, in response to my proposals to provide better for the Auditor General for Scotland's security of tenure and to provide for accounting officers. The amendments, as he described them, are broadly in line with what I wanted, and I am grateful.

Amendments Nos. 278 and 274 are broadly consistent with the amendments that I originally tabled. Amendment No. 278 goes slightly less far than I had hoped, in that a resolution for the removal of the auditor will not require a Division. That contrasts with the provision for the removal of judges in clause 89, but, for some reason, is in line with that for a dissolution in clause 3.

The Scottish Office view is that the dissolution model is more appropriate for removing the auditor. There is a clear parallel between an independent auditor general and an independent judge, so I think that the judge model is better. It requires a Division, and would not allow an Administration to slip a proposal through Parliament, as we know is possible.

Mr. Dalyell: This question is not meant offensively, but is this also the professional view of the current Comptroller and Auditor General?

Mr. Davis: Indeed. The hon. Gentleman is right: I have discussed the matter with the Comptroller and Auditor General. We agree on all these points. I should like the Minister to say why this approach has been taken. It seems anomalous, and is difficult to understand.

I also raised in Committee the question of a scrutiny committee of the Scottish Parliament, not identical to or with the same name but modeled on, our Public Accounts Committee. Its chairman should come from the Opposition, and certainly not from the Executive or the coalition making up the Executive. That would be an important advantage and addition to the Scottish Parliament. There is no amendment to that effect. I would like to hear what the Minister has to say on that.

The amendments do not address the other financial matters raised in Committee. The result will be inefficient, and probably ambiguous, accountability to Westminster for the funds granted to the Scottish Parliament, with the consequent risk of conflict over those matters.

The principal absences are the UK Parliament's need to know the purposes for which it would be expected to vote money for the Scottish Parliament; the need for the Secretary of State to be properly accountable to this House for the grant of the Scottish Parliament; and the need for the Comptroller and Auditor General to have continuing access in Scotland to provide assurance to the UK Parliament about the spending of UK taxpayers' money.

Amendments were tabled in Committee to protect the rights of this House and of the UK taxpayer. I hope that the House of Lords will revisit those matters and correct them. However, it would be churlish not to thank the Minister for his two concessions. They will be helpful, and are in the interests of the people of Scotland.

Mr. Gorrie: I wish to touch on a point raised by the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (Mr. Davis): the number of Members of the Scottish Parliament necessary to vote for the removal of the auditor general. We have tabled an amendment that the figure for judges should be three quarters. I ask the Minister to consider that three quarters might be more intelligent than two thirds. The whole thing is flexible, but it is likely that the Scottish Parliament will have a coalition Executive. The two, or even three, parties concerned might have two thirds of the votes. There would not be the same defence for the auditor general against the Executive if there was a quarrel.

Mr. David Davis: I agree with the thrust of the hon. Gentleman's argument. The Comptroller and Auditor General for the Westminster Parliament can be removed only by separate votes of each House of Parliament. That is a formidable barrier for a Government wishing to remove an awkward or difficult auditor general—that is, one who is doing his job. I agree that the hurdle should be raised even higher.

Mr. Gorrie: It is important that such officials have security. I was a member of a council that badly sacked its chief executive on the hoof. Three quarters might be safer than two thirds. I notice, in the light of the interest in trade union votes, that, on the same basis, two thirds of Members of Parliament would be required to vote.

5.15 pm

Mr. Dalyell: While there is an important meeting upstairs concerned with trade union recognition and the visit of the Scottish Trades Union Congress, and this is a quiet, gentle debate, these are crucial, not arcane, matters. They go to the heart of responsibility for money.

The reason I interrupted the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee is that, like my hon. Friend the Minister, I was educated—I choose that word rightly—on the Public Accounts Committee by the Comptroller and Auditor General—in my case, Sir Edmund Compton. The concerns of the Comptroller and Auditor General must be answered. We are operating under a guillotine, but I hope that the other place looks carefully at these matters. Unless they are sorted out, it will lead to endless trouble.

The reason is basic. The subordinate Parliament is part of a unitary state, and is dependent on the overwhelming bulk of its money being raised by the other part of the state. That other part will doubtless be characterised as the parsimonious people in Great George street, or the English Chancellor—one can imagine all the phrases that will be used.

Members of the Scottish Parliament, whatever their personal feelings, will be under pressure to report to this House on how money is used. There will be overwhelming demand for better services, education, health and everything else in Scotland that requires expenditure. The pressure on Members of the Holyrood Parliament to accede to such requests, or at least to say that they are doing their best, will be terrific.

In those circumstances, sooner rather than later, this House will ask those who have departed this House to account for their use of money. I do not suggest that there will be anything corrupt about it, that there will be misappropriations, or that big nanny is needed to look after expenses; it is the politics of the situation. In those circumstances, the position of the Public Accounts Committee is crucial. The other place should explore that.

Mr. Jenkin: I thank the Minister for his concessions to my right hon. Friend the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, but I underline what he finished by saying. There is a fundamental imbalance in setting up a Parliament that is not responsible for securing its own revenue. As long as the Scottish Parliament has such extensive reliance for its supply on this House, there will inevitably be tension between it and the Westminster Parliament. As the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) said, that relationship will be difficult to manage politically. The amendments do nothing to resolve that fundamental imbalance.

Mr. McLeish: There is not a fundamental confusion, but a misunderstanding. I agree with the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) and my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) that there will be tensions and pressures on public policy on finance. That is the nature of the changes. However, we are discussing how we examine what we are spending, and how to ensure that we have a first-class system for accountability, efficiency and effectiveness, and all the issues of probity.

I shall respond briefly to the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee. I thought that the possibility of the Auditor General being removed without a Division would be of concern. On a Division, two thirds of the Members would be required to vote in favour. We do not envisage it being a factual proposition that the Executive would try to sneak through, if I may be allowed to use that phrase, a motion late at night, or in any other circumstances to try to achieve that.

On a second, and perhaps more positive, note, a meeting of the all-party consultative steering group yesterday agreed that, as part of the Standing Orders, we might want to identify a few Committees to recommend to the Scottish Parliament, and that one would be the equivalent of the Public Accounts Committee. I hope that that will satisfy the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, and ensure that the integrity of the person who chairs such a Committee is beyond doubt.

Clearly we will be expecting a high standard of deliberation. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow, I enjoyed my experience on the PAC, and I have no doubt that the quality will be there in Scotland to ensure that we replicate that part of the scrutiny procedure.

Mr. David Davis: Clearly, I welcome—

It being one hour and fifteen minutes after the commencement of proceedings on consideration of the Bill, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER, pursuant to the Order [13 January] and the Resolution [12 May], put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair.

Amendment agreed to.

No. 273, in page 28, line 3, leave out

'appointment of an independent person' and insert 'Auditor General for Scotland'.

No. 274, in page 28, line 6, leave out from 'access' to 'and' in line 7 and insert

'by persons exercising those functions to such documents as they may reasonably require,

( ) for members of the staff of the Scottish Administration designated for the purpose to be answerable to the Parliament in respect of the expenditure and receipts of each part of the Scottish Administration'.

No. 275, in page 28, line 8, leave out from first 'of' to first 'and' in line 9 and insert

'parliamentary accounts and of reports on such accounts'.

No. 276, in page 28, line 13, leave out from 'examining' to end of line and insert 'parliamentary accounts'.

No. 277, in page 28, line 22, leave out 'the rules' and insert 'Scottish legislation'.

No. 278, in page 28, line 26, at end insert—

'( ) There shall be an Auditor General for Scotland who shall be an independent person appointed by Her Majesty on the nomination of the Parliament.

( ) A recommendation shall not be made to Her Majesty for the removal from office of the Auditor General for Scotland unless the Parliament so resolves and, if the resolution is passed on a division, the number of members voting in favour is not less than two-thirds of the total number of seats for members of the Parliament.'

No. 279, in page 28, line 29, at end insert—

'(4A) Subsection (1)(a) does not apply in relation to any cross-border public authority if any enactment not contained in Scottish legislation requires—

(a) the authority to prepare accounts of the expenditure and receipts, or of any part of the expenditure and receipts, of the authority, and

(b) the accounts to be examined, certified and reported on by the Auditor General for Scotland.

(4B) Subsection (2)(b) does not apply to accounts prepared by the Auditor General for Scotland.

(4C) This section does not require Scottish legislation to impose any requirement which is imposed by any enactment not contained in such legislation.

"parliamentary accounts" means the accounts prepared in pursuance of subsection (1)(a) or (b) and the accounts referred to in subsection (4A),

"Scottish legislation" means provision made by or under an Act of the Scottish Parliament'.—[Mr. McLeish.]

Clause 69

POWER TO FIX BASIC RATE FOR SCOTTISH TAXPAYERS

Amendment made: No. 47, in page 29, line 34, leave out '1997–98' and insert '1998–99'.—[Mr. McLeish.]

Clause 72

CHANGES TO INCOME TAX STRUCTURE

Amendment made: No. 48, in page 32, line 43, leave out '1997–98' and insert '1998–99'.—[Mr. McLeish.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We now come to amendment No. 22.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I register that it is deeply unsatisfactory that amendments on the reference year for income-tax-varying powers and the restriction on changes to such powers, which are important subjects, have not been discussed because of the time—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not use a point of order to put a point of argument. That issue arises throughout a programmed debate.

Clause 76

REMUNERATION OF MEMBERS OF THE PARLIAMENT AND EXECUTIVE

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury): I beg to move amendment No. 22, in page 35, line 24, at beginning insert

'Subject to subsections (6) to (8) below,'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 23, in page 35, line 26, at beginning insert

'Subject to subsections (6) to (8) below,'.

Government amendment No. 151.

No. 21, in page 35, line 46, at end insert—

'(6) The Parliament shall ensure that no salary or allowance paid to a member of the Parliament under subsection (1) shall exceed those for the time being paid to members of the House of the Commons.

(7) The Parliament shall ensure that no salary or allowance paid to the First Minister shall exceed the average salary or allowance for the time being paid to a Secretary of State in the United Kingdom Cabinet.

(8) The Parliament shall ensure that no salary or allowance paid to a member of the Scottish Executive other than the First Minister shall exceed the salary or allowance for the time being paid to a Minister of State in the United Kingdom Government.'.

Government amendment No. 242.

Mr. Robertson: The amendments are intended to ensure that no salary or allowance paid to a Member of the Scottish Parliament shall exceed that paid to a Member of this House; that no salary or allowance paid to the First Minister shall exceed the average paid to a Secretary of State in the United Kingdom Parliament; and that no salary or allowance paid to a Member of the Scottish Executive other than the First Minister shall exceed that paid to a Minister of State in the UK Government.

Those are the details of the amendments. The reasoning behind them is to protect and strengthen the Union; to reflect the fact that the Scottish Parliament is a subordinate legislature; and to recognise that the work and responsibilities of Members of the Scottish Parliament are different from those of Members of this House.

The amendments are in keeping with the precedent set following elections to the European Parliament in 1979. The work load and responsibilities of Members—

Mr. Salmond: If the hon. Gentleman were a time and motion man, and bearing in mind his experience as a constituency Member of Parliament and his knowledge of the functions being devolved to the Scottish Parliament and those being retained by Westminster, could he estimate whether the Member of Parliament in Westminster or the Member in Edinburgh will have the greatest constituency work load?

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Gentleman is either extremely well informed or very unlucky, because I used to be a time and motion person, and I assessed work loads each and every day. If he will allow me to proceed, I will explain my view.

It cannot justifiably be claimed that Members of the Scottish Parliament will have the same work loads, or the same degree of responsibility, as exist in this place. That is especially true of the additional Members, whose presence will reduce the work load and responsibilities of those who represent constituencies. As we heard today, the Government recommend that the two different sorts of Member should be paid the same. Therefore, it is only right that Members of the Scottish Parliament should not receive more pay than Members of this House, and our amendments will ensure that that is the case.

As for the First Minister, I am aware that the Secretary of State for Scotland has his eye on the job, but I am confident that he could survive on a salary of no more than £106,716, which is what he receives as a Cabinet Minister in the United Kingdom Government.

Mr. John M. Taylor (Solihull): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way, as he is doing so well at the Dispatch Box, but I think that I am the only person in the Chamber who has been simultaneously a Member of this Parliament and the European Parliament for 12 months at the whim of the electors. That experience rewarded me with a salary of one and one third. There seems to be some merit in that, and at the very least, it is a precedent.

Mr. Robertson: It is indeed a precedent, and one which I am about to mention.

I do not believe that anyone is suggesting that the pay of the First Minister should exceed the figure I quoted. Our amendments will ensure that it will not.

Under our amendments, Members of the Scottish Executive could receive up to £77,047 in pay. I am equally confident that no one would suggest that, comparably, that would be inadequate. However, there is a deeper point about salaries, which is that the Scottish Parliament is essentially a subordinate Parliament, and therefore it would be very odd indeed to pay its Members more than Members of the supreme and sovereign United Kingdom Parliament.

Our objection to that is not born of greed or resentment, but of a desire to protect the Union. Because the Scottish Parliament is new and people have high hopes of it, there may be a temptation, especially if the Parliament is dominated by Scottish nationalists, to attempt to enhance its standing. One way to do so would be by paying its Members more than Members of this House receive, which would be an odd and dangerous thing to do.

In those circumstances, the comparable link would be broken, and that would weaken the Union. It is important that the subordinate character of the Scottish Parliament be maintained, and be seen to be maintained, if we are to preserve the Union. Therefore, a cap needs to be applied to what Members of the Scottish Parliament receive, and our amendments would do exactly that.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor) said, there is a precedent, which is the European Assembly (Pay and Pensions) Act 1979. It limits the salaries of Members of the European Parliament to those paid to Members of this House. A Conservative Government passed that Act, but the Labour party supported it. On Second Reading, the then shadow Home Secretary, Merlyn Rees, said:

"I believe that to have paid the new members of the European Assembly higher salaries than those of Members of this Parliament . . . would have been an affront".

He was right, but his reason for taking that view was even more important. He said:

"I agree with the Home Secretary that in no way should the European Assembly detract from the supremacy of this Parliament."—[Official Report, 22 June 1979; Vol. 968, c. 1679.]

That is the crucial point. Lord Merlyn-Rees was right for more than just one reason. The fact is that he realised that paying higher salaries to Members of the European Parliament than those paid to Members of this House was objectionable for constitutional reasons. Those same objections exist in the case of a Scottish Parliament. The public tend to place importance on how much people are paid.

Mr. Salmond: The hon. Gentleman rests his case too much on that argument. I once worked for the Royal Bank of Scotland, where, for example, a merchant banker was paid more than the chairman of the bank, although he was a subordinate because of the scale. I am not sure about his argument, but I am sure that, if he is a time and motion man, he must realise that the work load of Members of Parliament here will decrease when the Scottish Parliament is established. On that logical basis, what salary reduction will he suggest, as all the hon. Members here today will not have to do that sort of work in future? Their work loads will decline, and so should their salaries.

Mr. Robertson: We are not certain—because the questions have not yet been answered, we do not know how things will work. We are still searching for an answer to the West Lothian question, so we do not know how the arrangements will work in practice. We shall have to wait and see, but I certainly do not recommend that any Members of this Parliament should have to take any reduction in pay.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire): Does my hon. Friend agree that the only Members of Parliament who will be doing significantly less work are Members representing Scottish constituencies who remain at Westminster? North Wiltshire will still demand the same amount of work, but will representing Banff and Buchan in this place require the same amount of work after the establishment of the new Scottish Parliament?

5.30 pm

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) will have a reduced work load; nevertheless, I would not suggest that he should take a lower salary.

The public tend to attach importance to how much people are paid; they tend to judge the worth of persons or organisations on the basis of how much income they receive—perhaps the reason why the public do not value Members of this Parliament highly is that we are inadequately paid, but that is another argument. It is important that Members of the Scottish Parliament do not receive higher salaries than Members of the House of Commons. It is important that the salaries they are paid recognise what I maintain will be a lower work load and less responsibility—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but I have to tell the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) that he must not conduct a mini-debate while the main debate is taking place.

Mr. Robertson: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker—the subject is an interesting one.

It is important to preserve the subordinate character of the Scottish Parliament, and to prevent it from becoming a quango that feathers its own nest. It is vital that we preserve the Union, and doing as the amendments propose would be consistent with the precedent set by the European Assembly (Pay and Pensions) Act 1979, to which I referred. Our amendments would achieve all that. They would ensure fairness, and, in doing so, protect the Union. For those reasons, I commend amendments Nos. 22, 23 and 21 to the House.

Mr. Dalyell: In the past five minutes, a whole collective of cats has been let out among the pigeons. Without wishing to talk down to the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson), I should warn him not to be naive. He was unfair to the Scottish National party: it is not only the SNP that will take the view he describes, but every Member of the Holyrood Parliament, because it is in the nature of politicians to think that the institution they are in is the important institution. It is not only, or even mainly, a question of financial greed; amour propre will come into it.

If the hon. Gentleman wants an example, I shall give one from my own party. Those who were pro-Europeans listened to Barbara Castle, then the hon. Member for Blackburn, endlessly criticising the Community and the dreadful institution in Strasbourg; but heaven knows, as soon as she herself got there, as Lady Castle of the British delegation, it metamorphosed into a most important institution.

Mr. John M. Taylor: May I remind the hon. Gentleman that Barbara Castle was not just a member of the delegation, but that she was directly elected in 1979?

Mr. Dalyell: We all knew it, very clearly. I say this seriously: it is in the nature of politicians that they will shout for the institution where they themselves happen to be. Do not let us think that it is only the Scottish National party that will do that; it will be every Member of the Parliament. They will say, "We are doing more work than those people in Westminster." I shall be mildly interested to see what is the reaction, first, of my colleagues who remain at Westminster and, secondly, of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and of my hon. Friend the Minister for Home Affairs and Devolution, both of whom will by that time be Members of another body, because position in that body will have a marvellous way of changing attitudes.

[Mr. Dalyell]

Mr. McLeish: It is instructive to note that today's Scottish edition of the Daily Express contains the following:

"Scottish Conservatives spokesman Paul Cullen"—

who is a member of the consultative steering group—

"said that if Holyrood was to be taken seriously then salaries had to be comparable with the current Westminster level.

'It would be undesirable to create a two-tier system of MSPs,' he insisted."

The Government are attempting to set an objective basis for deliberations on this matter, which is why my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State wrote to the chairman of the Senior Salaries Review Body on 25 March asking him to consider and make recommendations regarding salaries, allowances and pensions benefits which would be payable to Members of the Scottish Parliament and the Scottish Executive.

In that context, it is unreasonable to lay down in the Bill limitations on the levels of salaries and allowances which the Scottish Parliament can set for its Members, the First Minister or other members of the Scottish Executive, so we strongly resist the amendments. Much of this debate was not about salaries, allowances or pensions, but old Conservatives expressing old prejudices about subordinate Parliaments. That is not the spirit in which we have to move forward.

In the short time left, I commend Government amendments Nos. 151 and 242 to the House.

It being one hour and thirty minutes after the commencement of proceedings on consideration of the Bill, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER, pursuant to the Order [13 January] and the Resolution [12 May], put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Clause 86

MALADMINISTRATION

Mr. McLeish: I beg to move amendment No. 181, in page 40, line 1, leave out from beginning to end of line 3 and insert

'any other office-holder in the Scottish Administration.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendment No. 182.

Mr. McLeish: Clause 86 places a duty on the Parliament to make provision for the investigation of certain complaints of maladministration made to Members of the Scottish Parliament. At present, the clause refers to members of the Scottish Executive and certain other members of the Scottish Administration. Government amendment No. 181 clarifies that, in addition to members of the Scottish Executive, all other office holders in the Scottish Administration come within the scope of the Parliament's duty. That amendment is linked to other Government amendments concerning what is meant by "the Scottish Administration".

The present clause sets out what the Parliament must do. I am certain that the Parliament will want to consider what additional provision concerning the investigation of maladministration it will wish to make. Government amendment No. 182 is intended to ensure that the Parliament is able to do so. It is intended that the Parliament will be able to make arrangements for the investigation of complaints of maladministration against all members of the Scottish Administration, and Scottish public authorities, including local authorities and the health service. It is also intended that it will be able to make provision regarding cross-border public authorities where the complaints are about non-reserved matters concerning Scotland. I urge right hon. and hon. Members to accept the amendments.

Mr. Jenkin: I thank the Minister for introducing amendments that go some way to allaying concerns expressed in Committee. We welcome them.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 182, in page 40, line 8, at end insert—

'( ) The Parliament may make provision for the investigation of complaints in respect of—

(a) any action taken by or on behalf of an office-holder in the Scottish Administration,

(b) any action taken by or on behalf of a Scottish public authority to which paragraph 1A or 1B of Part III of Schedule 5 to this Act applies, or

(c) any action concerning Scotland and not relating to reserved matters which is taken by or on behalf of a cross-border public authority.'.—[Mr. McLeish.]

Clause 89

APPOINTMENT AND REMOVAL OF JUDGES

Mr. McLeish: I beg to move amendment No. 50, in page 41, line 3, at end insert—

'( ) Before making such a nomination the First Minister shall consult the Lord President and the Lord Justice Clerk (unless, in either case, the office is vacant).'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: Government amendments Nos. 51 to 55.

Amendment No. 74, in page 41, line 14, leave out 'two-thirds' and insert 'three-quarters'.

Government amendments Nos. 56 and 57.

Mr. McLeish: The amendments to clause 89, and the linked amendment to schedule 7, concern the Scottish Land Court Act 1993, and have been tabled by the Government in response to points made by hon. Members in Committee about provisions relating to the appointment and removal of judges. Amendments Nos. 50 to 52 and No. 57 deal with appointment issues.

Amendment No. 50 will require the First Minister to consult the Lord President of the Court of Session and the Lord Justice Clerk, where available, before making a nomination to the Prime Minister for an appointment to either of those senior posts when a vacancy arises.

Amendment No. 51 similarly requires that the First Minister should consult the Lord President before making a recommendation to the Queen for the appointment of any other judge of the Court of Session or any sheriff principal or sheriff. Amendment No. 52 will oblige the First Minister to comply with any requirement relating to appointment matters which may be imposed by virtue of an enactment, including an Act of the Scottish Parliament. The amendment acknowledges that the Scottish Parliament would be competent, should it so wish, to impose other requirements on the First Minister, such as consideration of judicial nominations put forward by the judicial appointments committee. I should, however, make it clear that the First Minister would retain ultimate responsibility for making nominations or recommendations and for consulting the Lord President and the Lord Justice Clerk, where appropriate.

Amendment No. 57 makes it clear that the First Minister will take over the responsibilities of the Secretary of State for recommending to Her Majesty the appointment of any person as a member of the Scottish Land Court. It requires the First Minister to consult the Lord President of the Court of Session before recommending anyone for appointment to the post of chairman of the Scottish Land Court.

Mr. Ancram: I have a general inquiry. Have the Minister or his right hon. Friend had discussions with the Scottish judiciary about these proposals; and, if so, is it generally happy with them?

Mr. McLeish: I can say yes to that valid question.

Mr. Wallace: I have another general inquiry; if the Minister cannot answer straight away, perhaps he will write to me. Given that provision has been made for the chairman of the Land Court, what is the position regarding the appointment of Lords of Appeal in Ordinary from the Scottish Bench?

Mr. McLeish: I shall be moving on to that point later.

Amendments Nos. 53 to 56 deal with provisions on removal from office that are contained in clause 89. Amendment No. 53 adds the office of chairman of the Scottish Land Court to those posts to which the provisions on removal of judges will apply. That simply reflects the chairman's equivalent status to that of a judge of the Court of Session.

Amendment No. 54 provides that the Scottish Parliament will be asked to vote on a motion for removal of a judge in which the First Minister will be required to specify the ground of unfitness for office which he considers to merit that exceptional action, which touches on the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell).

Amendment No. 55 is a minor technical amendment which substitutes the word "motion" for "resolution", reflecting the wording of amendment No. 54.

[Mr. McLeish]

Finally, amendment No. 56 will require the First Minister, before making a motion for removal, to be satisfied that the judge in question is unfit for office by reason of inability, neglect of duty or misbehaviour.

Mr. Dalyell: Perhaps this is little more than a drafting point, but it would be a calamity if it ever arose. I gather that the Lords of Appeal in Ordinary are not covered. Is that an oversight?

Mr. McLeish: I will clarify that point and convey the clarification to my hon. Friend.

The wording of amendment No. 56 follows closely that of section 12 of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act 1971 which deals with removal of sheriffs and sheriffs principal. The second part of amendment No. 56 places a requirement on the First Minister to consult the Prime Minister before bringing a motion for removal of the Lord President or Lord Justice Clerk. The provision reflects the important role that the Prime Minister plays in recommending an appointment to those two most senior posts.

I believe that the amendments strike an appropriate balance between the responsibilities of Parliament and the First Minister, and the independence of the judiciary. They provide a statutory safeguard, which the senior judiciary sought, in place of the informal arrangements currently enjoyed, for consultation with them on judicial appointments at the levels of the supreme court and shrieval benches. I hope this will meet with general approval; we have tried to take on board points made from all sides. I commend the amendments to the House.

Mr. Jenkin: We appreciate the efforts that the Minister has made to accommodate concerns expressed in Committee and elsewhere about the arrangements for the appointment and removal of judges. We stress that the real test of the provisions will come in the other place where more experts with judicial experience are available to raise concerns. We welcome the amendments as far as they go, but look forward to hearing what the other place may have to say.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife): Perhaps I ought to declare an interest as an occasionally practising member of the Faculty of Advocates.

The amendments represent a substantial improvement, and the Government are to be commended for that. It seems right that the sort of difficulties that the Secretary of State and the Lord President and Lord Justice Clerk faced in relation to the case of Sheriff Ewan Stewart ought, as far as possible, to be eliminated by making more precise the grounds on which a motion may be made to seek dismissal of a judge. Those who have studied the report of that case, which went all the way to the House of Lords and was heard by several Lords of Appeal in Ordinary—I shall return to them shortly—will be aware that interpretation of certain provisions was required before a clear indication could be given of the basis on which, in that case, the removal from office of Sheriff Stewart was sought. To that extent, the amendments represent a substantial improvement.

I shall deal with the question of Lords of Appeal in Ordinary. There is always some confusion: a judge sitting in the outer house of the Court of Session is a lord ordinary, whereas a judge who sits as part of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is a Lord of Appeal in Ordinary. As I understand it, there is provision for a number of Lords of Appeal in Ordinary, but by convention, two are judges from Scotland, with Scottish experience. I do not believe—I am open to correction—that there is any statutory minimum number of such judges.

The point made by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) was that the Bill's provisions do not apply to those judges who go from Scotland to become members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. That is entirely appropriate, because the Bill includes a scheme to devolve responsibility for those parts of the judicial system that operate in Scotland. It does not seem incongruous or illogical that the Lords of Appeal in Ordinary should not be subject to the provisions.

Mr. McLeish: Not being a member of the legal profession has its drawbacks, but help is always on hand. With reference to the points made by the hon. and learned Gentleman and also by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow, the Bill contains no provision relating to the appointment of those Lords. They are appointed by the Queen, and that will continue.

Mr. Campbell: On that footing, it would have been illogical for any reference to be made to the Lords of Appeal in Ordinary in a Bill the scheme of which is to devolve to a Scottish Parliament those parts of Scottish justice that are conducted in Scotland. In that sense, the Government's position is entirely logical.

I shall take the opportunity to speak to amendment No. 74, which seeks to introduce a majority of three quarters of the legislature for the motion for a removal of a judge to take effect. We discussed the matter to some extent in Committee, and it may help if I explain why raising the threshold from 66.6 to 75 per cent. is justifiable.

First, as has already been intimated in at least one intervention, the removal of a judge is an extremely serious business. By tradition, judges held office ad vitam aut culpam—that is, they kept office for as long as they lived or unless they were guilty of some very considerable indiscipline. The independence of the judiciary is an important part of our constitutional arrangements. Therefore, if we introduce a provision that may encroach on the independence of the judiciary, we must be satisfied that it provides adequate protection.

Secondly, if we have a Parliament elected by proportional representation—the Minister will not be surprised to hear that I heartily approve of that part of the Bill—it is not difficult to envisage circumstances in which the Administration is formed by two parties that achieve 66.6 per cent. of the vote, which means that the Administration would have within their power the right to bring about the dismissal of a judge. That does not provide adequate protection. However, it is difficult to envisage an Administration getting as much as 75 per cent. of the membership of the Scottish Parliament. That provides an additional protection.

There is now a far greater certainty, from the point of view of the Administration, as the grounds of unfitness for office are spelt out in much more detail than previously. Given that higher degree of specification, and as part of the balance necessary in such a matter, it is reasonable to make the hurdle that must be crossed before a judge may be dismissed from office rather higher than the Government propose.

Mr. Jenkin: As a matter of interest, if the Scottish Parliament abused its powers in the way that the hon. and learned Gentleman envisages, would it be appropriate for the Westminster Parliament to intervene?

Mr. Campbell: It would be appropriate in statutory terms, but intervention on such an issue would raise some very difficult questions where the devolving of responsibility for the administration of justice in Scotland was so all-embracing. If there was an intervention of the kind postulated in the question, the consequence would be some degree of political disturbance. It would be much better to avoid such issues by creating a threshold sufficiently high as to require that three quarters of the legislature indicate their assent to the serious matter of the removal of a judge from office through unfitness.

As far as I can remember—the Scottish Office records may go much further back than my memory—Sheriff Ewan Stewart is the only judge to have been removed from office since 1945, and possibly for a considerably longer period than that, which shows how rare such occurrences are. We are endeavouring to find a proper balance between the right of the legislature to ensure that there are proper standards of competence and ability on the Bench, and the traditional independence of the judiciary which, like many other parts of our constitution, is unwritten, but which none the less forms an important part of the checks and balances that are essential to our constitution. For that reason, my hon. Friends and I believe that the amendment is at least worthy of consideration. I hope that the Minister will be able to accept it.

Mr. Dalyell: The last time that I raised the subject of Lords of Appeal in Ordinary was during an Adjournment debate on Lockerbie. I requested that the evidence that the Crown Office purports to have in relation to Lockerbie should at least be seen by the Lords of Appeal in Ordinary. The Minister replied that the evidence could not be shown to "sundry third parties". I am not sure that Lord Hope and Lord Clyde enjoyed being so described. However, on this occasion, in relation to the Lords of Appeal in Ordinary, I am satisfied with the answer and believe that it is logical.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): I intervene in the debate with considerable diffidence. Although I am a lawyer, I am very much an English rather than a Scottish lawyer. I hope that those who know more about the subject will forgive me if I wander into error.

Government amendment No. 52 states:

"The First Minister shall comply with any requirement. . . imposed by virtue of any enactment."

Can the Minister explain what that is supposed to mean?

I fully agree—again, with diffidence—with the hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Mr. Campbell) in his description of the role of what I would call Law Lords, to avoid confusion—that is, Lords of Appeal in Ordinary who sit here. They are United Kingdom judges and therefore should be outside the ambit of any Scottish legislation.

Those who sit on the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council are not just United Kingdom judges, as they include the noble and learned Lord Cooke, a former senior judge from New Zealand who sits on the Judicial Committee as a life peer and a peer of the realm. I believe that Northern Ireland judges have also been promoted to the Judicial Committee. We should not think of the House of Lords in its judicial capacity in any other way than in its United Kingdom role. I agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman on that point.

I query the thrust of the Liberal Democrats' amendment on the matter of two thirds or three quarters. With proportional representation, it is likely to be difficult for any one party—although I accept the hon. and learned Gentleman's point about a group of parties—to command even two thirds of the total number of seats in the Scottish Parliament. It will be almost impossible for a coherent group to command three quarters of the seats—although I may be proved wrong on both points.

I agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman that a judge could—I hope that I shall be forgiven for such a colloquialism—get up the nose of the Scottish Parliament or of a large part of it for having done something that the Parliament considers politically unacceptable. I recall some of the decisions made by English judges over the past 10 or so years that offended the trade unions. The judges were interpreting the law of England, as passed by the House, whether we like it or not.

I fear that a Scottish judge, carrying out the law of the United Kingdom Parliament or of the Scottish Parliament, might upset a majority, which goes after him for purely political reasons. I accept the hon. and learned Gentleman's point, but it is a nice judgment. Where the line should be drawn is a matter of debate and opinion, which we may not be able to resolve this evening.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: The hon. and learned Gentleman might like to consider another instance. If it was believed that a particular judge was being unduly lenient in respect of a certain class of criminal cases that appeared before him, it could create an atmosphere—led by a prurient press—in which that judge would come under scrutiny. In addition, a judge who appeared to be more willing than others to grant applications for judicial review—accepting that there had been an abuse of discretion by Ministers—might find himself in similar circumstances.

Mr. Garnier: Those points are perfectly good. We can only hope, as the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) said, that we never have to worry about that. The hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife is correct: one Scottish sheriff in living memory has been removed from his post. I do not think that the equivalent of a High Court judge has ever been removed—although in the not-too-distant past one judge jumped before he was pushed; but let us draw a veil over that.

There appears to be some sort of a muddle. Clause 89 of the Bill as drafted, and as it is proposed it should be amended, grants the First Minister and the Scottish Parliament powers over the removal and appointment of judges, from the highest to the lowest, within the Scottish judicial system. I refer hon. Members to page 77 of the Bill and to head 11 of schedule 5 dealing with judicial remuneration. Unless I have wholly misunderstood the position, judicial remuneration is reserved for the United Kingdom Parliament. If the Scottish Parliament is able to remove judges, why is it not allowed to decide on the level of pay for judges? Does the Minister believe that there is any inconsistency in that position?

Mr. Grieve: I have only one question. I find it difficult to understand amendment No. 56 in so far as it refers to the Lord President and the Lord Justice Clerk. If the appointments continue to be made on the recommendation of the Prime Minister, does it not constitute a reserved matter? In those circumstances, how can a motion by the Scottish Parliament affect the Prime Minister in the discharge of his functions? That matter, if it rests with the Prime Minister, must be the responsibility of this House. I should be grateful if the Minister would answer that question. The amendment does not tally with the original wording of clause 89, which makes it clear that it is a reserved matter.

Mr. McLeish: I shall take the latter point first. There is no confusion about that matter. The essential prerequisite is the role of the Prime Minister in making those recommendations. The points that I have made in relation to amendment No. 56 are very straightforward, and there is no conflict or inconsistency inherent in them. Similarly, the satisfactory way of dealing with the question of judges' remuneration is as the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) describes. It is a question of striking a balance in relation to both issues.

Mr. Grieve: I confess that I still do not understand—it may be a failing on my part. If the Prime Minister may recommend that a judge should be removed from office, should not the House—the Prime Minister will certainly not be answerable to the Scottish Parliament—scrutinise that decision and approve or disapprove of it? I do not see how that can be done on the recommendation of the First Minister through the Scottish Parliament.

Mr. McLeish: Amendment No. 56 places a requirement on the First Minister to consult the Prime Minister before bringing a motion for the removal of the Lord President or the Lord Justice Clerk—it is not a question of wider removals. As I said before, this provision measures the important role of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister is taking an executive role and it is not an issue for the Westminster Parliament.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: It is an executive appointment.

Mr. McLeish: That is correct.

Mr. Grieve: It may be an executive appointment, but the executive roles of the Prime Minister are subject to the scrutiny of the House. How can the Prime Minister exercise an executive capacity over which the House has no power of scrutiny? We have that power now if we wish to exercise it.

6.15 pm

Mr. McLeish: The point has not been well made in that it is a tradition of the House as part of the devolution settlement. We shall continue with what works. It is absolutely right—this is a matter for the judiciary as well as for us, and there is agreement on it—that the Prime Minister should continue to recommend appointments. The proper process in the amendments reflects much constructive discussion and many suggestions made by the House. The Government see no particular dilemma in that.

The other point concerns amendment No. 52 and the question of enactments. The hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) seemed a little confused about that. It provides an opportunity for a judicial appointments committee, for example, to be established—it is nothing more sinister than that. It obliges the First Minister to comply with any requirement relating to appointment matters. That opens up the possibility that the Scottish Parliament could take a decision that will establish a judicial appointments committee within the Parliament to reflect what was said by Liberal Members and also to take cognisance of the fact that the situation surrounding appointments to the judiciary may change in the future. It allows the Parliament that facility.

Mr. Garnier: I am grateful to the Minister for explaining that point. It is now quite clear—although it appeared confusing on the amendment paper. The Minister said a moment ago that the inconsistency between remuneration in section 1, head 11 of schedule 5 and the amendments and main drafting of clause 89 was satisfactory. Will he explain why he thinks that is so?

Mr. McLeish: The Government believe that, given the Government amendments, we now have a balanced package in place. There is consistency between the two different interpretations. As always in these situations, I am happy to reconfirm that and I shall write to the hon. and learned Gentleman about that point. The Government believe that there is no inconsistency. This is a straightforward measure and each part of the Bill is consistent with that objective. We have no difficulty with it.

Amendment No. 74 is similar to the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) in Committee. As I said then, the proportion of two thirds suggested in the clause as it stands already represents a very high threshold required to vote in favour of any resolution—particularly having regard to the fact that it is not just two thirds of those voting, but two thirds of the total number of Members of the Scottish Parliament. In proposing that figure, the Government—and I in particular—have recognised the seriousness of the act of removing one of Her Majesty's judges from his post. That is why we have not proposed a simple majority in the normal way, but instead will require that a significant number of Members of the Scottish Parliament should be satisfied that the Government's actions are justified and appropriate.

I agree with the hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Mr. Campbell) that it is a question of balance. The Government believe that we have struck the right balance. It is a serious issue—I hope that my comments reflect that fact—and, on that basis, I ask the hon. and learned Gentleman not to press his amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 93

POWERS OF COURTS OR TRIBUNALS TO VARY RETROSPECTIVE DECISIONS

Mr. Jenkin: I beg to move amendment No. 24, in page 42, line 2, after first 'to', insert

'the protocol of relevant considerations and to'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 60, in page 42, line 4, at end insert—

'(3A) In subsection (3), "protocol of relevant considerations" means a list of matters to which the court or tribunal is to have regard in exercising its powers under this section.

(3B) The protocol of relevant considerations shall be drawn up by the Secretary of State, after he has first consulted such representatives of the judiciary and others as appear to him to be appropriate.

(3C) The protocol mentioned in subsection (3B) shall not enter into force unless an Order containing it has been laid before, and approved by a resolution of, both House of Parliament and the Scottish Parliament.'.

Mr. Jenkin: As we near the end of this marathon process, it distresses me that we have such a short time in which to deal with the issue of retrospection, which we have not had the opportunity to discuss before now. Clause 93(2) says that, in deciding a devolution issue—that is, the vires of the Scottish or Westminster Parliaments—the "court or tribunal may make an order removing or limiting any retrospective effect of the decision".

Suppose that a sheep farmer in the west of Scotland decides that he is eligible for a grant. The Scottish Office denies it him on the ground that it is beyond the scope of the Parliament's powers to award it—perhaps it is a European Community grant. The matter eventually goes to the highest court and that court decides in the farmer's favour. The decision may have taken many years to reach, and the resulting expenditure would be expensive for the Government, not only because of the individual concerned, but because lots of individuals might be in a similar position. The farmer having won his case, the court could decide to limit or to remove the retrospective effect and decide not to pay out any money to give the Government time to change the rules so that the grant should not be payable.

That is fundamentally a political matter. Our amendment would allow the Secretary of State to draw up criteria by which such essentially political and subjective judgments should be made. What are the relevant considerations that a court should apply, as no legal text or guidance is available to help any court to decide what to do under such circumstances?

It being two hours and fifteen minutes after the commencement of proceedings on consideration of the Bill, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER, pursuant to the Order [13 January] and the Resolution [12 May], put forthwith the Questions necessary for the disposal of proceedings to be concluded at that hour.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. These are most important matters. May I make the naughty point of order that I hope that the other place considers them properly?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has made his naughty point of order. It will be noted.

Schedule 5

RESERVED MATTERS

Mr. McLeish: I beg to move amendment No. 73, in page 59, line 6, leave out from beginning to end of line 7 and insert—

'1. The following aspects of the constitution are reserved matters, that is—

(a) the Crown, including succession to the Crown and a regency,

(b) the Union of the Kingdoms of Scotland and England,

(c) the Parliament of the United Kingdom,

(d) the continued existence of the High Court of Justiciary as a criminal court of first instance and of appeal,

(e) the continued existence of the Court of Session as a civil court of first instance and of appeal.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 58, in page 59, line 31, at end insert—

'5A. Paragraph 1 does not preclude the holding by the Scottish Executive of a referendum on any reserved matter, provided that the decision to hold such a referendum has been approved by a resolution of each House of Parliament.'.

Mr. McLeish: Government amendment No. 73 is clarificatory and makes clear the matters reserved under the heading, "The Constitution". As hon. Members know, we do not have a written constitution in the United Kingdom and there is no clear definition of what the term includes. Comments made by a number of parties make it clear that there is doubt about what the reservation covers. It might have been argued that it included local government or the courts. For the avoidance of doubt, we have decided to specify the matters that are covered by the reservation. The other matters listed are a central feature of the constitution and are required to be reserved to preserve the integrity of the United Kingdom. I shall be brief, because we must debate the wider issues.

Mr. Ancram: The Minister has moved the amendment very swiftly. When I first read it, I was surprised, because it replaced a catch-all provision. At part 1 of schedule 5, the Bill states:

"The constitution, including . . . the succession to the Crown and a regency and the Parliament of the United Kingdom are reserved matters."

The word "including" is important, because it suggests that other matters form part of the constitution. When I first read the Bill, I assumed that the question whether such matters were constitutional would be decided by the courts. Provision has been made in the Bill to decide what are devolved issues and what are not. The broad catch-all provision was sensible, and disputes would have been resolved, but I was surprised, because the amendment restricts what is to be regarded as constitutional to the five provisions that will be inserted into the Bill by amendment No. 73.

So surprised was I that on 7 May I wrote to the Secretary of State:

"In order to inform this Debate I would be grateful if before it you could let me know what the implications of the new amendment are as against the broader and more catch-all provision which it replaces."

I was delighted to receive this morning a letter from the Minister referring to my letter and giving me notes on the amendments. I turned with excitement and anticipation to the note on amendment No. 73, which states that it is a "Government amendment to clarify which aspects of the constitution are reserved."

I am no further forward and, although the Minister has moved the amendment, still no clearer about what has been left out. What is left out is important, because a catch-all provision is being replaced by a specific provision which will weigh heavily in the minds of the courts, which may have to deal with the question of what are devolved matters and what are reserved matters.

I have read the amendment a number of times, and it is difficult to see what has been left out. The Minister said that local government is not included. I had presumed that it was not a constitutional issue and therefore would not arise. I make these inquiries because we must have a clear idea of what the provision will achieve. Although the Parliament of the United Kingdom is a reserved matter and defined as constitutional, are its actings, for example in terms of the exercise of the power under clause 27(7) to legislate for Scotland, regarded as constitutional? Are they included in the definition, or are they outside it and therefore not covered by the reservation of constitutional matters?

The matter concerns the sovereignty of Westminster over the Scottish Parliament, which we have debated at length. I hope that that is a constitutional matter, but whether it is covered by the definition's specific provisions is questionable. That leads to the question that we were debating a week ago, to which amendment No. 58 refers: the holding of referendums and whether that is regarded as constitutional and therefore reserved. I want to explore that issue further. I see nothing in Government amendment No. 73 that tells me that that is the case, so I hope that the Minister will deal with the matter specifically.

The question of referendums is relevant, because I understand from an early sedentary intervention that part of the Liberal Democrat party in Scotland has decided to press for a referendum on the independence question.

Mr. McLeish: Just for the record, I did not want to go into too much detail on the first part of your response, but you are speaking to the amendment. I am happy to expand on our views later.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister needs to be reminded that he is addressing the Chair.

Mr. Ancram: I appreciate that the Minister deliberately did not deal with those issues, but I want to put them firmly on the record as I want clear answers. Whether official or unofficial, there has been a Liberal Democrat call for a referendum on the independence question in Scotland. At the moment, it is within the purview of this House to arrange for such a referendum to be held. What is much more questionable is whether, consequent on devolution and the creation of a Scottish Parliament, the right to hold such a referendum would reside in this House only, or whether it would also be available to a Scottish Parliament. I want to secure assurances from the Minister on that matter.

[Mr. Ancram]

Last week, we had an interesting debate during which the subject was raised with the Secretary of State, perhaps slightly in advance of its time on the amendment paper. I am sorry that he is not in his place, because I had hoped to question him further on language that was characteristically his. It is worth studying the exchanges, because they show a lack of clarity. I said to the Secretary of State:

"I hope that I am not pre-empting our debate on the issue, but the Secretary of State mentioned the Union of the United Kingdom being a reserved matter."

That is part of the Government amendment. I asked:

"Does that mean that a referendum on the Union also will be a reserved matter and not available to the Scottish Parliament?"

The Secretary of State replied:

"It is clear that constitutional change—the political bones of the parliamentary system and any alteration to that system—is a reserved matter. That would obviously include any change or any preparations for change."

Later in his reply, he referred to the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) wanting a referendum. He said:

"It is clear that he cannot find a vehicle for doing that in the machinery laid down in this legislation."

It seems from that reply that the ability of a Scottish Parliament to hold such a referendum was being ruled out. I asked:

"In very simple terms, does that mean that a referendum on Scotland's future in the United Kingdom is within the competence of the Scottish Parliament?"

6.30 pm

The Secretary of State could have said yes or no to that question, depending on his view, but he said:

"If one assumes that that is a way of changing the constitution, no, it is not in the power of the Scottish Parliament to change the constitutional arrangements."

Later in the debate, my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) sought to question the Secretary of State. He asked:

"Would the holding of a referendum be within the competence of the Scottish Parliament?"

The Secretary of State replied:

"A referendum that purported to pave the way for something that was ultra vires is itself ultra vires. That is a view that I take, and one to which I will hold."

The Secretary of State qualified that by saying:

"But, as I said, the sovereignty of the Scottish people, which is often prayed in aid, is still there in the sense that, if they vote for a point of view, for change, and mean that they want that change by their vote, any elected politician in this country must very carefully take that into account."

Rather than getting a straight answer, the jungle was becoming thicker by the moment. Characteristically, the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) sought to cut away the foliage by asking:

"Can the Scottish Parliament of itself initiate a referendum on independence?"

It could not be put straighter than that. The Secretary of State said that he thought that he had answered that, but he went on to say:

"It is my view that matters relating to reserved matters are also reserved. It would not be competent for the Scottish Parliament to spend money on such a matter in those circumstances."—[Official Report, 12 May 1998; Vol. 312, c. 256-57.]

I think that we made some progress because, in the words of the Secretary of State, it would not be possible for the Scottish Parliament to hold a referendum the cost of which came from the financial provisions that will be made for that Parliament. However, the question about whether it is in the competence of that Parliament to hold a referendum was not answered.

I could be facetious and say that the Liberal Democrat party, or the section of it that wishes to have a referendum, could decide to sponsor one and put up the cash for it. As the Scottish Parliament would not have to find the wherewithal, would it be competent to initiate and conduct such a referendum? That is an important matter.

Our amendment is a probing one. The Scottish Parliament could decide to hold a referendum, but the amendment ensures that it could do that only with the consent of both Houses of this Parliament. It would allow the Scottish Parliament to apply to this Parliament as the custodian of the constitution, which is how I understand the Bill, for permission. I do not intend to press the amendment: it is intended only to tease out the situation. However, it is at the heart of the debate because it looks at the relationship between the Edinburgh and Westminster Parliaments.

I understood that it was agreed between the Government and the Opposition that the Westminster Parliament is supreme and could, under the Bill, legislate on all matters in Scotland if it so wished. It also decides on questions of constitutional change because of its supremacy and the sovereignty that is vested in it. The dialogue to which I have referred from last week's debate casts some doubt on that and the matter needs to be clarified.

When we started the debate on the Bill in January, the Government spoke about the creation of a Scottish Parliament in which there would be new politics. They said that there would be sweetness and light and that many questions about the legislation were irrelevant because everybody wanted to see the Parliament working. On that basis, many of our concerns were brushed aside, but now there is a somewhat different political situation. It was assumed that the Scottish Parliament would be a friendly one that was run by some combination of the Scottish Labour party and others and that it would deal in a friendly way with this Parliament. But that is questioned by opinion polls in Scotland and will not necessarily be the case. The idea that dialogue between Westminster and Edinburgh would always be friendly and co-operative is in doubt.

Today's debate and Scottish questions were undermined by the vitriol—that is the only word that I can use—of the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan in addressing some of the issues that we raised about sovereignty. The Minister for Education and Industry, Scottish Office, was vitriolic in his responses to the hon. Gentleman at Scottish questions. The question whether sovereignty ultimately rests here or can be vested under certain conditions in the Scottish Parliament is not theoretical. It cannot be quietly be left on the shelf as if it does not matter. It could become important quickly.

Mr. Salmond: If the right hon. Gentleman thinks that those exchanges were vitriolic, I can only say that he has led a sheltered existence. He said all that in the referendum campaign, but is repeating it as if it has only just been discovered. Perhaps I could refer to Lady Thatcher's celebrated remark. She said, "If the Scots were to determine on independence, no English politician, certainly not me, should gainsay that process." Does the right hon. Gentleman believe that that is still the view of the Conservative party?

Mr. Ancram: Yes, I do, and it was repeated by my right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) when he was Prime Minister. He said that he would not hold any part of the United Kingdom within it against the wishes of the majority of the people in that part. I think that I quote him correctly. Obviously, that is relevant to the debate. The hon. Member for Banff and Buchan says that I am saying nothing new. I know that: I am trying to avoid saying, "I told you so." I predicted all along that that issue would become crucial because of the fact that the extraordinarily sunny picture that was being painted by the Government was simply unreal.

In the referendum campaign, I said that devolution would create a focus for nationalism, which would grow on the back of it. I was told that I did not know what I was talking about, and the Secretary of State for Defence said that devolution would kill nationalism stone dead. We see now that our fears during that campaign were real. If anything, that strengthens my point that these matters need to be clarified before the Bill leaves the House. If matters are left uncertain, they will become the focus for further resentment and anger that will cause friction between the Edinburgh and Westminster Parliaments, and that can only feed the flames of nationalism. We want to avoid that.

As I said, ours is a probing amendment, but I have more than a hope that, before the Bill completes all its stages, there will be clear answers. I hope that the Minister will not think that I am insulting the Secretary of State when I say that I do not think that we got clear answers last week. I hope that he will take this opportunity to give such answers.

Mr. Dalyell: My view is simple and concise. Sooner rather than later there will inevitably be a referendum on the question of independence. Therefore, we should clear up the issue of who has the power to initiate it.

Mr. Salmond: I listened with interest to the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram). He rightly said that the Conservative party said last year in the referendum campaign that devolution would lead to independence. Some official spokesmen for the party said that the process would be inevitable. If they still believe it to be inevitable, I do not see the point of making these speeches. By definition, if something is inevitable, there is no point in trying to resist it, so if the right hon. Gentleman is now disputing the inevitability of the process, we have to conclude that the Conservative party has at least modified its position since the referendum campaign.

Surely the important point is that these arguments were ventilated before the people in the referendum campaign by the Conservative party, and the people gave their answer.

Mr. Ancram indicated dissent.

Mr. Salmond: The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but I recall being on television programmes with him, and he made exactly those points. They were available to the people when they judged the matter, and they gave an answer. He implied that the reason for that was that they did not believe him. Another reason might be that they did not care particularly. The argument from the other side—both from me and the Secretary of State for Scotland—was that it was up to the people to decide the constitutional future of Scotland. When the right hon. Gentleman made those arguments in the referendum campaign, the united answer that he received from the yes forces was that these matters would be determined by the people of Scotland.

Mr. Garnier: I think that the hon. Gentleman will accept that the referendum, which the yes campaign decisively won last summer, took place in ignorance of the Bill. Does that not have some bearing on this debate?

Mr. Salmond: The referendum was informed by a White Paper that gave a detailed explanation of what we could expect from the Bill. Certainly what would be a reserved matter in terms of the constitution was in the White Paper, but the answer given by the yes forces was very clear, and it was given on a number occasions.

I had a number of meetings with the Secretary of State in that period. I asked him a number of times in the House what his answer was. I particularly remember 24 July 1997, when I specifically asked him whether there would be any attempt to put up obstacles or roadblocks to stop the Scottish Parliament from developing, if the people so chose, into an independent Parliament. He gave a specific answer:

> "If I did try to build such barriers, they would be futile and without effect. At the end of the day, in practical politics, what matters is what people want. If the hon. Gentleman is able to carry the people of Scotland, no doubt he will be able to advance his cause."—[Official Report, 24 July 1997; Vol. 298, c. 1049.]

There was no doubt or dubiety whatever. The Secretary of State clarified that there was to be no glass ceiling in these proposals. They envisaged a devolved Parliament within the state of the United Kingdom, but the sovereign right of the Scottish people to choose to change that arrangement, if they so wished, was upheld.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): Does the hon. Gentleman not accept that, on two occasions last year—first at the general election and then in the referendum—the population of Scotland voted for a Unionist position: first, for Unionist parties in the general election and then for devolution within a United Kingdom, for which he campaigned?

Mr. Salmond: I did not see the hon. Gentleman very much in the campaign. I was told that he was on holiday in America at one stage in the campaign. [Interruption.] If I am wrong, I gladly apologise.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Salmond: No, I will not give way to my old university friend.

[Mr. Salmond]

I repeat the point that I did not see very much of the hon. Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox) during the devolution campaign, but if he saw much of me during that campaign, he would know explicitly that the yes side argued that, although we had different objectives for Scotland's future, the thing that united us was that we accepted the right of the people of Scotland to decide their future.

The hon. Member has asked me about the last general election. I would have thought that the Conservative party, which ended up with zero seats in Scotland—nul point, as the hon. Member for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Davidson) is fond of pointing out—would be the last party to say that the last general election was a final determination of the state of Scottish politics. The hon. Gentleman prays in aid a victory for the Labour party as a victory for his position. I am sure that there are people in the Labour party who would be very upset about that argument. Clearly, the last general election decided the last general election. The Scottish election will decide the Scottish election. No doubt the next general election will make a decision.

Democracy does not stop at a point in time. The whole point about democracy is that if people lose an argument, they have the right and ability to re-present that argument. Scotland was an independent state for 1,000 years. It then made a decision not to be an independent state. If it chooses to reverse that decision, it has the absolute right to do so.

Before the hon. Member for Woodspring diverted me, I was going through some of the quotations from the Secretary of State for Scotland. I come to one that specifically looks at how that sovereignty might be exercised:

"Although the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan is in favour of a multi-option referendum as a general principle, when it comes—if it ever does—to the point where he wishes to implement a specific constitutional scheme, he should put that to the people of Scotland in a single-question referendum to get it endorsed."—[Official Report, 4 June 1997; Vol. 295, c. 433-34.]

The Secretary of State advised me that that was the right and proper methodology to use if I wanted argue the case for independence and have it put before the people—I was to put it before the people in a single-question referendum. I find it a bit surprising that, less than a year later, the same Secretary of State is now, in pejorative terms, daily accusing me of doing exactly what he advised last June.

What has changed between last June and this May? The most significant change is that, last June, the Labour party was 30 points clear in the opinion polls and, this May, it is five points behind.

Mr. Dalyell: As the hon. Gentleman knows, not since Mephistopheles made a bargain with Dr. Faust has there been anything quite like him and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland coming together. It was a Faustian bargain because they both knew that they wanted different things.

I ask the serious question: what is the hon. Gentleman's interpretation of my right hon. Friend's undertaking at that time in relation to a referendum? For the sake of clarity, what does he think was promised by the Secretary of State?

Mr. Salmond: The position is absolutely clear in the Hansard of 4 June last year. That was repeated to me at private meetings and in the press. On 16 May in The Herald, the Secretary of State made it clear that no "glass ceiling" would be built. He said:

"The only way in which we could move to independence would be if people voted for independence. That is clearly their right and I would not wish to deny them their right", ruling out any trick in the White Paper. When I specifically asked the Secretary of State about the reserved matter of the constitution in the Bill, he repeated that that was overridden by the Scottish people's sovereign right to express their wish for independence, if they so chose to do, that this was a point in time and that if the Scottish National party, the independence forces, won their argument, they would have their case resolved.

Mr. Swayne: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Salmond: No.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) is a fair-minded man. He knows that I have argued consistently for a position, as he has. He was with me on television programmes last year when both the Secretary of State and I answered his specific point by saying, "It is up to the people to decide."

The arguments of the Conservative Front-Bench team have an air of total unreality. There is the apparent belief that it can find a mechanism, an amendment, a clause, a statement from the Government Front-Bench team, an expression of view by the Secretary of State, by the Minister for Home Affairs and Devolution, or by a Labour Member, which could somehow stop the process of sovereignty in the Scottish people. It cannot be done in that fashion. No amendment or clause can erect the roadblock that the Secretary of State promised would not be there.

Mr. Swayne: I do not think that anyone is questioning the sovereign right of the Scottish people to opt for independence, should they so wish. We are discussing merely the proper means by which that process will arise.

Mr. Salmond: That is why I quoted—I know that the hon. Gentleman was listening carefully—the advice given to me, on 4 June 1997, by the Secretary of State for Scotland. He told me that if it comes to a point at which I wish to implement a constitutional scheme, I should put the scheme to the people of Scotland in a single-question referendum. I suggest to the House that I could put the matter to the people of Scotland only if I were in the majority party, or the leader of a coalition, in the Scottish Parliament. I cannot see myself as Prime Minister in this place, or commanding a majority in accepting such a scheme. The words of the Secretary of State for Scotland can be interpreted only in that way.

It is a bit rich, and a bit late, for that certainty—that democratic point of view—which was crystallised and repeated many times last year by the Secretary of State for Scotland, to have undergone a transition this year, because of a change in the nature of Scotland's opinion polls. What manner of politics is it that bases an argument on democracy on the latest position of a few public opinion polls?

Mr. Dalyell: This is a very important discussion indeed in terms of the British constitution. In the presence of the Whips—I do not care who knows it—I want to know, as a Labour Member of Parliament, why the Secretary of State for Scotland has something better to do than to be in the House of Commons at this point? This is a House of Commons point, and I am an old House of Commons traditionalist. On this particular issue, the place for the Secretary of State for Scotland—Cabinet Committee meeting or not—is on the Treasury Bench. I hope that the Whip registers that.

Mr. Salmond: That was an intervention for me, but an observation for the Labour party. I should tell the hon. Member that there are several crisis points in the Labour party in Scotland. Perhaps the Secretary of State is dealing with one of the other crises, rather than with us in the Chamber.

Despite the Secretary of State's absence, there is no shortage of quotations from him. I have another half dozen of them with me, which I shall not read out now. Nevertheless, Ministers should remember that those quotes, and the notes of various meetings that I have had with the Secretary of State, are on the record and can be prayed in aid.

It is ridiculous to try to block the democratic sovereign right of the Scottish people, and the parties that try to do so will not gain any benefit. For 20 years or more, the Tories tried to do it, and the result of that and other measures was that they were perceived—in the words of the previous Secretary of State for Scotland—as being "anti-Scottish". They were perceived as such not necessarily because of the views that they held but because of their attempt, in one way or another, to deny the Scottish people the right to decide their own destiny. Regardless of its views on other matters, any party that makes an argument that one can deprive people of that right will fall into the same trap as the Tory party did for so long.

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman is touching on an important point. Does he believe that the type of roadblock that he fears is or is not being created by Government amendment No. 73? I am trying to clarify that point. It is essential that we should have the answer to that question before the Bill is passed by this place.

Mr. Salmond: I do not think that such a roadblock would be created by the Government amendment, although one would be created by amendment No. 58, which was tabled by the right hon. Gentleman. That is why, if he had the courage to press it to the vote, I should take the greatest pleasure in voting against it.

We have to distinguish between the Parliament's legislative competence and its right to discuss, decide and consult on anything that it wishes. We have to distinguish between the Parliament's legislative competence and whether it can "pray in aid"—to use the Secretary of State for Scotland's own words—the sovereign right of the Scottish people to determine their own future. I think that the right hon. Member for Devizes will find that that view is well supported by eminent Scottish lawyers and academics. It is certainly the view I take.

I do not mind that the settlement is a devolution one—I never have. The only question that I have asked the Secretary of State—and the Minister of State, as he can verify—is whether the Scottish people have the right to move on if they so wish. I am genuinely saddened that the confident democratic answer given last year by the Secretary of State for Scotland has been replaced this year by a much more equivocal and muddied one. It would be far better if all of us were to accept that sovereign right, stop trying to move the goalposts and let the Scottish people determine their own national destiny.

Mr. McAllion: Like the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond), I cannot foresee his ever being the Prime Minister or commanding a Scottish National party majority in this place. As he well knows, it is not in the nature of the beast.

I tell my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) that, although certainly he can tell the Secretary of State for Scotland what he thinks, through the Whips, I certainly would not—as I await an interview for the Scottish Parliament—dream of doing any such thing—[Interruption.] I am only, at the very outset, setting the tone of my speech.

I was relieved to hear that amendment No. 58 is only a probing amendment. I thought that the Tory party was trying to facilitate constitutional referendums in Scotland. As the Tories have spent 18 years frustrating such referendums, that really would have been one for the book.

I tell the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) that he cannot call in aid the state of current opinion polls in arguing that devolution will necessarily fan the flames of nationalism and lead to an independent Scotland. If he carefully examines opinion polls in Scotland, he will see that the SNP is ahead of Labour only in elections to the Scottish Parliament. Scottish voters realise very well that electing a large SNP contingent to the Scottish Parliament is not the same as voting for independence. Scottish voters are being very discriminating in how they are indicating their voting intentions in the next election.

I felt that I had to speak in this debate because of the attack by the right hon. Member for Devizes on an individual Liberal Democrat Member, for daring to come out in favour of a referendum. Today, I seem to have caused some controversy by saying that I, too, am in favour of an early referendum on whether Scotland should remain with a devolved Parliament inside the United Kingdom or move to independence in Europe. It seems that I am now—unintentionally—at odds with my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench.

I was merely stating what I believe to be the case. I make it clear that, in any such referendum, I would vote for Scotland to remain within the United Kingdom, and for the devolved Parliament to be the way forward for Scottish government. The differences between Ministers and me is only about tactics, and about what is in the Labour party's best interests. I believe that it is certainly in Labour's interests to hold an earlier rather than a later referendum, because the current mood in Scotland is very different from what it might be in five or 10 years' time. We will have to consider that fact.

[Mr. McAllion]

I have several concerns about Government amendment No. 73, which I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will try to deal with in his reply. Paragraph 1(b) of the amendment would seem to exclude any matter of from being dealt with by the Scottish Parliament, in a referendum or by any other device. The provision seems to be a type of blocking mechanism designed to stop the Scottish people, through their elected representatives in the Scottish Parliament, from ever reaching any decision on whether Scotland should remain inside or outside of the United Kingdom.

The Government amendment seems to require a vote in this place before a referendum could be held to discover the views of the Scottish people—thereby giving a veto to the majority of non-Scottish Members in this place, allowing them to prevent the Scottish people from ever having an opportunity to vote in such a referendum. If that were the case, I should be very concerned about the amendment. Many years ago, when many of my right hon. and hon. Friends and I signed the Claim of Right for Scotland, we were unequivocal in stating that sovereignty lay with the Scottish people, and only with the Scottish people. We signed up to the Claim of Right for Scotland, and we signed up to the sovereignty of the Scottish people. We should be standing by what we believed in 1989.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest): Does the hon. Gentleman think that if action is taken that fundamentally alters the whole of the United Kingdom, the whole of the United Kingdom should be part of the decision-making process, at least through the United Kingdom Parliament?

Mr. McAllion: I might be prepared to take that argument a little more seriously if it were applied in Northern Ireland, for example. Friday's referendum does not involve the whole of the United Kingdom; nor should it. As I was saying, the Labour party is committed to the Claim of Right for Scotland and to the concept of the sovereignty of the Scottish people. If the Scottish people decide on independence, it would not matter whether 500 or 600 Tory Members in this place were opposed to the Scottish people breaking away from the United Kingdom. They would have no right to stop them from breaking away, if it was based on the democratic view of the Scottish people. Even Mrs. Thatcher was prepared to accept that much. I am surprised that the hon. Lady is at odds with her great heroine.

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right that if the Scottish people demand independence, it is game, set and match to the Scottish National party. The question is whether it is right in the United Kingdom constitution for the Scottish Parliament to be able to facilitate that process. Does he think that there is any limit on the powers that the Scottish Parliament can demand, argue for, campaign for, spend money on campaigning for or hold referendums on? Is there anything on which it cannot spend money? If he thinks that there is not, we are establishing a sovereign Scottish Parliament and an à la carte United Kingdom, which I do not suppose he favours for the European Union, for example.

Mr. McAllion: The hon. Gentleman paints a distorted picture of reality. I ask him in turn how this Parliament will stop a majority in the Scottish Parliament deciding that they should hold a referendum on the future constitutional position of Scotland? It is all very well for this Parliament to say that it is not in the competence of the Scottish Parliament to spend any taxpayers' money—even if it is raised by the Scottish Parliament's right to vary income tax—on holding a referendum, but how does it stop the Scottish Parliament? Is anyone seriously arguing for sending troops to prevent the holding of a referendum in Scotland and the Scottish people having a say on the future constitutional set-up under which they wish to live? Of course a referendum could not be stopped. If a majority in the Scottish Parliament ever decide that they want to hold a referendum, there will be very little that this Parliament can do.

One only has to look back to the previous Tory Government to realise that very little can be done. Strathclyde regional council decided that it would hold a referendum on the future structure of the water and sewerage industry in Scotland. The Government of the day did not want it to do that. They may even have decided that it was not competent to do so and that it should not be wasting local taxpayers' money on such a referendum, but the region went ahead with the referendum and it had an effect on the Government of the day. Even with a big majority in the House, the Tory Government had to back down because it was clear that the Scottish people thought that the water and sewerage industry should remain in the public sector. Even a Government who were committed to privatisation had to accept that. That is the reality with which we are dealing.

Mr. Salmond: The hon. Gentleman has done well to remind his Front-Bench team of the Claim of Right, which dealt with such issues explicitly. Does his memory of the referendum campaign accord with the quotations that I have cited? There was not a Faustian bargain, as the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) suggested; there was a very clear agreement which allowed the Scottish people to determine the future of our country.

Mr. McAllion: I understand that that is the policy of my party. It has been made clear on several occasions that the Labour party is a democratic party and would accept whatever democratic decision the Scottish people took. In fact, I think that every political party in the House holds that position. I know of no hon. Member who would seriously argue that if a majority of the Scottish people want to go down the road towards independence in Europe, this House should try to block their wishes. Surely nobody in a democracy would argue that.

Mr. Ancram: At the risk of ruining the hon. Gentleman's chances in his future selection contest, is he saying that he disagrees with the Secretary of State when he said last week to the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) that "he cannot find a vehicle for doing that"— holding a referendum—

"in the machinery laid down in this legislation"?—[Official Report, 12 May 1998; Vol. 312, c. 256.]

Mr. McAllion: I am not disagreeing—partly because I was not here. I had a constituency week last week; I was somewhere else. I was certainly not watching the proceedings of the House on cable television. I have far better things to do with my time.

I am trying to put across the point that we are not dealing with some inferior institution. We are dealing with a Parliament that will be elected under—in my view—a much fairer democratic system and will reflect the views of the Scottish people. It will be a democratically elected Parliament consisting of 129 Members who will be every bit as competent to decide on such issues as anyone in this House. It is not for us to instruct them on what they can or cannot do with the budget that has been devolved to them. If we continue to try to block what a Scottish Parliament wants or does not want to do, there will be constant friction and fighting between the two Parliaments, which will play into the hands of the Scottish National party. That is why we should not be trying to place such constraints on the Scottish Parliament in anticipation of what might happen many years down the road.

Trying to put in place such constraints betrays an acute lack of confidence in our position. I am in favour of an early referendum in Scotland because the Scottish people want a devolved Parliament in the United Kingdom and do not want to move to independence in Europe. When the new Parliament is up and running, most Scots will be wishing it well and hoping that it starts to improve the government of their country. The last thing that they will want is another constitutional upheaval.

I think that that is also the view of the Scottish National party—although its members would never admit it publicly. The last thing that they want is a referendum in the first or second year of the Scottish Parliament because they know what the result will be. If there were an overwhelming endorsement of Scotland remaining in the United Kingdom, the SNP's case for independence would be put back at least 10 years—and SNP Members know it. They hope that there is not an early referendum; they hope that they do not get a majority in the Scottish Parliament. [HON. MEMBERS: "Come on."] It will be very difficult for any party to get a majority in the Scottish Parliament under proportional representation.

If the Westminster Parliament continues to block the Scottish Parliament's rights to do this or that, it will add to the sense of grievance in Scotland against the Westminster Parliament. Who benefits from any such grievance? None of the parties that argues for remaining in the UK will benefit; only the SNP will benefit. We should not be making it easier for the SNP. In arguing our corner, we should be making it more difficult for the SNP and showing confidence in our position.

It is tactically inept to put off the question of a referendum. If there are years of friction between the Scottish and Westminster Parliaments and if the view is maintained in Scotland that the Scottish Parliament has been held back from doing what it wants to do on behalf of the Scottish people due to politicians in Westminster, the case for independence in any future referendum will be boosted. It is in our interests to hold an early referendum, get the issue out of the way for at least 10 years and get down to governing Scotland properly.

Mr. Wallace: This is an important debate. I hope that it is common ground between the four parties that no one has ever suggested that the Scottish Parliament established by the Bill could claim independence for Scotland or become an independent Parliament. To that extent, many of us have always thought that, as amendment No. 73 states, the Union of the kingdoms of Scotland and England is a reserved matter. That should not come as any surprise. We run into difficulty on whether there can be a referendum on a reserved matter. The notorious—or famous—clause 28 states that an Act of the Scottish Parliament would not be law so far as the Act related to a reserved matter. The question is whether a reserved matter in this case is the Union between Scotland and England or—if it were an advisory referendum—the holding of referendums. If it is the latter, I do not see any problem. Clarification would be useful so that the principle of holding a referendum does not become contentious.

Amendment No. 58, tabled by the Conservative party, helps only to the extent that it is a clarification. It does not help that it would require an appeal to Westminster for orders to be granted.

Mr. Grieve: The hon. and learned Gentleman will recollect that, last week, with great difficulty, it was extracted from the Secretary of State that he was quite satisfied that it would be ultra vires for the Scottish Parliament to hold a referendum.

Mr. Wallace: The Secretary of State has expressed that view, but, at the end of the day, that might be a matter for the courts to interpret. That is why it would be better if the matter were cleared up in the Bill.

Even the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) seems to accept that facilitating a referendum could not be achieved by legislation. An article that I happened to glance at in today's edition of The Scotsman says:

> "Mr. Salmond said this could be done as long as the referendum was not set up by an act of the Scottish Parliament, which could be challenged as being outwith the competence of Holyrood."

No doubt, if there were some other way—if a referendum were sponsored by Stagecoach, for example—a referendum could go ahead.

Mr. Salmond: The hon. and learned Gentleman can relax; I shall not refer to the rest of the article in The Scotsman. I was quoting Professor Colin Munro, professor of constitutional law at Edinburgh university, who said:

> "You have to make the distinction between the reserved powers and what parliament can debate and discuss . . . there is nothing to stop the parliament arranging to hold a referendum, because that would not involve a change in the law. The actual separation of Scotland from the rest of the UK would be a Westminster decision, but Labour have already said they would regard a majority vote in favour . . . as a vote for independence".

Mr. Wallace: Arranging to hold a referendum might involve passing a law. The referendums on accession to the European Community in 1975, on the Scottish and Welsh Parliaments in 1979, in Wales and Scotland last year and in Northern Ireland later this week were all arranged by Acts of Parliament.

Mr. Salmond: And the Strathclyde water referendum.

Mr. Wallace: The hon. Gentleman mentions the Strathclyde water referendum, which I remember well and which my colleague, Councillor Christopher Mason, managed to persuade Strathclyde region to hold. Labour Members scoffed and told me in the Lobby that that was a terribly bad idea and that we should not hold it because we might get the wrong result, but the result was overwhelming and Labour Members were only too pleased to use it to twist the tail of the Conservative Government. Since that referendum was held, legislation has been passed that would not allow it to be repeated. Strathclyde region could never pass an Act of Parliament. The hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) may agree that it would help to clarify the point about the holding of a referendum.

There is a further question of the wisdom of having a referendum, which is a point on which I do not agree with the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan.

Mr. Salmond: The hon. and learned Gentleman has said that he wants clarity, but he has not told us his view.

Mr. Garnier: He is a Liberal—he does not have views.

Mr. Salmond: That is not fair. Does the hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) believe that the Scottish Parliament should have such a power, regardless of whether he thinks that to exercise it would be wise?

Mr. Wallace: It would be better if the power existed; whether it is exercised is another matter, which brings me to the hon. Gentleman's position. He suggested that democracy is standing still. I do not say this in a pejorative sense, but his party is a single-issue party. It exists for only one purpose—to get independence for Scotland. That is a perfectly legitimate aim.

Ms Roseanna Cunningham (Perth): At least we have a purpose.

Mr. Wallace: The hon. Lady makes a silly remark, but, during the by-election in her constituency, the Conservative party made an outrageous attack on her party on the anniversary of VE-day, when it tried to compare the Scottish National party to the nationalism that existed in Europe—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. The hon. and learned Gentleman must address the Chair.

Mr. Wallace: In Europe in 1939, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mrs. Laing: It is the same.

Mr. Wallace: The hon. Lady ought to withdraw that remark.

Mr. Garnier: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Would you ask the hon. and learned Gentleman to return to the matter under discussion, rather than airing a private grief?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a matter for the Chair.

Mr. Wallace: The Scottish National party has always argued its case through the ballot box. At every election in Scotland—general elections and Scottish elections—we have a referendum on whether the people of Scotland want independence. At the most recent general election, the overwhelming majority rejected independence, and I believe that they will do so again. If the Scottish National party managed to get a majority of votes, it would have a mandate to hold a referendum and put the case for independence. Until that happens, Scottish nationalists must accept that the electorate has that opportunity at the ballot box.

No new Parliament—once it had been set up and was getting on with its task of discussing Scotland's jobs, housing, education and health service—would want to be distracted. It would inevitably be distracted if it had also to debate the constitutional issue that has distracted our intention from other issues for far too long.

Mr. Malcolm Chisholm (Edinburgh, North and Leith): I want to focus not on whether the Parliament could have a referendum—a matter which I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister of State will address—but on the topical question of whether it should do so, particularly in its early years.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) said that it was in the interests of the Labour party to hold such a referendum. However, we should be acting, here and in the Scottish Parliament, in the interests not of the Labour party but of the Scottish people. That will be a key issue in the run-up to the Scottish parliamentary elections. Everything that we do must be directed towards making the Parliament work for Scotland. Our argument is that the SNP wants to make the Parliament work for the SNP, which is what the referendum policy is about, so Labour Members should not use a similar argument to say that the Parliament should work for the Labour party.

This is an exciting venture, to which all the people of Scotland are looking forward, and for which the vast majority of them voted. All our energies must be directed towards making the Parliament work for Scotland on the issues that concern its people, such as health, education, jobs and child care. I mention child care because the first-ever child care strategy was launched today.

The hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) referred to a glass ceiling. No party in this House—here I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East—has ever said that there is a glass ceiling. Even the previous Prime Minister said that the people of Scotland would get independence if they voted for it. As the hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) said, the people of Scotland have a continuing chance to vote for independence. It will be perfectly clear, through the votes cast for the SNP, whether the people of Scotland support independence. Notwithstanding the current protest votes in Scotland, people are not, at present, voting for independence.

Mr. McLeish: Many people in my constituency will, like me, be astonished that, after the 55 weeks that it has taken to get to the point at which the Bill will have completed all its stages in the House, the 100 years for which this aspiration has existed in Scotland and the 20 years for which a movement for change has existed, we are now debating this matter. It has been graphically illustrated that the people of Scotland want a Parliament that will deal with the issues that they feel need to be addressed. They do not want the Parliament to be turned into a constitutional circus—that is not its aim.

We have worked for 55 weeks to ensure that we have a substantive legislative framework to move Scotland forward in the next century. We have done so around a consensus arrived at on 11 September and on 1 May last year. When we are talking about the will of the people and their votes, I am reminded that the Conservative party has no Members of Parliament in Scotland. I am reminded also that the Scottish National party has six Members out of a possible 72—

Ms Cunningham: Wait until next year.

Mr. McLeish: I look forward with relish to that contest. I am reminded also that one party, now represented in government, got 56 seats out of 72. Let us have a little pragmatism and perspective on an issue that is in danger of becoming abstract.

Mr. Garnier rose—

Mr. McLeish: I am not giving way.

Mr. Garnier: Will the Minister give way on clause 29?

Mr. McLeish: I am not giving way at this stage.

In a curious way, when people talk about the sovereign right of the people, there is no debate, because people vote in a representative democracy, but another issue, which has been confused with that, is the rights and responsibilities of the Parliament that we have proposed over the past 55 weeks. A third tier has been brought into the problems—the constitutional underpinning and the logic inherent in the Scotland Bill. It is easy for right hon. and hon. Members to get the three issues mixed up, each for their own convenience. It is crucial to say that we are discussing a Bill which sets out matters clearly.

I take exception to the way in which quotes of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State have been bandied about in the Chamber and the press. There is nothing unclear about my right hon. Friend's position on an issue that has been raised by Conservative Members in a so-called probing amendment.

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman can clear up the matter once and for all. I shall put to him the question that the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) put to the Secretary of State: can the Scottish Parliament initiate a referendum on Scottish independence—yes or no?

Mr. McLeish: The right hon. Gentleman should give me time to get to the central point. On 12 May, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said:

"A referendum that purported to pave the way for something that was ultra vires is itself ultra vires."

One does not need expert lawyers to consider that in detail and interpret its meaning. Am I wrong in thinking that what the Secretary of State has been saying is consistent not only on that point, but on the sovereignty of the people? In a similar vein, also on 12 May, the Secretary of State said:

"But, as I said, the sovereignty of the Scottish people, which is often prayed in aid, is still there in the sense that, if they vote for a point of view, for change, and mean that they want that change by their vote, any elected politician in this country must very carefully take that into account.—[Official Report, 12 May 1998; Vol. 312, c. 256.]

In previous debates, my right hon. Friend has captured the essence of linking the sovereignty of the people to the constitutional underpinning that forms the core of the Bill.

The whimpering of the so-called official Opposition shows that they do not recognise the fact that 11 September meant that we should go forward. For the Government, that is what the Bill is about. This has been an extensive debate, and many right hon. and hon. Members have participated in it; far be it from a Minister to be criticised for trying to stifle such a debate. Clearly, the Government do not support amendment No. 58—

It being three hours and fifteen minutes after the commencement of proceedings on consideration of the Bill, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER, pursuant to the Order [13 January] and the Resolution [12 May], put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McLeish: I beg to move amendment No. 231, in page 59, line 16, leave out 'Crown Estate Commissioners' and insert

'management (in accordance with any enactment regulating the use of land) of the Crown Estate'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: Government amendment No. 232.

No. 96, in page 78, line 22, at end insert—

'The subject of land reform in Scotland is not a reserved matter, notwithstanding the reservation of the Crown Estate Commissioners in Part I of this Schedule and of business associations under Head 3 of Part II of this Schedule.'.

No. 113, in schedule 7, page 85, line 8, at end insert—

6A.—(1) The Crown Estate Act 1961 is amended as follows—

(2) In section 1(4)—

(a) after each "Secretary of State" add "or the Scottish Executive"

(b) after second "Scotland" omit "Secretary of State" and insert "Scottish Executive".

(3) In section 2(1) (Reports and accounts of Commissioners), at end add "and the Scottish Parliament.".'.

Mr. McLeish: May I stress at the outset that, under the Government's proposals, the Crown Estate will be subject to the Scottish Parliament's legislation on devolved matters, such as land law including land tenure reform, planning, environmental protection and fisheries, in the same way as all other land in Scotland?

Amendment No. 231 is a technical amendment intended to make the position of the Crown Estate Commissioners clear, and it may be helpful if I set out precisely what is intended in respect of the commissioners. The Crown is reserved and the Crown Estate Commissioners are included as part of that reservation. However, it is intended that, although the functions of the commissioners in managing the Crown Estate should be reserved, the property and interests that form the Crown Estate should not be reserved.

The Scottish Parliament would, for example, be able to legislate to implement the proposals announced by my noble Friend the Under-Secretary responsible for agriculture, fisheries and the environment, to extend the role of planning authorities to cover marine fish farming. The Under-Secretary responsible for local government and housing, my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald), announced on 17 December that new statutory procedures for the control of the dredging of marine minerals in Scotland would be introduced to replace the existing non-statutory procedure. That, too, would be within the legislative competence of the Scottish Parliament.

Mr. Garnier: The reserved matters are defined in schedule 5; we know that from clause 29, subsection (2) of which says:

"Her Majesty may by Order in Council make any modifications of that Schedule which She considers necessary or expedient."

What modifications did the Government envisage in drafting that subsection? How would they affect not only the matters that we were discussing a moment ago but the matters that the Minister is trying to discuss now?

Mr. McLeish: Government amendments Nos. 231 and 232 deal with the issues surrounding the reservation of the Crown and the Crown Estate Commissioners. The essence of the discussion is to highlight, relative to the concerns that have been raised, the powers of the Scottish Parliament in that respect. There is some misunderstanding about the reservation of the Crown Estate and the Crown Estate Commissioners, and I am attempting to clear it up.

Mr. Garnier rose—

Mr. McLeish: No, I do not want to give way, because we need to make some progress. It is important that we discuss some of the other amendments that the Opposition have tabled, and if I catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall want to talk about them at a later stage.

Amendment No. 232 makes it clear that the reservation of the hereditary revenues of the Crown does not include revenues from bona vacantia, ultimus haeres or treasure trove. That is a bit of a mouthful, but it means matters that the Crown can take over. Such matters are devolved as property belonging to Her Majesty in right of the Crown.

I am sure that hon. Members will agree that, as they are matters dealt with distinctly under Scots law, it is appropriate that ultimus haeres, bona vacantia and treasure trove should be devolved. The revenues from bona vacantia and ultimus haeres and the benefit from treasure trove will accrue to the Scottish Consolidated Fund. The Queen's and Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer, who is responsible for administering ultimus haeres, is also devolved.

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: I shall speak to amendments Nos. 96 and 113, which stand in my name and in those of my hon. Friends. With the present debate, we are returning to the issue of land reform—a subject which has exercised a great many people and been the subject of much political debate in Scotland. I am sorry that the hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) is not in his place now, after his claim that my party was a single-issue party. From that, I can only presume that the hon. and learned Gentleman does not think that land reform is an issue. I do. Land reform is an issue for the Scottish National party, and has been for a considerable time.

During the passage of the Bill, we have had several opportunities to explore what I see as the potential barriers that it could place in the path of radical land reform in Scotland. Amendment No. 96 identifies two of those—the reservations of business associations and of the Crown Estate Commissioners. It offers the Government the opportunity to confirm that the Parliament will be free to legislate in any way that it sees fit to move forward with land reform proposals.

Government amendment No. 231 goes part of the way to allay my concerns, and I was grateful to hear what the Minister said about it. It restates the actual nature of the reservation, which focuses on the management of the Crown Estate, and confirms that the Crown Estate will not escape from the general structure of land reform legislation.

However, the alterations do not go far enough. Indeed, they confirm the points that I sought to raise in Committee. Government amendment No. 232 devolves responsibility for certain elements of residual Crown finance. The Government have seen fit to devolve revenue in three areas. One is treasure trove, which in plain language means discovered treasure. Another is the Crown inheritance of certain types of property, such as when businesses are in dissolution and what, according to "The Oxford Companion to Law", are "waifs and estrays". Apparently, waifs and strays are classified as a form of income, although I am not sure how that would come about. That heading also includes beached whales and wrecks; I am not sure how many Members present tonight would come into that category.

However, it is clear that some issues critical to future land reform are not devolved. Those are the Crown Estate Commissioners' control of the foreshore, the sea bed, mineral rights and salmon, and of the revenues that accrue from those rights. The Government amendments are not enough. Any meaningful land reform will have to include the option of transferring control and revenues from the Crown's residual ownership of the foreshore, sea bed and mineral rights. Those are sources of income that could be used to revitalise our rural areas and enhance community involvement in the management of land—a subject which I have dealt with in detail in earlier debates.

Mr. Garnier: I tried to invite the Minister to clarify a certain point, but he seemed unable or unwilling to do so. I wonder whether the hon. Lady could help me. All the points raised by the amendments that she has tabled to schedule 5 could be rendered useless if an Order in Council were passed under clause 29(2), which says:

"Her Majesty may by Order in Council make any modifications of that Schedule which She considers necessary or expedient."

Is the hon. Lady confident that the schedule that she seeks to amend could not simply be wiped out by an Order in Council passed in the House late at night?

Ms Cunningham: With all due respect to the hon. and learned Gentleman, I am not sure whether that is what we are debating now. We had an opportunity to debate that aspect at an earlier stage and, if he will forgive me, I do not want to be drawn down that avenue now.

To return to the matter in hand, let me say that amendment No. 113 focuses on a problem identified in Committee. As the law currently stands, the Secretary of State for Scotland has wide-ranging powers of direction over the Crown Estate Commissioners in relation to their activities in Scotland. That power is contained in the Crown Estate Act 1961.

That power confirms the overall democratic control of the Crown Estate land, and the distinctive needs of the Scottish estate are confirmed by the sole power of the Secretary of State to direct the commissioners in relation to Scotland.

Amendment No. 113 would have two effects. First, it would transfer those powers that are currently held by the Secretary of State to the Scottish Executive. I wonder whether the Minister trusts the Scottish Parliament to carry out the functions with which the Secretary of State is entrusted. What happened in the discussions between the Government and the Crown Estate Commissioners that led to the decision not to devolve the Secretary of State's responsibilities? In the answer that I received today to a written question that I had tabled, I was told that no meetings had taken place between the Secretary of State and the first Crown Estate Commissioner to discuss land reform in Scotland, but that officials were in touch with the Crown Estate on the matter. I want in particular to know about the devolution of powers relating to the commissioners.

7.30 pm

Dr. Fox: May I take the hon. Lady back to the debate on land reform that took place only a few weeks ago? She said then:

"The SNP seeks a people's land reform for Scotland. That means information, management, development, access and ultimate ownership of the land by and for the people of Scotland. Land reform must go beyond mere technical tinkering with the basic land law in Scotland."—[Official Report, 29 April 1998; Vol. 311, c. 247.]

How will amendments Nos. 96 and 113 take that process forward? What will be the role of the Scottish Parliament in the transfer of Crown Estate land?

Ms Cunningham: I am not sure to which debate the hon. Gentleman refers—land reform has been discussed a number of times in our consideration of the Bill, and recently there was an Adjournment debate on the matter. We are now focusing on the ownership of foreshore, sea bed and mineral rights; the resolution of that issue is vital if we are to move forward land reform in Scotland.

It will come as no surprise that the consensus in Scotland is that land reform is a necessity—it is likely to be an early priority of the Scottish Parliament. We may differ slightly on what we want—some of us may want to go much further than others—but there is no doubt that land reform will be on the agenda. The amendments would make it absolutely clear that the Scottish Parliament will not face difficulties in coming up against the reserved power. I hope that the Minister will enlighten us on the discussions with the Crown Estate Commissioners on the devolution of the Secretary of State's powers over them.

Amendment No. 113 would ensure that, even in relation to the Crown Estate, there was no question that the Scottish Parliament would be prevented from taking the steps that it thought necessary to maximise economic and community access to all aspects of the land, which perhaps answers the question asked by the hon. Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox). It would open up access to the resources that are currently under the commissioners' control—mineral rights, salmon rights, the sea bed and the foreshore. It would open the door to meaningful land reform.

In his pre-general-election manifestation—before he became a Minister—the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) made a radical call for control over those rights. I shall not quote his words verbatim, as I did so in the Adjournment debate that has been mentioned, but he was speaking in the House about legislation introduced by the previous Government. I do not understand why the Bill cannot go further on land reform, especially in relation to the Crown Estate Commissioners.

The second key effect of amendment No. 113 would be to introduce a requirement for the Crown Estate Commissioners to present reports not only to Westminster but to the Scottish Parliament. That would be a basic step. Even if the Minister does not accept the amendments in full, I hope that he will at least consider imposing that requirement and confirm that the Crown Estate Commissioners will be among the bodies that the Scottish Parliament can summon as witnesses. That will be essential when the Scottish Parliament discusses land reform.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West): The hon. Lady will find a ready echo of what she is saying among those of us who have had to deal with the Crown Estate Commissioners for years, with all the attendant frustrations—not least in the fish-farming sector in the highlands and islands. Does she share my frustration at the appointment system to the Crown Estate Commissioners, which is through the Chancellor of the Exchequer? When one asks questions on public policy of Scottish Office Ministers, those questions are often transferred to the Treasury, but Treasury Ministers, understandably, do not have the same knowledge of, or insight into, those matters as Scottish Office Ministers have. That problem may be overcome as a result of the new structure in the Scottish Parliament.

Ms Cunningham: I certainly hope so. It would be a shame if our agreements on land reform were to be stymied by problems arising from the way in which the Crown Estate Commissioners are currently constituted. I do not know whether all hon. Members have experienced this, but it has been noticeable that, since the issue was first raised in our consideration of the Bill, the commissioners have been much more communicative. Perhaps it dawned on them that the secrecy and lack of transparency with which they had managed to conduct their affairs will not last much longer, and that they needed to get their act together, at least in public relations.

[Ms Cunningham]

They certainly seem to have extended their fax and mailing lists to include many more people than previously received information from them. I do not criticise that—I am glad that it has happened—but it shows that even minimal debate in the House engenders a response. How much greater the response would be if the Scottish Parliament were able to consider those issues even more closely.

The detail of the Scottish National party's concerns have often been misunderstood. We know that the Crown Estate will be subject to the technical reform of the feudal system—I think that I can say with some confidence that such reform will be introduced by the Scottish Parliament regardless of the result of next year's election. The Crown Estate will be subject to any changes in the law on the sale or purchase of land, the registration of land or access to grants for the development of land. It will not be exempt from the legal structures introduced by land reform legislation.

The Government amendments and the comments of the Crown Estate Commissioners in the press serve only to highlight the basic nature of my concern—the aspects of the Crown Estate over which the Parliament will not be empowered to legislate, such as the revenues and residual ownership rights. Those are not trivial matters; they are extremely important, and have a profound effect on many communities in Scotland. They should be within the scope of the Parliament.

Amendment No. 113 provides the Government with a solution. I hope that the Minister will explain why the Parliament cannot be trusted with powers that are currently exercised by the Secretary of State, and why it should be prevented from legislating to transfer ownership of, for example, the foreshore from the Crown Estate to local communities, which, I suspect, people may want to do in future. I await with interest the Minister's reply.

Mr. Dalyell: I want to thank the hon. Lady. I interrupted her on the previous occasion when she raised this subject, and she said that she would send me the documents. She was as good as her word, and sent me the background work that she and others had done. Having read it, I find that there is a great deal of meat in it.

I totally agree that these matters are not trivial, but I want to put it on the record that I have had both good and bad experiences with the Crown Estate Commissioners. They have done much of their work extremely imaginatively and competently, and I would not like the House to give the unfair impression that everything they have done is unimaginative and not for the good of Scotland.

Ms Cunningham indicated assent.

Mr. Dalyell: I am glad that the hon. Lady recognises that the Crown Estate Commissioners have done many good things.

That said, vital issues concerning the sea bed are involved. Everything that flows from the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 is intimately concerned with this matter. Some estates are run extremely well, but awkward issues such as Knoydart remain. Those issues should certainly be discussed. I very much look forward to my hon. Friend's reply on this vital subject.

Dr. Fox: On 29 April, we had a substantial debate on land reform in Scotland. It was one of the most constructive debates that I have sat through in this Parliament, and there were wide areas of consensus among all the parties. We agreed that changes in land use must remove barriers to sustainable rural communities, and we discussed the contribution made in the past by private ownership and the cost of public ownership. There was consensus about the need for reform of the feudal system; an example given at the time was the maintenance of tenancies, but with reform along the lines of farm business tenancies. We also agreed about regulation of public access.

How do the Government amendments relate to what the Minister said on that occasion about the Government's broader view of land reform in Scotland, and especially the current review? When is that review expected to finish? What role do the Government envisage for the Scottish Parliament in broader issues of land reform? When he rejects—as he no doubt will—amendments Nos. 96 and 113, will the Minister consider those questions?

Mr. McLeish: I may have to disappoint the hon. Gentleman. There is a feeling in the House that land reform is the monopoly of one party, but that is not the case. All parties are concerned about the inequities that exist in Scotland, and we know that much needs to be done. The Government are moving on several fronts to tackle the problems.

I want to reassure the hon. Member for Perth (Ms Cunningham), whose comments I respect, that the Government are keen to move on land reform. We are talking about the Crown Estate Commissioners, but, on a wider front, we want to achieve consensus on land policies for Scotland. The Scottish Parliament is less than a year away, and we are keen to achieve a set of policies that it can discuss and legislate on.

The hon. Lady wants to know whether the Government trust the Scottish Parliament. The answer is yes. With first past the post and the additional member system, there will be a reinforced representation from many rural areas of Scotland, which will strengthen the Parliament's commitment to substantial land reform.

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: I did not ask whether the Government trusted the Scottish Parliament, but referred specifically to the Secretary of State's current powers in respect of the Crown Estate Commissioners and the fact that they will not be transferred in their totality to the Scottish Parliament.

Mr. McLeish: I shall deal with that point later in my reply.

The hon. Lady asked about discussions with the Crown Estate Commissioners. There have been numerous discussions between the CEC and Scottish Office officials about the devolution of the Crown Estate and the Parliament's competence to legislate to take over the CEC's function in authorising marine fish farming, an about the reservation of the CEC's management functions, but I can confirm that there have been no discussions at ministerial level.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) said, people have different experiences of the CEC in different parts of Scotland, but it is always useful for local intelligence to be fed into the process. We want to build on the best that has happened and to tackle the worst, despite the improvements over recent months that the hon. Lady has reported.

I understand the reasons behind amendment No. 96. I recognise the importance of this issue and share the hon. Lady's concern that the competence of the Scottish Parliament to legislate in this area should be clear. That said, the amendment is simply unnecessary. It is clearly within the competence of the Scottish Parliament to legislate on land tenure reform as part of Scots private law. That is not changed by the fact that certain persons or bodies, who may happen to own land, are reserved.

The reservation of the Crown Estate Commissioners does not reserve the land and property of the Crown Estate. The reservation of business associations will not prevent the Scottish Parliament from enacting new laws on land owned by business associations, whether relating to the tenure of such land or to associated planning issues. Any provision that the Scottish Parliament chooses to make in respect of land reform or planning will simply form part of the framework in which all will have to operate.

The work of the land reform policy group, chaired by my noble Friend Lord Sewel, is intended to pave the way for early land reform legislation by the Scottish Parliament. I am not convinced that a land convention modelled on the Scottish Constitutional Convention would be an appropriate or practical approach to considering wider land reform issues.

The land reform policy group has recently undertaken a wide-ranging consultation, and aims to publish its final report in December, in good time to inform debate in the lead-up to the Scottish Parliament. The timing is useful.

We are well aware of the conflicts that can exist between those who own land and those who visit the countryside for recreational purposes. The Government have asked Scottish Natural Heritage to consider, in consultation, what changes are needed to provide equitable access arrangements.

On amendment No. 113, the reservation means that the current power of direction over the Crown Estate Commissioners shared by the Secretary of State and the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not pass to the Scottish Ministers. We believe that it is right that it should remain with the United Kingdom Government, in line with the reservation of the commissioners. As things stand, the power would continue to be exercised by the Secretary of State.

In the light of what I have said and, more importantly, of the tone in which I said it, I ask hon. Members not to press amendments Nos. 96 and 113 to a vote, but to support the Government amendments.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 232, in page 59, line 23, at end insert

'other than revenues from bona vacantia, ultimus haeres and treasure trove'.—[Mr. McLeish.]

Dr. Fox: I beg to move amendment No. 59, in page 60, line 43, at end insert

', provided that any power conferred on local authorities in relation to taxes on businesses shall be framed so as to be exercisable with the effect of either increasing or reducing the overall burden of local taxation in the area of a local authority.'.

The amendment concerns the environment for business in the post-Scottish Parliament era. We are keen to ensure that, just as the tax-varying power for income tax is both upwards and downwards, any such power on business taxation should also be seen to be in both directions. We must not create a one-way valve through which the Scottish Parliament, via local authorities, can soak Scotland's business community.

At Scottish Questions today, the Minister for Education and Industry said that if equal taxation treatment in the United Kingdom for business—he was referring to corporation tax—was lost, businesses would flock out of Scotland. I am sure that he is right. He said that that was the justification for keeping corporation tax on a United Kingdom basis.

If the basis for keeping taxation the same is to ensure that businesses do not flock out of Scotland, it surely makes sense that any business tax-varying power can go in both directions. The Scottish Parliament should be able either to raise taxes on Scottish businesses—I cannot understand why it would want to—or reduce them. It is illogical for the Government to say that they want equal treatment for businesses in Scotland and in the rest of the United Kingdom and then provide for the Scottish Parliament to be able to change taxation, but only upwards. That can give no satisfaction to anyone in business in Scotland. It raises many worries.

In previous debates, the Government failed to promise to maintain the uniform business rate, which led to some anxiety in business. This is a chance for them to reassure business that taxation will not go only upwards. If the Minister fails to give that reassurance, he will send a shudder down the back of business in Scotland, because it will believe that it will be soaked for the extra money that the Scottish Parliament will want to spend as a result of the expectations that will undoubtedly be raised during the election of the Scottish Parliament.

Mr. Dalyell: It is superfluous for me to tell the Minister that many people in Scottish business simply ask whether they will be operating on what we must call a level playing field. Some assurance on that point would be helpful. Because of time, I leave my question at that.

Mr. Gorrie: I should like the Minister to explain the position. I cannot see that the Bill says what the Conservative spokesman said that it says. He said that it can only increase taxes. I must be stupid, but I cannot see that in the Bill.

It is important that Scottish local government should have the maximum flexibility to deal with financial matters, and that the Scottish Parliament should help it. It is widely recognised that it would be helpful if a method of letting local government raise more of its own revenue could be found. There should be maximum flexibility for the Scottish Parliament and local authorities to do that. For example, the burden of commercial rates on small businesses could be reduced and the cost made up in some way out of income tax or whatever. There should be opportunities such as that for the Scottish Parliament and local authorities to be flexible. I do not see that the Bill prevents that. Perhaps the Minister can clarify whether I have missed something.

Dr. Fox: By way of clarification, is the hon. Gentleman's party's policy to maintain the uniform business rate?

Mr. Gorrie: It is my party's policy that the Scottish Parliament should have the right to determine such matters. Business taxation should not be hiked up separately from the council tax, but there might be some flexibility between the two. I hope that the Minister can clarify my points.

Mr. Swinney: I would hate the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (Mr. Gorrie) to think that he was isolated in feeling stupid in his interpretation of the Bill. I share his concerns about the Conservative amendment. It is clear that the Scottish political parties, in offering their manifestos to the Scottish electorate next May, must decide for themselves about business taxation powers. None of us looks at the future of business in Scotland after the advent of the Scottish Parliament with anything but a responsible sense of trying to create the best business conditions in which companies can operate.

I spoke last night at a meeting of the Angus Federation of Small Businesses. I was under sustained pressure about the burden of business rates on small companies trading in small towns. Political parties have an obligation to address the difficult trading conditions, costs and overheads experienced by such firms in the present climate. Political parties must be able to reduce, for example, the business rates of small companies and examine how that can be funded by other businesses or by the public purse. That is possible within the legislation and is in no way assisted by amendment No. 59. It is an issue for political parties to address in the context of their manifestos. They must build a message that is sustainable and acceptable to the business community and can carry its confidence. The legislation allows them to do that, but the amendment does not help the process.

Mr. McLeish: It does not help to overstate an attack on what the Government are doing. I do not recognise the business environment described by the Conservatives. That is not to be complacent. My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) asked whether we are providing a level playing field. I think we are. The constitutional settlement that we have tried to develop over the past 55 weeks is about a level playing field. We have sought through regulation to ensure that, at UK level, powers remain, whether on energy or on a wide range of other issues, to ensure that the existence of a level playing field remains a key factor.

There has been no attempt to take corporation tax, national insurance or social security related benefits that impinge on industry, whether by amount or collection. The central aim is to ensure that the transition to a Scottish Parliament creates a business-friendly environment. I have spoken often to many groups in Scotland, and they have accepted 11 September. They have sought reassurances about a level playing field, and, in large measure, we have given them.

Dr. Fox: Does the Minister accept that, for many Scottish businesses, the most important step in the creation of the level playing field was the introduction of the uniform business rate, which ended the iniquitous treatment that Scottish businesses had suffered for a long time? Any suggestion that that might be removed would be seen by businesses in Scotland as potentially removing the level playing field.

Mr. McLeish: Change makes individuals and companies apprehensive. We have tried to deal with that in our meetings.

I ask the House to resist amendment No. 59, which provides an opportunity to explain the Government's position on local taxation and say why it is a devolved matter. It will swiftly become clear that there is no need for any restriction on the Scottish Parliament's competence of the sort proposed by the amendment. The White Paper made it clear that local government and its financing will be devolved matters. Local government is essentially that: local. It is right and proper that it should be within the competence of the Scottish Parliament.

Local government provides major public services in respect of matters such as education, social work and a great deal more that are firmly within the ambit of the Scottish Parliament. Local government's structure and constitution are likewise rightly matters for it. Just as local government's main services and structure are matter for the Parliament, so, too, is its financing. Local government will spend a substantial proportion of the Parliament's budget. Local taxation is also rightly devolved, as it is not possible to examine local government without considering its financial arrangements and the tax base that supports its services. I do not think that there is serious argument about that in the House.

What choices will be open to the Scottish Parliament on local taxation? It will be open to the Parliament to amend or change the system of local taxes, but there is a widespread consensus that property-based taxes are an essential element of the local tax system, as they always have been. The one disastrous experiment with a non-property based tax for local government was the poll tax, for which Conservative Members must accept full responsibility. That was an object lesson in how unwise it is to tinker with any local taxation system, particularly in a biased and blinkered way.

Similarly, local business rates are an essential part of the local government finance system and, although they have been stable and widely accepted in Scotland in recent years, the Parliament should be able to change them—for example, to update and modernise them as necessary.

The policy of the Government on that issue is clear—changes in such things have to be handled carefully, and, in relation to business rates in particular, can be made only after careful consultation with the business community. We recognise the benefits of stability and predictability that the unified business rate has brought, especially to businesses in Scotland. We will be consulting later this year on whether there should be some local discretion on the business rate, perhaps of the sort proposed by my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and Housing. However, it seems likely that it will fall to the Scottish Parliament to introduce any legislative change that it may consider necessary in the light of the outcome of that consultation.

Of course, local taxes can go up or down. It is the essence of local taxation that tax rates are set by councils, and there are no legal requirements that they must always go up. We have to bear it in mind that property-based taxes are not inherently buoyant—particularly if revaluations at the property base are infrequent, as is inevitable—so headline rates of tax, such as the UBR poundage, tend to rise even if, in real terms, the tax taken may be increasing no faster than the retail prices index. Indeed, it is right and proper that local taxation, along with local government finance and other local government issues generally, should be firmly within the ambit of the Scottish Parliament. I am in no doubt that the Scottish Parliament will deal with those issues wisely, well and sensitively.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. McLeish: I beg to move amendment No. 282, in page 65, line 5, leave out from first 'of' to end of line 6 and insert

'Parts I and II of the Plant Varieties Act 1997 (plant varieties and the Plant Varieties and Seeds Tribunal).'.

I take some pride in moving this amendment—I think that this matter was raised by an Opposition Member. This is a technical amendment to the exception from the reservation of intellectual property, which is necessary to reflect the coming into force of the Plant Varieties Act 1997, which repealed and replaced the relevant provisions of the Plant Varieties and Seeds Act 1964. I commend the amendment to the House.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McLeish: I beg to move amendment No. 269, in page 65, leave out line 33.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendment No. 270.

Mr. McLeish: These amendments refine the wording of the reservation of estate agency matters. They are fairly formal, and, given the time available, I beg to move.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 270, in page 65, line 41, at end insert—

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: I beg to move amendment No. 267, in page 68, line 27, leave out from beginning to end of line 35.

I shall be brief, as there is little time left. The amendment would effectively exclude from reservation the Radioactive Substances Act 1993. I do not want to go into a great rehearsal of the issues of nuclear power in Scotland, other than to remind hon. Members, if they need reminding, that that is a hugely controversial issue, and, remarkably, one which has not been discussed in the context of the Bill as far as I am aware.

Recent events, which I shall not go into, demonstrate the important part in the political debate that nuclear power plays in Scotland. I shall not rehearse the debate about Dounreay, but people in Scotland have a passionate desire to have a say in that matter. The devolved powers as they relate to transport, the environment and planning will all have a capacity to impact on Dounreay. We should go that one step further, and I must insist on pressing the amendment.

Mr. Dalyell: I merely want to register a view diametrically opposed to that of the hon. Member for Perth (Ms Cunningham). Any unbundling of the United Kingdom nuclear set-up would be a disaster.

Mr. McLeish: Nuclear energy is reserved to ensure the continued existence of a single coherent regulatory framework in that extremely important industry. The balance between reserved and devolved matters in regard to nuclear energy is a sensible one. If accepted, the amendment could lead to fragmentation, confusion and weaker regulation—the opposite, I am sure, of what is desirable. I invite the hon. Lady to withdraw it.

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: No, I wish to press the amendment.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House proceeded to a Division—

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (seated and covered): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You will be aware that, under these procedures, we had only 15 minutes for a debate on euthanasia—a very important debate, in which I wanted to take part. Now, because this Division has taken unusually long, we shall have no time at all to debate those matters of life and death. I wonder why this Division has taken so long, what is going on, and whether we can speed it up.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I deplore the length of time that has been taken over this Division. Normally I would have asked the Serjeant at Arms to go and investigate, but, because of the small amount of time involved, I have not done so on this occasion. However, I will certainly ensure that inquiries are made as to what has happened.

The House having divided: Ayes 6, Noes 289.

Tellers for the Noes:
Jane Kennedy and
Mr. Clive Betts.

Question accordingly negatived.

Dr. Fox: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I wonder whether, given that this is one of the first occasions when we have had such a detailed timetable for a Bill, you might wish to report back to Madam Speaker the length of this Division—18 minutes. It is a clear attempt by the Government to avoid having to discuss what is for them an awkward ethical issue, and it is not only an act of blatant cowardice on their part, but contrary to the spirit in which we have hitherto conducted discussion of the Bill.

Mr. Leigh: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Setting aside the issue of the length of time, I thought that we had reached a civilised agreement that we would ensure that all matters were properly debated, despite there being a guillotine. I therefore hope that you can raise this matter with Madam Speaker, and if necessary allow Division time to be treated, as it were, as injury time.

This has been a very long Division; but even if it had been held promptly and had taken only 15 minutes, we should have been left with only five minutes in which to discuss whether euthanasia should be reserved to the United Kingdom Parliament. That is unsatisfactory, and I hope that you will—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have dealt in part with that point of order, and said that I deplore what has happened. Madam Speaker always takes a great interest in these matters, and no doubt she will have a view on this as well. Further discussion is simply taking time out of the next debate.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. On a point of information, which I am sure you could supply, am I to understand that the Standing Orders relating to the conduct of business in this place were drawn up by the previous Administration?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a matter for the Chair to deal with at this time.

It being more than four hours and fifteen minutes after the commencement of proceedings on consideration of the Bill, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER, pursuant to the Order [13 January] and the Resolution [12 May], put forthwith the Questions necessary for the disposal of the business to be concluded at that hour.

(2) For the purposes of this paragraph, a Scottish public authority has mixed functions if some of them relate to reserved matters and some do not.

1B. Paragraph 1 of Part I of this Schedule does not reserve any Scottish public authority with functions none of which relate to reserved matters.

AGREED RE-DISTRIBUTION OF TRANSFERRED FUNCTIONS

'.—(1) Her Majesty may by Order in Council provide for any functions exercisable by a member of the Scottish Executive to be exercisable—

(a) by a Minister of the Crown instead of by the member of the Scottish Executive,

(b) by a Minister of the Crown concurrently with the member of the Scottish Executive, or

(c) by a Minister of the Crown only with the agreement of, or after consultation with, a member of the Scottish Executive.

(2) Where an Order is made under subsection (1)(a) or (b) in relation to a function of the Scottish Ministers, the First Minister or the Lord Advocate which is exercisable only with the agreement of, or after consultation with, another person, the function shall, unless the Order provides otherwise, be exercisable by the Minister of the Crown free from any such requirement.

(3) An Order under this section may, in particular, provide for any function exercisable by a Minister of the Crown by virtue of an Order under subsection (1)(a) or (b) to be exercisable subject to a requirement for the function to be exercised with the agreement of, or after consultation with, another person.'—[Mr. McFall.]

INTERPRETATION

Amendments made: No. 204, in page 49, line 39, leave out 'a Royal Warrant'.

No. 205, in page 50, line 12, at end insert—

' "prerogative instrument" means an Order in Council, warrant, charter or other instrument made under the prerogative'.

No. 206, in page 50, line 18, at end insert—

' "Scottish public authority" means any public body, public office or holder of such an office whose functions (in each case) are exercisable only in or as regards Scotland'.

No. 207, in page 50, leave out lines 19 and 20.—[Mr. McFall.]

Mr. McLeish: I beg to move amendment No. 264, in page 50, line 29, at end insert—

'( ) the general principles of private law (including private international law)'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: Government amendment No. 209.

No. 118, in page 50, line 33, leave out 'of restitution' and insert 'arising from unjustified enrichment'.

No. 119, in page 50, line 35, leave out 'and'.

Government amendments Nos. 210, 211 and 265.

No. 120, in page 50, line 38, at end insert

'and—

(e) Scottish Private International Law (Jurisdiction and Choice of Law).'.

Government amendment No. 266.

Mr. McLeish: During consideration in Committee of amendments that the hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) tabled to clause 111(3), I said that I would consider further some of the issues raised by his amendments. Government amendments Nos. 209 to 211 and 264 to 266 are the result of detailed consideration of our further discussion.

Amendment No. 264 adds the general principles of private law, including international private law, to the list of areas of the civil law of Scotland that come within the ambit of Scots private law.

Amendment No. 209 amends the reference to the area of the law of obligations, to avoid the overlap between voluntary and conventional obligations and obligations of restitution.

Amendment No. 210 amends the reference to the area of the law of action, and ensures that the Scottish Parliament will have legislative competence to alter the jurisdiction of the courts in this area.

Amendment No. 211 further amends the reference to the area of the law of action to reflect the fact that prescription more properly belongs to the law of obligations.

Amendment No. 265 provides that, for the purposes of the legislative competence of the Scottish Parliament, references to Scots private law include administrative law. This is intended to make it clear that the Scottish Parliament will be able to legislate about judicial review and matters of that kind.

Amendment No. 266 ensures that the power to alter the jurisdiction of the courts in respect of Scots criminal law is within the competence of the Scottish Parliament.

In the drafting of these amendments, full consideration has been given to the points raised by the Law Society for Scotland and by Lord Gill, the chairman of the Scottish Law Commission, and the commission has said that it welcomes the proposals. I therefore commend the amendments to the House.

Mr. Wallace: I thank the Minister for having taken note of the points made in Committee. I believe that the amendments that the Government have tabled more than cover the points made in the amendments tabled by myself and my hon. and learned and hon. Friends. I welcome the fact that the Government listened and acted.

Mr. McLeish: I thank the hon. and learned Gentleman for his comments. Amendments Nos. 118 and 212 relate to issues similar to those dealt with by the Government amendments. In light of what I have said, the hon. and learned Gentleman has just given an indication that these will not be pressed. I thank him for the constructive contributions that have been made to this part of the debate.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 209, in page 50, line 32, leave out from 'including' to end of line 33 and insert

'obligations arising from contract, unilateral promise, delict, unjustified enrichment and negotiorum gestio'.

No. 210, in page 50, line 36, after 'including' insert 'jurisdiction,'.

No. 211, in page 50, line 37, leave out 'prescription and limitation' and insert 'limitation of actions'.

No. 265, in page 50, line 38, at end insert—

'and in section 28 include references to administrative law'.

No. 266, in page 50, line 39, at end insert 'jurisdiction'.

[Mr. McLeish]

No. 213, in page 50, line 42, leave out from 'Administration' to end of line 44 and insert

'are to the office-holders in the Scottish Administration and the members of the staff of the Scottish Administration.

(5A) For the purposes of this Act—

(a) references to office-holders in the Scottish Administration are to—

(i) members of the Scottish Executive and junior Scottish Ministers, and

(ii) the holders of offices in the Scottish Administration which are not ministerial offices, and

(b) references to members of the staff of the Scottish Administration are to the staff of the persons referred to in paragraph (a).

(5B) For the purposes of this Act, the offices in the Scottish Administration which are not ministerial offices are—

(a) the Registrar General of Births, Deaths and Marriages for Scotland, the Keeper of the Registers of Scotland and the Keeper of the Records of Scotland, and

(b) any other office the holder of which exercises functions conferred by an enactment and the power of appointment to which is exercisable by a member of the Scottish Executive.

(5C) Her Majesty may by Order in Council make any modifications of subsections (5) to (5B) which She considers necessary or expedient'.—[Mr. McLeish.]

Title

Mr. McLeish: I beg to move amendment No. 271, in line 4, leave out 'bodies' and insert 'authorities'.

I have the satisfaction of rising to speak on the final Government amendment to the Bill. It is purely technical, it changes a reference in the long title, and it is consequent on previous amendments.

Amendment agreed to.

Order for Third Reading read.

8.30 pm

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Donald Dewar): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to the House for the patience shown in a lengthy and protracted series of discussions. I confess that we are in no atmosphere of histrionics or high drama, but I hope that my colleagues will forgive me if I show some satisfaction at reaching the final stage of the Bill.

I do not want to rehearse all that has happened—that would take many days—but I am entitled to look back to last May and on all that has been achieved since then. Much progress has been made: the White Paper last July was complex, lucid, and above all, popular; the referendum in September was carried handsomely and without qualification on both questions, ending the argument on consent; and the Bill itself had two days on Second Reading, followed by what might lightly be called extensive, and exhaustive, consideration in Committee and on Report.

Mr. Dalyell: Before the Secretary of State leaves the subject of the referendum, will he clear up a question that bothered us earlier? Does the Scottish Parliament have the power to trigger and initiate a referendum on independence?

Mr. Dewar: The constitutional structure of the United Kingdom is a matter for the whole country, and for the UK Government. However, as I have always made clear—I may say a word or two more on the matter later—any point of view, political or otherwise, can be advanced if the people's loyalty and votes can be obtained for it. I have made it clear repeatedly, and throughout our proceedings, that that is my view.

Although my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) and I have once or twice had, if not cross words, somewhat tense exchanges, I pay tribute to his persistence and tenacity. When I came to the House in 1978 as a retread after the Garscadden by-election, I watched my hon. Friend fight very hard against the passage of the Scotland Act 1978. I find it a little eerie, but remarkable, that he is still here fighting the same corner just as hard as he ever did.

I also pay genuine tribute to my hon. Friend the Minister for Home Affairs and Devolution, Scottish Office, who has borne the brunt of the battle for a long time. He has shown patience beyond the call of duty, and has always been courteous, helpful to the House and well informed. He has been a first-class colleague, and has carried a lot of the burden of the Committee and Report stages. I am very grateful to him.

I also congratulate and thank others who have played a role. I have had exchanges with, among others, the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond); I have the feeling that there may be further exchanges in future. I look forward to starring on many more billboards, courtesy of the Scottish National party, in the period that lies ahead. I may even go into that business myself—who knows?

Let us not forget the Conservatives and the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram), who thought that he had fled Scotland and the troubled times of the past to make a new home in a more settled environment, only to find himself sucked back into the maelstrom of Scottish politics. He found himself in the particularly unfortunate position of having no policy to promote or defend, and I think that he and his colleagues have busked most bravely. Finally, my parliamentary private secretary and many of my colleagues have also helped.

I shall say just a word to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and your colleagues, whose work is often underestimated, but who have listened to many speeches. Perhaps some of them did not reach inspirational heights, but they are all part of the daily machinery of the parliamentary process. I speak for all my colleagues in expressing thanks to you and your colleagues.

I hope that the House will feel that our proceedings have been worth while. The Bill is sound; provides a coherent framework; and divides responsibility between Scotland and Westminster in a strong and logical way. The idea was to strengthen the voice of Scotland within the UK, and to put in place a structure that left at Westminster that which should be at Westminster—the most obvious matters are foreign affairs, defence, macro-economics and fiscal matters. However, we have also left at Westminster the means to define the level playing field that is the United Kingdom. I do not want to labour the point, which the House has grasped, but matters such as financial services regulation, labour law and company law remain at Westminster.

What Scotland receives is a remarkable range of powers affecting health, education, housing and law reform. Scottish affairs will be run by a directly elected Parliament that will precisely reflect the opinions and great mix of points of view expressed on the Scottish political scene.

Mr. William Cash (Stone): I understand why the Secretary of State places great emphasis on the Scottish dimension, but he must realise that 97 per cent. of the money that Scotland receives in grants and so forth comes from the United Kingdom Parliament. Does he accept that, although the Scottish dimension is important, it remains fundamental to the concept of a united kingdom that the amount of money paid by our taxpayers should be properly reflected in the proportion of power that is dispersed to Scotland?

Mr. Dewar: I accept that we hold firmly to the partnership principle in the United Kingdom. I have probably said that often enough, and probably to the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash). Everyone in the UK pays direct or indirect taxes; the Government collect various revenues; and the whole lot is pooled and allocated on an agreed basis. I recognise that there has been debate about that basis—the hon. Gentleman is probably one of those who have taken part.

The Barnett formula ensures that the Scottish budget is adjusted broadly in line with comparable UK spending Departments. That mechanism was tried, tested and fiercely defended as right during 18 years of Conservative Government. The hon. Member for Stone is entitled to dissent; indeed, all my memories of him have him as a pillar of dissent on almost every matter of importance during those years. I hope that he accepts that I recognise the importance of getting the balance right. I have talked of that balance, and the balance of what remains at Westminster, and the hon. Gentleman is right to mention an important issue. I am glad to have had his help in outlining the facts.

I shall mention one or two other features of the Bill, which most people have grasped. Because the Parliament is unicameral, great emphasis must be placed on pre-legislative scrutiny, proper consultation and proper discussion with the community of Scotland before final decisions are made about legislation. It is easy to say that, and I accept that a great deal of work will have to be done to get the systems refined, in place and working properly. Everyone is in favour of them in principle, but that does not mean that it is entirely clear how they will work, or that people will always have the staying power to make them work, once they are in place.

It is important that that remains part of our objective. The structure that we are now passing on to another place makes it essential that that effort is made. I am glad that there is a discussion, which I hope will continue, between parties and between other interested bodies in Scotland about how that can best be achieved. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister of State is closely involved in that.

Another self-evident protection that is relevant in view of the unicameral nature of the system is the new electoral system. I keep saying—I am not sure to what effect—that the Government whom I represent and the party of which I am a member deserve great credit for breaking the mould. One of the most far-reaching changes in the Bill is undoubtedly the direct linking of the percentage of votes gained by a party to the number of seats that will be allocated to it in the new Parliament.

Mr. Jenkin: It is a midden.

Mr. Dewar: I am delighted to hear that from a sedentary position the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) is doing his best, even in that unlikely outpost, to keep the Scots language alive. He seems to suggest that the Bill is a midden. I should like to hear him trying out that expression at the next tea party of the North Essex Conservative association. It would be, to use a happy metaphor, a Pygmalion scene.

[Mr. Dewar]

The electoral system is a vital part of the new politics in Scotland. Clearly, people will have to learn how the system operates. They will have to understand that they have two votes—one for their individual Member of the Scottish Parliament, who will represent them on a normal constituency first-past-the-post system, and a second vote that they can cast in terms of a party preference and which will be part of a corrective mechanism to ensure that the number of seats allocated is brought into line with the percentage of votes.

I occasionally meet cynics, although I am sure that there are few in the House, who tell me that that is too complicated for the average voter in Scotland. I do not believe that, but the significance of the system will have to be argued and explained. That important work lies ahead.

Mr. Ancram: The right hon. Gentleman used a rather strange expression. He said that the first vote would be for the constituency Member of the Scottish Parliament who would represent the voter. In that case, what does the second type of Member of the Scottish Parliament do? Whom do those MSPs represent?

Mr. Dewar: I was merely drawing attention to the simple structure that we have introduced, which the right hon. Gentleman knows well. There are some interesting arguments to be conducted on the subject. It is one of several subjects on which I differ from the Scottish National party, which has suggested mechanisms that would make a sharp distinction between those who are elected in the first-past-the-post constituency section and those who are additional Members. I do not think that we should see such a distinction. All the Members of the Scottish Parliament have a representative capacity.

My knowledge of European politics is not as detailed as that of some hon. Members, but I have visited Germany and spoken to people from the CDU, CSU, SPD and so on. My experience is that no distinction is made there, and no distinction is seen by members of the public. That is what we should aim at, although I accept that, as it is a new system, it may take some time for us to reach that position.

Mr. Salmond: The Scottish National party has not suggested any such sharp distinction. We questioned the scale of expenses required, as I think the Minister of State will confirm.

I wanted to be helpful to the Secretary of State. I have been looking at the record and, as far as I know, the Conservative party in Scotland is the only major political party in democratic history to say that it will put up only 73 candidates for a 129-Member Parliament. I know of no other party that has said that it will not try to fill all the seats available. That is an extraordinary position.

Mr. Dewar: I always respond when the hon. Gentleman is anxious to be helpful. I shall not say that I treasure the moment, as that might suggest that it is rare, and it does not necessarily have to be rare. I was not aware of that eccentricity of the Conservative party, and it seems remarkable. The hon. Gentleman seems to be suggesting—I look to see whether there is a confirmatory nod from the wise and sage right hon. Member for Devizes—that the Conservatives will contest the first-past-the-post seats, but will not take up any list seats allocated to them.

Mr. Ancram: That is not true.

Mr. Dewar: Ah. There is a little mystery here. The right hon. Member for Devizes may want briefly to clarify the matter, within the rules of order, if only so that he will not be misrepresented by the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan in future. We would all want to avoid that.

I said that I would be brief, but I have been sidetracked, albeit pleasantly, by colleagues. The new electoral system is a brave reforming move. It was introduced on a matter of principle, because we believed that, on balance—there are always pros and cons and differences to be weighed up—it would produce a healthier democracy in Scotland, and a system that would be seen as fairer and more representative of all the various opinions in our political range. I have no doubt that it will have a remarkable and far-reaching impact on Scottish politics.

The system is built to last. On occasions such as this, dire predictions are always made of trouble and strife. No one can rule out tensions, constructive and otherwise, in the future. We have, however, tried to accommodate that. As hon. Members will know, we have included a provision for dispute resolution. We have given a place, which has turned out to be surprisingly controversial, to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. We have tried to lay down ground rules in the form of concordats. I believe that that is a sensible way of proceeding, but I concede—

Mr. Swinney: The Secretary of State mentioned concordats. How many concordats does he envisage will be put in place as a result of the legislation and the process dialogue between the Scottish Executive and the Westminster Parliament?

Mr. Dewar: A good deal of consultation is going on. The process of government, as the hon. Gentleman knows, is a process of discussion, dialogue, bid and counter-bid, leading to consensus and a common position that can be implemented. It is sensible for us to have ground rules, which is the purpose of concordats. We have made it clear, of course, that they do not reach a final form until they have been seen by the Scottish Executive, which is a party to them. They are not documents which are binding in law. Anyone who has moved, however uneasily or temporarily, through the labyrinth of government will know that precedents that have been established by agreement tend to hold. I believe that they will be helpful. Some will be more in the public interest than others, but I believe that all have a part to play in trying to shape the dialogue—which is the stuff of government—and ensure that it is constructive and serves the public well.

Mr. Dalyell: May I ask the Secretary of State a question, in a reflective spirit, about concordats? Through no fault of his, but because of the guillotine procedure, we did not discuss properly the position of the Secretary of State after May 1999. As a putative leader of a party in Holyrood, how does he envisage the role of Secretary of State in the House? Would he be content to see negotiations on the most delicate matters conducted by someone who did not have the status of Cabinet Minister—a status that the present Secretary of State enjoys? Would not the First Minister in Holyrood prefer to deal directly with the Government in London? Does not the position of Secretary of State evaporate?

Mr. Dewar: I do not think that it evaporates, but it certainly changes—it would be very odd if it did not. One of the prime aims of devolution is to achieve a more democratic and effective ministerial structure in place of the Secretary of State. I say in a reflective mood to my hon. Friend that, in the past year, I have had good cause to appreciate the force of that argument. It is extremely difficult to try to duplicate eight or nine United Kingdom Ministries in Scottish terms. I sometimes envy the Minister who has steeped himself in his portfolio and who has spent two or three years doing nothing but mastering the intricacies of education, for example, as I move inevitably—with what I hope is reasonable facility—between education and health, on to law reform and back to the problems of local government finance. That is not easy to do.

Whatever one thinks about the balance of the devolution argument, by looking at the machinery and the proposals in the Bill, one can see that one of the pluses will be that several Scottish Ministers—the number obviously depends on the judgment of the First Minister and his colleagues—will become not generalists but specialists in those areas. There will perhaps be a rather different dynamic between Parliament and Minister and between Minister and Administration as a result.

Therefore, the Secretary of State will lose many of the tasks that presently dominate—and I do not use that word lightly—his life. I believe that any Government in the United Kingdom will require a Minister of seniority who will have the task of interpreting what is happening in Scotland and providing advice to Government. That job will become particularly important if the Administrations in Edinburgh and London are of different political colours. No Secretary of State is a statutory animal—no one knows that better than the hon. Member for Linlithgow. A Prime Minister can decide to amalgamate ministries or simply cause a ministry or a Secretary of State to disappear—I refer not to the occupant but to the office itself. However, I do not anticipate that happening in this case. I believe that, for the foreseeable future, we shall need such a person in the United Kingdom Cabinet. Of course, I recognise that a change will take place—I glory in that change and I believe that it is at the heart of the argument for the devolution settlement.

I shall try to hurry on as I am delighted to see several hon. Members poised to enter the debate. I believe that there are other areas where the provisions of the Bill will give to Scotland a new dimension and new horizons. Schedule 5 provides the basis for the European activities of the Scottish Administration: a representative office in Brussels. I hope that Scotland will have the opportunity to compete with the Spanish autonomous provinces, the German Länder and the Italian provinces. Anyone who has spent time in Europe—even I, who have been there only to sample occasionally—knows that there is a great deal of activity at that level in Europe and that not all the power broking, discussions and arrangements are made at national Government level. I think it is important that Scotland gets involved there.

I said a few minutes ago that I hoped that the system was built to endure. We aim to give the Parliament the chance to prove its worth. I recognise that, for the nationalists in particular, it is a transitory matter: a transitional arrangement. They view it as being inherently unstable—although they may protest, as they have tonight, that they believe in the good government of Scotland. I simply repeat my position, which is well known: we should get down to tackling the tasks that are important to people in Scotland, whether they involve housing, education, law reform or the field of employment. We should not be plunged immediately into an endless debate about whether we do or do not need further constitutional change.

I have said repeatedly—and I shall do so again—that I believe in the sovereignty of the people. I do not want to sound as though I am repeating an old refrain or an old song: it is a matter of fundamental importance. I believe that power lies with the people. However, acceptance of that position does not imply that we should prejudge the way in which that power is exercised or what the final outcome should be. It would be arrogant to assume that the people will want to go down a particular road at a particular time and will not occasionally change their mind. I believe that our aim must be to convince people of the worth of the policies and mechanisms that we offer and upon which they must decide at the end of the day.

The devolution settlement is exactly what it says and the constitutional framework is reserved in schedule 5—and self-evidently so. I repeat what I have always said: the way to exercise our power is for parties of whatever point of view or opinion to carry the people at the ballot box. If they do that, they are obviously in a position to progress their cause. I do not believe that people will want to do other than give the Parliament that they created with their votes the chance to flourish, prove its worth and to serve the people. I believe that most people want to see it enjoy the very substantial—and, in many ways, the radical and brave—powers that will be allotted to it by this Parliament if the Bill completes its passage. This Parliament is taking that decision, which must be endorsed by a majority in this Parliament representing the whole of the United Kingdom.

What I believe Scotland wants, and what I hope will be granted, is a Parliament that will take seriously the problems that oppress and inhibit and build social and economic barriers in our communities, and which will reflect and respond to the views of people in Scotland. This is a matter for the electorate, but in my view we do not want further constitutional debate which could only distract and which would be in danger of smothering the real issues.

I understand that I have not mentioned the Liberal Democrats over the past 20 minutes or so, which seems a little churlish as they stood by us in the Scottish Constitutional Convention and have certainly played a good and constructive role in the debate. I am not in their pockets and they are not in mine, as will become increasingly clear as the days go by, but I appreciate their whole-hearted support in what has been, and essentially remains, a common cause in terms of the structure of government in Scotland and our relationship to the rest of the United Kingdom.

The Bill will now move on to the Lords. Someone said to me this afternoon—it must have been a Conservative because, I am told, the Conservatives believe in fun—that when it goes to the Lords it will be great fun. I do not know whether it will be great fun and I do not think that that is a term that I would apply. Their lordships will take matters seriously. They are entitled—and, arguably, have a duty—to do so. I shall watch with interest their no doubt expert debates, especially on the more abstract constitutional issues, which, to be fair, lie at the heart of the Bill.

I believe, however, that the upper House, like this House, will take the view that the referendum ended the argument on consent and that, although people of good will will want their say about detail, they will give a fair wind to one of the most exciting and important constitutional changes in this country for many years. I am unashamedly proud of what has been achieved—the coming together of diverse interests in Scotland—and have been impressed by the number of people who have said to me, "I didn't vote for your side in the referendum, but the decision now having been taken, I want to make it work and to get the best out of it in the interests of Scotland." There is determination to work with the grain of the new system.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Dewar: No, I am coming to the end of my remarks.

To be fair, despite much wavering on the road, many Conservatives, especially in Scotland, take that view. The message has still to trickle down—to use a favourite Conservative phrase—to other parts of the parliamentary party, which are difficult to reach. I hope that we can continue that feeling of co-operation.

The structures of our constitution will never be the same again and the face of Scottish politics will change for ever. I put this delicately, because I am aware that it may be a sensitive subject: after listening to recent contributions from Conservative Members, I believe that a lot of interesting thinking is going on about the implications for the wider United Kingdom of the brave stance and brave steps that we are taking and inviting the House to endorse.

I believe that it is right to say that nothing will be the same again and I am convinced that that will be for the better. We shall enrich the democracy of the United Kingdom and Scotland will play a full, fair and significant part in its future.

Mr. Ancram: Tonight we come to the end of a very long haul. I join the Secretary of State in thanking you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and your fellow Chairmen and the Clerks of the House for the way in which business has been conducted over the past four months. Indeed, it would be churlish not to offer some tribute to the right hon. Gentleman and to the Minister of State for their stamina in driving the Bill through the House. I know the preparation that goes into taking Bills through Parliament, and I recognised on occasion the hunted look that comes across the face of a Minister at the Dispatch Box towards the end of a long and wearisome day, when yet another question not covered in his brief comes winging its way towards him.

I congratulate the Secretary of State on getting his Bill thus far. The Minister of State has left the Chamber, but I pay that tribute to him as well. Having said that, I am amazed that it has taken so long. For once, the Government cannot place an iota of blame at the Opposition's door for holding up the Bill, because we have worked throughout to an agreed timetable. When I signed up to the timetable in January, I thought that the Bill would be clear of the House by the end of March. I suspect that the Government are quietly beginning to panic about the timetable for the project, and I trust that they will not use that as an excuse to railroad the Bill through the other place.

As the Secretary of State conceded tonight, deep scrutiny is required on many matters to which we in this House could not do justice within the timetable. Despite pressure from myself and from my hon. Friends, many questions remain dangerously unanswered. The lateness of the Bill is entirely of the Government's making, and the obscurity that still surrounds great lumps of it is solely the result of their reluctance to answer questions. In fairness, the right hon. Gentleman occasionally tried to answer questions, but, as we witnessed earlier tonight, that usually led him and the Government into deep water. The Minister of State made an art form of not answering questions, and I fear that in that respect he did the Bill no favours.

I paid tribute to Ministers for their stamina in driving the legislation through, and driving is the right word. Steering is perhaps the more usual word, but it would be totally inappropriate in this case, as it carries the connotation of being prepared to move to meet the force of arguments and to take on board improving suggestions. That has not been the Government's way with the Bill. Almost all amendments have been rejected, no matter where they came from or what they sought to do. With few exceptions, even amendments that were tabled by Labour Back Benchers met the same, mostly unexplained, rebuffs as those that were tabled by the Opposition.

The Government have given a new meaning to the slogan "Not an inch". Even the proverbial donkey with a leg stuck on each corner normally proves more mobile than have the Government during the Bill's passage. When they were faced with an embarrassing issue such as euthanasia, they were prepared to use underhand methods to avoid debate. Their actions will not go unnoticed outside, not least among their supporters who believe, as we do, that this is an important issue.

The Government's arrogance will bring smiles of anticipation to the lips of lawyers. My old profession loves to see such Ministers because they are the guarantors of their future prosperity. Lawyers like Ministers who see concession as a weakness and admission of error as a character defect. I suspect that that is why they have enjoyed watching the Bill's progress. I fear that for many years it will be a dripping roast for lawyers on both sides of the border.

The legislation will feed not only lawyers: it will feed the suspicions of those who believe that there is an agenda behind the Bill. In the debate, the Minister of State exacerbated that feeling by the way that he dealt with the constitutional issue. He was asked a simple question by me and by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) about whether a Scottish Parliament could trigger a referendum on independence. He ducked and weaved and refused to answer the question, leaving great suspicion in the minds of all who heard him.

When the Bill began its parliamentary voyage on 12 January, it left port to the sound of cheering crowds. Scottish newspapers heralded the Secretary of State as the father of the nation. The Government were the champions of Scottish aspirations, and the sunshine cruise to the smooth election of a Labour First Minister in a Cabinet in the Scottish Parliament was guaranteed to all who bought tickets. However, the voyage has gone badly wrong. The vessel, which was famously billed as the weapon that would kill nationalism stone dead—[Interruption.] Some vessels are weapons, as I am sure the Secretary of State would find if he asked the originator of that expression—the Secretary of State for Defence.

The vessel has run into an obstacle. The captain and crew became so convinced of their own importance that they stopped listening. The rest of us saw what was coming and warned about it, only to be called Jeremiahs. The Government listened even less. They stopped listening to views on where the Parliament would be sited. They started by saying that they would consult on that, but, in the end, they made the decision themselves. They stopped listening to people in Scotland and to hon. Members who warned that the Bill was fundamentally flawed in relation to money and to Europe. They saw every constructive criticism as an attempt to scupper the project, becoming so convinced by this political form of paranoia that, in the end, they would not even listen to their friends who tried to warn them as well.

When the Government first struck the growing mass of nationalism, they would not even admit that it was there. They assured us that there was nothing to worry about, and the band that was led by the Secretary of State played on. When we raised the dangers in the House, we were accused of somehow being anti-Scottish. How different matters are now. The Secretary of State's sober analysis in this debate, compared with the triumphant confidence of his speech on Second Reading, shows how much has changed. Nationalism is not just creeping up behind the Government: it threatens to overtake them. The nationalism which, by the Government's analysis, should be dead, is trampling all over them. No wonder the Labour party in Scotland describes them as "economically inept, morally repugnant and spiritually bereft".

I am sure that people will remember that quotation.

We mark the passage to the other place of a Bill that arrived here in a mess.

Mr. Salmond: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ancram: I shall give way only once, because I do not want to waste time. I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman because I always enjoy his contributions.

Mr. Salmond: That quotation is absolutely accurate, but remember: the Scottish Labour party described the Labour Government as such because they were pursuing the policies of the right hon. Gentleman's Government.

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman has obviously made the same mistake as other hon. Members: they have not noticed that the Government changed last year. The Labour party is now in government. It is responsible for its actions and answerable to the House and the country for what it does. I am not going to accept responsibility for what the Secretary of State and his colleagues may do.

Tonight, we mark the passage out of the House of a Bill that arrived here a mess and leaves here a mess. If it were just any old Bill, I would probably temper my criticism in the knowledge that when, in due course, its errors and flaws became apparent, the blame for the damage would be laid at the Government's door. That would politically suit us, but this is not just any old Bill. It is a fundamental constitutional reform which will fundamentally alter the constitutional landscape not just of Scotland, but of the United Kingdom as a whole. The Government's failure during the Bill's passage not only to resolve the problems, but to concede even that they exist is of the gravest concern to all those of us who wish Scotland well in the devolved future that she has chosen and who believe also in the United Kingdom.

The Bill still carries the seeds of its own undoing. Far from achieving a glorious new Parliament and politics that would work in harmony with Westminster and Whitehall, it is riddled with irritants and omissions, which will ultimately only play into the hands of those who wish to create conflict between the two.

The Bill still creates unacceptable constitutional imbalance within the United Kingdom. The English dimension remains an arena for future resentment, conflict and division. It is almost unbelievable that the Bill finishes its process here tonight without the Government having even remotely agreed that that dimension, that problem, is real or serious.

The Secretary of State and his colleagues have repeatedly brushed that aside with contempt, painting it as an anti-Scottish figment of English political imagination, a last gasp by those who would stop devolution in its tracks. They have buried their heads in the sand and hoped that that awkward question would just fade away. It has not faded away and it will not. Indeed, they have succeeded merely in building into the legislation a flaw so fundamental and an irritant so pervasive that it remains a ticking time-bomb within their devolutionary reforms. They scoff at that description. Their English colleagues do not. While they claim that there is no need to do anything, we read in yesterday's Financial Times that their English colleagues are by no means so sanguine. Andrew Parker's piece in yesterday's Financial Times states:

"Ministers intend to recall the Commons regional affairs committee. It could be renamed the English grand committee and may, over time, acquire limited law-making powers.

Senior members of the government"—

so he had obviously got this from somewhere. The Secretary of State laughs, but the Government are the masters of spin. If they live by spin, they must die by it as well. Andrew Parker states:

"Senior members of the government believe that reviving the committee will help shore up the United Kingdom.

But ministers are also concerned at growing resentment over Scottish devolution among Labour MPs who represent English constituencies.

One senior member of the government said the recall of the regional affairs committee would help to neutralise that resentment.

A senior member of the government acknowledged that Scottish and Welsh devolution had to be balanced by a separate English forum."

[Mr. Ancram]

Now there is something different from the same Government who told us, effectively, that the English dimension existed only in our minds. We now hear that members of the same Government fear its consequences. At least some members of this Government are awake to the consequences of their ill-thought-out proposals. Sadly, however, the Scottish contingent is not.

What that senior member of the Government is offering goes nowhere near answering the West Lothian question, because it does not prevent Scottish and Northern Irish Members from voting on specifically English matters. All in all, it only goes to show the confusion that the Government have created in their own ranks and the muddle that they are in. I am only sorry that the United Kingdom is the victim of it.

Mr. Wallace: In the past few minutes, the right hon. Gentleman has described the proposals as ill thought out, carrying the seeds of their own undoing, a ticking time-bomb, a mess and creating an unacceptable constitutional imbalance. Indeed, from a sedentary position, the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) described them as a midden. Will they vote against Third Reading?

Mr. Ancram: The hon. and learned Gentleman must bide his time. I have had to listen to many speeches by him, and I hope that he will do me the respect of listening to mine. I shall make my speech in my own way. So far, I have described only a small part of the deeply flawed nature of the legislation.

Mr. Salmond: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ancram: No. I do not want to take too long, and I have given way many times during the Bill's passage.

Quite simply, the mess goes on. The Government proclaim for the Bill—the Secretary of State proclaimed it again today—a proportional election system. As we have clearly demonstrated, such a system is clearly open to abuse—to manipulation by split-ticket voting for alter ego parties—in a way that could outrageously distort the result. Would the Government listen to what we said? What a hope. Concern about the issue was voiced even by the Under-Secretary of State for Wales, the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths), during the passage of the Government of Wales Bill—but not by his Scottish counterpart, to whom admission is apparently tantamount to defeat. A flawed electoral system therefore remains in place in the Bill.

The Bill also contains a flawed system of tax raising. Hon. Members from many parties, and professional people in Scotland—such as accountants and general commentators—all say that the definition of who will pay the extra tax is confused, inadequate and, in some cases, downright unfair. The Government, with their familiar humility, respond by saying that the proposed system requires no change.

The greatest flaws are yet to become apparent. Europe, and Scotland's voice within it, has been much debated in the House. We say that Scotland's right to be heard, which is implicit in the current unitary arrangements of the United Kingdom, is being discontinued by the legislation, with nothing effective to replace it. I believe that both the Liberal Democrats and the Scottish National party agree with that analysis, as do Scottish fishermen and Scottish industry. The Government do not agree with it. Ministers talk blithely of informal agreements to regulate the matter, and have rejected genuine attempts to give Scotland statutory rights to be consulted and heard. They told us that it was not necessary to do so—because, after all, nothing much has changed, and all will go on as before.

I wonder whether the Government really understand the purport of their own legislation. In today's Scottish questions, the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald), said that, after devolution, Ministers would continue to participate in European bodies "on the same basis as at present".

They cannot participate on the same basis, as their status will be different. After devolution, they will cease being United Kingdom Ministers. One unitary Government will become two Governments, who will not necessarily be of the same persuasion. Disagreements and conflicts of interest will arise. Where will Scotland's voice be? The precise answer is nowhere, and no amount of pusillanimous and pious talk of concordats will alter the realpolitik that will govern.

What about money? Of all the elements that can help to hold the United Kingdom together in the face of the threat of separation, foremost is the need for a system providing fair resourcing to all parts of the United Kingdom. The issue's sensitivity was highlighted in yesterday's Financial Times, which, in the same article, proclaimed that could reduce resentment. Yet the Bill remains dangerously quiet on that issue.

"a new assessment of public spending needs across the UK"

Again we are told that we need not worry, that nothing has changed, and that all will go on as before. However, what is now one Government will become two separate Administrations, with politically different agendas. It is really a dereliction that the specific issue of fair resourcing has simply not been addressed. If ever there was a cusp on which future division can be forced, an area for separatists to exploit and an issue requiring statutory reassurance, it is the issue of fair resourcing. Yet, once again, the Government have failed to act, leaving the Bill dangerously flawed.

There will be much work for the other place in trying to salvage the Bill's original intentions of providing for a healthy, stable and beneficial Parliament for Scotland. There are many holes to be filled, and many half-baked proposals will require proper cooking.

The real trouble is that the Bill has proceeded on a false assumption in the minds of Ministers. Throughout the Bill's passage, whenever we pointed out difficulties, Ministers used buzzwords and phrases, such as consensus, agreement, concordat, fraternal co-operation, the new politics, all working together—

Mr. Jenkin: And the third way.

Mr. Ancram: Yes. However, the Government's pipe-dream has been shattered by the cold blast of political reality that is now shown in political opinion in Scotland. Today, we saw an example of that political reality, in the spat between the Minister for Education and Industry, Scottish Office, the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson), and the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond). Such personalised venom is hardly the new politics that we were promised.

Right from the start, we argued that the Bill needed to provide against the storm, and that it had to be tested against the worst-case scenario and not against the fairytale world described at the start of the debate by the Secretary of State. The need is even greater today, but, as the Bill leaves this House, that need has not been met.

The people of Scotland can rightly feel that they have been sold a false prospectus. It is certain that much of what has been said about the Bill will come home to haunt the members of the Government. All those easy words about the constitution, the role of Parliament and so on, will be there for the eating in future. The Government will wish increasingly that they had thought through the Bill rather more comprehensively before taking it through the House.

The hunted, twitching, panicking looks on the faces of Scottish Office Ministers demonstrate that that nightmare has already begun. We shall refrain from saying, "I told you so," but we shall look for the Bill to be improved in another place. Scotland was promised a stable Parliament that would work, not one that would descend into chaos in a welter of constitutional argument. As the Bill leaves us, it does not deliver that basic promise. Our role in these debates is one of which we can be proud. We at least have done our best. We can only hope that, in the other place, the Government will think again.

Mr. Wallace: We are still waiting to find out whether the Conservatives will act on their hot words and vote against the Bill, which the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) clearly believes is flawed. We shall see whether the Division Bell rings and whether the Conservatives have the courage of their convictions.

Mr. Salmond: I do not think that the hon. and learned Gentleman is being fair. The right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) said that he was about to listen to the arguments. Which particular argument—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. Will the hon. Gentleman please be seated? I will not allow a discussion on how hon. Members might vote if there is a Division. This is a Third Reading debate. We will have a Third Reading debate on the content of the Bill, and nothing else.

Mr. Wallace: If I am not straying too far beyond your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker, may I thank your good self and your colleagues in the Chair for the way in which proceedings in Committee and on Report have been conducted—not least the Chairman of Ways and Means, who convened the Business Committee? The programme allowed reasonable explanation of many aspects of the Bill. Matters that were not dealt with in Committee were largely covered on Report.

It is a convention of the House that all Committee proceedings on a constitutional Bill should be taken on the Floor of the House. From experience of proceedings of this Bill, I do not think that that necessarily leads to effective scrutiny of all proposed provisions. The scrutiny that that convention claims may not necessarily be achieved in considering further constitutional Bills.

I congratulate the Secretary of State and, particularly, the Minister for Home Affairs and Devolution on their tenacity and endurance in steering the Bill through the House. I congratulate the Minister, too, on the way in which he responded in several respects, although I shall come later to the issues to which we have not had a response.

We very much welcome the fact that the Bill reflects the White Paper, which, in turn, reflected the agreement achieved in the Scottish Constitutional Convention. There was much talk—not least during the referendum campaign—that it was a bit of a fraud to put a White Paper before the people because the Bill would be different, but the Bill that is about to go to another place substantially and very fairly reflects the White Paper. Of course, a White Paper may include many things that cannot always be translated into legislative form. None the less, the White Paper was a fair presentation of what the people of Scotland were asked to vote for in September.

I turn to issues on which we still have reservations. The number of Scottish Parliament constituencies, once the boundary commission has reduced the number of constituencies in Westminster, is still unresolved. I welcome the Minister of State's constructive approach to that issue, and I hope that it will be addressed in another place and that the Parliament will continue to have 129 seats.

Abortion will remain a reserved matter. I do not want to rehearse all the arguments that we had in Committee, but there is an imbalance and an illogicality in making euthanasia a matter for the Scottish Parliament, but not abortion, which relates to health and law, both of which are devolved matters.

I agree with the right hon. Member for Devizes that it would be far better if there were a statutory right to Scottish representation at European Council meetings. We should always prepare for the worst-case scenario, and a future Government, perhaps of a different complexion to this one, might not want the Scottish Parliament to be involved in a delegation. It would be useful to have, as do the lander in Germany, a statutory right that would not allow exclusion.

The Barnett formula is not enshrined in the Bill. There ought to be some means by which we can guarantee the revenue of the Scottish Parliament. There is still unease and concern among professional bodies about the detail of the tax-varying powers which I hope will be considered constructively in another place.

Mr. Jenkin: So will the hon. and learned Gentleman vote against the Bill?

Mr. Wallace: I will not vote against the Bill. It substantially represents the agreement struck between the Liberal Democrats, the Labour party and—let us not forget—many others who were involved in the constitutional convention, such as trade unions, Churches and many groups from Scottish civic life. The Government have honoured the agreement into which they entered.

[Mr. Wallace]

The Bill differs in several significant respects from that put before the Scottish people in 1979. The fact that it contains tax-varying powers means that the Parliament will have some fiscal accountability, which is as much a matter of democracy as of accountability. Even if those powers are not used, the fact that they exist means that the electorate can ask, "Why has the hospital not been built?" or "Why has the school not been built?" and those who are elected must explain why they did not use the powers. Those powers improve the quality of accountability of those who are elected to those who elect them.

The pre-legislative consultative committees will improve the quality of legislation and, above all, will include many people in Scotland—not just the great and the good—in decision making. I hope that we will be able to devise structures that will reach out. The use of new information technology will allow people from all corners of Scotland to get involved in the decision-making process.

We shall have an electoral system that will fairly represent the parties, according to their strength in Scotland, in the number of seats that they are awarded in the Scottish Parliament. That is important not only in terms of democratic, fair representation, but in ensuring that it is a Parliament for the whole of Scotland.

Scotland is not, by any stretch of the imagination, an homogenous country. It varies greatly from north to south and from east to west. A system of proportional representation will mean that every party will have a stake in Scotland's rural areas and in its urban areas. That can only be for the good, because all parties will have first-hand experience of different parts of Scotland and their problems, challenges and opportunities, which can only inform all parties and will, I trust, lead to better decision making.

It is important to stress the question of the sovereignty of the people. As I said in an earlier debate, if people want to vote for independence in a general election, they are free to do so because there is a party that represents that view. They have not done so in any great numbers in successive elections.

Mr. Dalyell: What is the hon. and learned Gentleman's view of whether the Scottish Parliament can trigger a referendum?

Mr. Wallace: About two and a half hours ago, I said that I did not think that the Bill was especially clear about that, and that I had hoped that we would have clarification. I still do not think that the matter is clear; that is why I would have welcomed provisions in the Bill to put it right. I said that I thought that there should be the right to a trigger, although I also thought that it would be unwise to use it.

To return to my thread, we now have a proposal that has the overwhelming support of the Scottish people. I was one of the people in my party who opposed the idea of a referendum, but I said that if there were one, we should campaign strongly for a yes vote. Perhaps I got it wrong in opposing the referendum, because when it happened, the vote that the measure received represented probably the greatest form of entrenchment that it could have. We are about to have a relationship and a Parliament which really represent the will of the Scottish people. Their sovereignty has been expressed, and the Parliament that we are about to have represents the expression of that sovereignty.

We could argue that this is the first time that has ever happened, because those who negotiated the treaty of Union in 1707 had pretty scant regard for what the vast majority of the people of Scotland thought. Despite the idea sometimes expressed that we are in some way restoring a democratic Parliament, Scotland has never had a democratic Parliament. That is what we are about to embark upon.

There is something that goes with that, and we should not be ashamed or embarrassed to say so. It is that those of us who support the idea of a Scottish Parliament within the United Kingdom should remember that there are two strands to the argument. Inevitably, we have talked a lot about the Scottish Parliament; we have talked about its powers, the years of campaigning that it took to get it, and the hours that we have spent discussing the detail in the Bill. However, we should not forget the other strand: the fact that the Parliament will be within the United Kingdom.

Just as we are proud to celebrate the establishment of a Scottish Parliament, we should not be ashamed to say that we still believe in the merits of a United Kingdom. In other contexts, we are debating the completion of a single market and the prospect of a single currency. Here we already have a single market and a single currency, and we have had them for nearly 300 years. They work substantially to our advantage, and have done for many years.

That is all before we even start to consider the kinship, the shared history and shared heritage, all of which are valued. I hope that, when the Scottish Parliament is established, we will not feel that to celebrate the Union makes us in any way less Scots. We can celebrate both the Scottish Parliament and our continuing membership of a United Kingdom that has served us all so well.

I would not wish to disappoint the right hon. Member for Devizes, who said on Second Reading that I never made a speech without mentioning Mr. Gladstone. Today is the 100th anniversary of Mr. Gladstone's death, and I cannot think of a better memorial to the great old Liberal Prime Minister than the fact that we are putting into place one of the things for which he campaigned—Scottish home rule.

In doing so, we are allowing ourselves an opportunity within Scotland to address the issues that matter to the people of Scotland—decent housing and a decent education system for our young people to train them and equip them with the skills to meet the challenges of the global marketplace, decent hospitals and a decent health service, the securing of jobs. Those are the things which really matter to the people of Scotland, and we shall have an opportunity to deal with them within Scotland. That will allow change for the better in the government of Scotland. For that reason, my right hon. and hon. Friends and I will celebrate that fact, and will have much pleasure in giving the Bill a Third Reading tonight.

9.32 pm

Mr. Dalyell: The Secretary of State referred earlier to certain tensions during a previous debate—[HON. MEMBERS: "He has gone again."] Yes; I have to say that I am one of those old-fashioned people who think that a Secretary of State has nowhere better to be than on the Floor of the House of Commons when the Third Reading of his own legislation is being debated. That is partly because I wanted to ask my right hon. Friend a serious question.

First, however let me say—I wish that the Secretary of State were in the Chamber to hear this—that, in one particular respect, I was wrong and he was definitely right. As I understand it, his first instinct was that although the important clauses should be taken on the Floor of the House, the rest of the Bill should be taken in a Standing Committee—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]—which was also the view of the hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace).

I was one of those who thought, perhaps in an old-fashioned way, that constitutional Bills should be taken on the Floor of the House, full stop. I think now that I was wrong and that my right hon. Friend was right. If parts of the Bill had been taken upstairs, it would have been less unexamined that it has been.

Mr. Swinney: I invite the hon. Gentleman to consider an area of the Bill that I think would have benefited from much greater scrutiny—the definition of the Scottish taxpayer, who may have to pay for the tax-varying powers. Does he believe that that would have been the subject of more detailed consideration if it had been taken in Committee upstairs, where we could have got to the nub of some of the concerns of hon. Members from both sides of the House that have not been dealt with in the Bill?

Mr. Dalyell: The hon. Gentleman saves me some time, as I strongly agree with him. In particular—I wanted to put this question directly to the Secretary of State—what are Scottish Office Ministers doing to ensure that they have serious discussions with the Institute of Chartered Accountants? The institute's parliamentary officer is the daughter of one of the founders of the devolutionary movement, the late Professor John Mackintosh MP, for whom I had the greatest respect. The institute may be well disposed towards the general devolution proposal, but I am told that there are serious concerns about the important question of who is, and who is not, a taxpayer. Often, only small sums of money may be involved, but, because of the possibility of litigation, the lawyers will have a heyday, which I do not think that any of us want.

Dr. Fox: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way for what may be the last time in our consideration of the Bill. Does he agree that, whether the Bill is taken on the Floor of the House or upstairs in Committee, the effectiveness of scrutiny is dependent on the willingness of Ministers to give detailed replies to questions asked by hon. Members? Their failure to answer some of the specifics to which he refers has been the reason for the failure of scrutiny.

Mr. Dalyell: We must face the fact that part of the difficulty is that there are no answers to the problems that arise in setting up a subordinate Parliament in one part, but only one part, of a unitary state. The model proposed in the Bill is different from the one in Catalonia and has not been tried anywhere in the world.

I have a concern—it is one among many—to which I want to return. The problem is currently disguised by the Government's majority of 179. Not only may legislation be imposed on the English part of the United Kingdom contrary to the political wishes of the majority of English Members of Parliament, but a Secretary of State for Health, for Education or for local government in England may be imposed who does not match the political colour of the Members who have, rightly or wrongly, been elected by the English.

Mr. Malcolm Savidge (Aberdeen, North): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Dalyell: No. Therein—

Mr. Savidge rose—

Mr. Dalyell: I have attended all our deliberations of the Bill—my hon. Friend will have his turn.

Therein lies the difficulty of the slow candle of English nationalism. The position cannot endure, although it will endure during this Parliament, as it is disguised, and it will probably endure during the next Parliament. Sooner rather than later, however, hon. Members will find that the structure cannot last in anything recognisably like its current form. It is a structure built on sand and, as such, it will lead to endless difficulty in these islands. If I am Banquo's ghost, I am full of woe about what we are doing tonight.

Mr. Salmond: I am glad that the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) ended with a literary allusion, because I had intended to congratulate the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) on an historical allusion when he said of the legislation that, "It cam in' a mess. It gang wi' a mess", but I then realised that the allusion was totally unwitting.

My party will vote for the legislation if we get the chance to vote. I do not challenge it in any way, but I was somewhat surprised, Mr. Deputy Speaker, by your innovative ruling that speculating on voting patterns on Third Reading would not be in order. I have never heard of that before—but the House is full of surprises.

I am not sure what argument remains to be debated that will decide whether there is a vote against the Bill. I shall be interested to see whether the right hon. Member for Devizes follows the logic of his speech.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Get on with it.

Mr. Salmond: As the hon. Gentleman asks me to get on with it, I shall move on to my next point: I was impressed by the turnout of Conservative Members, until several Conservative Back Benchers confided to me the reasons for their attendance. They said that they had been designated to attend and speak on the Bill and that, in return, they all got a shottie at the Dispatch Box.

Right enough, all the Conservative Back Benchers who attended, at some point or other, and with varying degrees of success, got to speak at the Dispatch Box. That puts the Liberal party and the Scottish National party at a serious disadvantage: we cannot give an incentive to our Back Benchers to come along to debates by giving them a shot at the Dispatch Box.

My understanding that the Conservative party is putting up 73 candidates comes from no less a source than Mr. Raymond Robertson, the chairman of the Scottish Conservative party, so it must be true; and I leave that observation to be judged on its merits.

The Labour Back Benches were not always as full as the Conservative ones, but Labour participation was dangerous: the hon. Members for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) for Falkirk, East (Mr. Connarty) and for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Davidson) made distinguished contributions, and all of them seem to have been rejected for the list of potential candidates for the Scottish Parliament. Clearly, the best advice for aspiring candidates was not to turn up for the debates.

The Secretary of State did not get the hon. Member for Pollok's graceful and humorous point about his dress and apparel; perhaps he did not know that the lack of a tie was given, in the newspapers at least, as the reason why he had not made it on to the list.

Mr. Dewar indicated dissent.

Mr. Salmond: Well, it must have been some other matter of dress that did for the hon. Member for Pollok.

Some important points were established in our consideration of the Bill. I was disappointed on several occasions. I thought that the White Paper gave us reason to expect that the Scottish Parliament would have the power to summon not only witnesses but documents, which is important for its powers of investigation.

I was disappointed, as apparently was the right hon. Member for Devizes, by the lack of clarity on the European role. Earlier remarks, by the Foreign Secretary in particular, had raised expectations that the Parliament would have a defined European role, but that was not forthcoming.

I was disappointed by clause 27(7), which potentially overrides everything and means that, notwithstanding the rest of the legislation, the Westminster Parliament still has the ability if it so chooses to do anything it so chooses, even on devolved legislation. That contradicts the statements of the Secretary of State for Scotland during the devolution referendum that never again could a poll tax be imposed on Scotland. Clause 27(7) would allow the Westminster Parliament to impose such taxation.

We shall vote for the Bill despite those failings because I believe that this is a process, not an event; a beginning, not an end. Even my worst enemy would not accuse me of a lack of consistency on that. The Secretary of State raises his glasses. I take that as a sign of assent. The glasses are raised when he agrees. The glasses are now down. That must be a signal that other hon. Members are waiting to speak. I have described how the Scottish National party regards the legislation. It is therefore worth voting for.

As the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) said, not every subject worthy of debate was debated. If he, rather than the Conservative party representatives, had been on the Business Committee, many of those issues could have been brought before the House. I regarded many of our long debates as less important than some of the short ones. The hon. Member for Linlithgow nods in assent.

I regret the chicanery earlier this evening that resulted in a clause not being debated. I think that that was the only sharp practice in the course of the legislation.

Mr. Dewar indicated dissent.

Mr. Salmond: The Secretary of State demurs, but I think that there was some attempt to prevent a vote on that clause, which was foolish and unworthy. It could be said that the Conservatives should have asked for more than 15 minutes to debate one of their own amendments. [Interruption.] It is no argument to say that the SNP should not have voted on a clause that we thought was important.

Mr. Savidge: Does the hon. Gentleman think that the time taken to count the 289 votes was disproportionate compared with the time taken to count some of the votes during consideration of the Wild Mammals (Hunting with Dogs) Bill?

Mr. Salmond: If the hon. Gentleman is saying that two wrongs make a right and that sharp practice on one side justifies it on the other, I take it as an admission that there may have been some slow movement through the No Lobby earlier this evening. That was unnecessary. It demeans the process of legislation to resort to such a tactic. It is not worthy of the Secretary of State for Scotland or of the processes of this House. That was probably the only occasion on which I detected such practice during the passage of the Bill.

It is a small, sour note to end what has mostly been a positive and productive process. I strongly support the Bill and look to the future optimistically with high hopes and brave heart. I am confident that the judgment of the people of Scotland will be that of the SNP: that this is a beginning, not an end.

Mr. McAllion: It is not merely arguable but certain that history is being made tonight. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland said, after tonight nothing will ever be the same again. It is therefore disappointing that this debate is taking place in such a thinly attended chamber and a flat atmosphere. I agree with what he said when he was challenged about whether constitutional issues such as this are above the comprehension of the average voter. Like him, I do not believe that. Average voters can follow very well the intricacies of constitutional Bills. Both he and I would have to admit that what has gone on inside the Chamber tonight is not necessarily the priority for ordinary voters.

For example, we heard from Opposition Members about the huge resentment outside this Chamber among the English people, who will rise up in rebellion when the true significance of the Bill becomes known. I went outside the Chamber earlier to have something to eat and read the London Evening Standard, which has a wide circulation in this metropolis. Its banner headline is not about historic events inside the Chamber but reads, "Labour chaplain gropes wives." [Interruption.] Sorry, it was "Army chaplain"—[Laughter.] If any Labour Member is called Chaplain, I apologise immediately. That headline shows the level of interest outside and gives the lie to many of the arguments that we have heard from the Opposition tonight.

I must associate myself with the remarks made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland when he thanked the various contributors to the long process of this Bill, but I want to single out some he did not directly mention. I thought that the contributions from my hon. Friends the Members for Falkirk, East (Mr. Connarty), for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) and for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Davidson) have been outstanding. I am sure that everyone who has been in the Committee would agree that they are excellent parliamentarians and that they would grace any Parliament anywhere in the United Kingdom, if they were given the opportunity to stand, and I am sure that they would return the compliment to me, if they had the opportunity.

Most of all, I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my hon. Friends on the Front Bench on succeeding in getting this important Bill to its Third Reading in a form recognisable as the scheme set out not only in the White Paper on devolution, but in the blueprint established by the Scottish Constitutional Conventional all those years ago. We have to remember the sort of Parliament that we are agreeing to set up. For the first time, Scotland will have a democratically elected Parliament—not for the first time in 300 years, but for the first time ever. The last Scottish Parliament was anything but democratic, which is why it no longer exists. If it had been democratic, it would still be with us and all this would have been unnecessary.

Also, the Parliament will be elected by proportional representation and the Labour party ought to be congratulated by the minority parties in Scotland—[HON. MEMBERS: "What?"]—well, the majority in some cases, but by the other minority parties for being reasonable enough to allow the electoral system to be changed when it worked to Labour's advantage.

We shall have a Parliament which has the right to vary the rate of income tax, as was promised by the constitutional convention; a Parliament which will be in control of the Scottish block, which will be arrived at through the Barnett formula, despite the moans from Tory Members; and a Parliament in charge of the health service, local government, housing and Scottish law. In fact, we have in the Bill an excellent Parliament, which the Scottish people will be happy to see set up.

There have been some disappointments. We are not yet there on 50:50, but that is not through lack of effort by my hon. Friends in the Labour party or, indeed, the Scottish Labour party as a whole. The problem has lain with other parties failing to come to an agreement that would ensure a 50:50 Parliament in Scotland.

From time to time, there has been falling out along the way. For example, there was some dispute earlier over the right to hold referendums. I must tell my hon. Friends that I do not set out to be on the other side of the argument from them on every occasion. I remember that, when they suggested that there should be a referendum before the general election, I disagreed, and when I suggested that there should be a referendum after the general election, they disagreed with me. That was coincidental. I have been saying what I think, not deliberately setting out to go against them. However, we have a sound basis for a powerful Parliament and one which will be very popular in Scotland in the years ahead.

Some issues have clouded debate on the Bill for me, in particular the debates on matters to be reserved to the Westminster Parliament and the assertion of the sovereignty of that Parliament over everything else, as well as the role of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council—those areas that are said to be extra vires for the Scottish Parliament and all those different ways in which the Westminster Parliament is seeking to assert its right to control what the Scottish Parliament does. I cannot believe that any of those different matters will be a practical option for the Westminster Parliament in the real world when it comes to co-exist with another democratically elected Parliament inside the United Kingdom.

What we have to remember is that the Scottish Parliament, unlike the Westminster Parliament, will be exclusively Scottish; it will be elected exclusively by the Scottish people; it will be answerable to the Scottish people alone; that will be Scottish in every sense of the word. If the Scots in the Westminster Parliament take this Parliament's side against the Scottish Parliament, it will be seen as being anti-Scottish and it would not be sensible for anyone here to do that.

Mr. Cash: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. McAllion: No, I have not got time and other hon. Members want to speak.

I know that the fact that there is to be a new relationship with a new sort of Parliament creates uncertainty and that Members of this Parliament do not like uncertainty, so they cling to the old certainties like Westminster sovereignty which reassure them and make them feel better. However, that is entirely the wrong attitude to take, because hon. Members have to recognise that they are dealing with a body that differs greatly from anything with which they have dealt before. We cannot compare a Scottish Parliament to Scottish local government and say that, because Scottish local government is a creature of Westminster statute, the Scottish Parliament will be a creature of Westminster statute. We are dealing with a national Parliament—a Parliament which has behind it the democratic authority of a nation having voted in democratic elections to put it into power; a Parliament which will have to be treated with respect and not as a plaything of this Parliament, to be chopped and changed to this Parliament's liking.

I remember—albeit not personally, as I was not a Member of Parliament at the time—Enoch Powell arguing way back in the 1970s that devolution meant power devolved being power retained. That was 1970s-style devolution, but hon. Members have to remember that that sort of devolution was not sufficiently popular to stand up to the chicanery of the Westminster Parliament, so it did not succeed in getting enough of the Scottish people to support it against the desires of Members of this Parliament. Since the 1970s, the world has moved on and the situation is entirely different. We have had 18 years of undemocratic Tory government in Scotland, which hugely changed the opinion of Scots about the role of a devolved Scottish Parliament. We have had the Claim of Right for Scotland, which asserts the sovereignty of the Scottish people and which is unchallenged in Scotland by almost all parties—even the Tories have come to accept that the sovereignty of the Scottish people is sacrosanct above all else. We have had the Scottish Constitutional Convention, which drew up a scheme for a devolved Parliament that was very different from the sort of Parliament suggested back in the 1970s.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Faversham and Mid-Kent): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. McAllion: There is not time and I shall finish soon.

The 1990s-style devolution will be very different from the 1970s-style devolution and it will require the Westminster Parliament not to retain power, but to let go of power and free the Scottish Parliament to go its own way. Ultimately, what devolution really means is the right of the Scottish Parliament to be different from the Westminster Parliament—the right to decide that Scotland wants a different way of running its health service, a different way of looking after its schools and a different way of organising local government or paying for public services. That is Scotland's right and that is what devolution is all about. If we in our ignorance attempt to prevent Scotland from developing its own distinct and different ways, we really will be stoking up trouble for the rest of the United Kingdom.

Today's political change becomes tomorrow's political status quo, and no status quo lasts for ever. Even the old Union, which was swept away on 11 September by the double yes vote in the referendum, was not the same Union that had lasted for 300 years. It had survived for so long only because it had changed constantly. The Scottish Office was not around in 1707 and neither was the Scottish Grand Committee or the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs; those changes were made over time, because nothing in politics lasts for ever. Everything has to change and we must not get hung up on the question whether or not there can be further change in the constitutional arrangements between Scotland and the rest of the United Kingdom, or whether the demand for such constitutional change has to be channelled through the Westminster Parliament, rather than through the Parliament that we are going to establish up in Scotland.

On its own, a devolved Parliament does not make any difference to whether Scotland will become independent or remain within the United Kingdom and neither does the holding of a referendum. Scotland will become independent only when a clear majority of the Scottish people want it to become independent. There is no road block that this Parliament or anyone else can put in the way of the Scottish people once they have decided to become independent; nor should anyone try to obstruct that desire. I cannot believe that anyone in the Labour party would genuinely want to frustrate the desire of the Scottish people if they wanted Scotland to become an independent country.

I believe that, tonight, the Scottish people are getting what, in the main, they voted for in the past four or five general elections—what I voted for—and in a democracy, that cannot be bad.

It is said that history is sometimes made in very strange places, and they do not come much stranger than this place. Perhaps the strangest thing of all is that the Bill, having been considered by the democratically elected representatives of the people since the start of January, now passes to another House which is not democratically elected, and about whose deliberations the people have no say. I can only say to the lords who sit there that, although we can do nothing about that now, they should be wary of trying to make any changes to the Bill.

I hope that Ministers will reassure us that the Scotland Bill is the beginning, not the end, of constitutional change in this country. When we have seen the Bill on to the statute book, we shall return to get rid of those—I was going to say "tyrants", but I had better not—unelected members of the other place.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): I have taken part in most of the deliberations on the Bill and, notwithstanding what the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) said, I should have done so regardless of the fact that doing so might increase the possibility of opportunities, however brief, to stand at the Dispatch Box. I have taken part in these proceedings because this is a matter of fundamental constitutional importance, and I am sure that goes for all my colleagues.

Mr. Salmond: I hope that the hon. Gentleman, who is an honourable man, is not disputing the point that I made.

Mr. Hayes: I merely reply that hon. Members in other parts of the House suggested to me that it was a good tactical move on the part of the Conservative party to give its new Members an opportunity to extend their skills and expand their experience. I am delighted to inform the House that that suggestion came from some of the frustrated new Labour Members who are given few opportunities to do anything. However, I do not want to become involved in such tittle-tattle because time is short and I wish to be brief.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) said, the Bill is full of contradictions and anomalies, in many fields. In drugs policy, in food safety, in abortion and in tax-raising issues, there are significant anomalies in the Bill. One can only hope that they will be corrected when it passes to the other place—for which some of us have a great deal of respect, despite the comments by the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion).

Beyond those anomalies and contradictions, one fundamental point needs to be amplified. By the admission of all those who have spoken, the Bill is significant. The Secretary of State told us that nothing would be quite the same again, and it was suggested from our Front Bench that the Bill was a matter of fundamental constitutional importance.

In those circumstances, I am worried, not by the hidden political electoral agenda, but by the absence of an agenda in respect of the constitutional strategy for the United Kingdom. There is an absence of vision about where the Bill leaves us in terms of the settlement between the various parts of the kingdom. I do not know whether the vision does not exist or whether the Labour party is not prepared to come clean about it; I shall be generous and say that it is the former not the latter. However, as a result, further difficulties are inevitable in the relationship between the constituent parts of our kingdom.

If the Labour party chooses to solve those matters by setting up an English Grand Committee, or even perhaps an English Parliament—or a council of the isles, as has been suggested—let us hear that now. Let us have a frank, open and full debate about the future of the entire constitution of these islands. Let us not have piecemeal, ad hoc reform of the constitution, whereby Scotland and Wales are dealt with in one fashion, leaving us in an inconsistent state, and other matters must be patched up to quell the dissatisfaction in England that will undoubtedly result from this legislation. Let us have a full and open debate. Let us hear what the Labour party believes is the appropriate way to deal with those matters.

I shall conclude so that as many people as possible have a chance to speak. What concerns me is not so much what we have discussed in recent weeks and months, but the matters that have not been fully aired and considered: future democratic accountability of the nation; the distribution of sovereignty; how these islands will be governed; and the impact of all that on the interests of all the British people.

10.4 pm

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): I could not disagree more with the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes). If we had waited until the rest of the United Kingdom worked out how to conduct its home affairs, we would have waited a considerable time. Scotland was more than ready to go ahead with legislation for a Scottish Parliament. We have fulfilled our promise to introduce a Bill in the first year of government, and it will not be long before that process is complete.

The right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) compared the Bill to a great ship leaving harbour and setting sail across the ocean. The more he went on, the more I thought he must have seen "Titanic" recently, although he stopped short of comparing the recent opinion poll to an iceberg. The Scottish National party will have to make up its mind; it cannot be on the bridge, steering the ship safely to port, but then take it out to meet an iceberg. By saying that the Bill is part of a process that does not stop with devolution, the SNP rejects all that the people of Scotland said in the referendum in September. They wanted what the Bill is delivering; to say that they want to go further is to fly in the face of their will.

We could hold referendums again and again, as was pointed out last Thursday at Question Time. We should remember, however, that people in Quebec are at each other's throats all the time, and we do not want that in Scotland.

The right hon. Member for Devizes referred to aspects of the Bill that had been left undebated. He said that large lumps and holes had to be filled, but I can ignore his mixed metaphors. As some of my hon. Friends have said, if members of the House of Lords do not treat the Bill seriously, or try to frustrate the clear will of the people of Scotland, their actions will come to haunt them.

Abortion and euthanasia have been raised, but I am baffled that any hon. Member should think that they are similar. To me, it seems obvious that abortions are carried out in clinics and hospitals, and it would be sensible to avoid cross-border traffic. Euthanasia, however, is by its nature likely to be carried out wherever the dying person happens to be; we are not talking about transporting people on the point of death to clinics—a point which appears to have escaped those who discussed the two issues.

Let me turn to the heart and soul of the Bill. We have rightly gone for a unicameral system, following the discussions of the Scottish Constitutional Convention. The system involves consulting outside bodies—Special Standing Committees can do that here, but are rarely used—and that can only benefit us by making it more likely that legislation meets people's needs.

I am glad that the Labour party in Wales has followed our lead in Scotland and has voted to carry out a twinning process for the selection of Labour candidates in Wales. I should not like the debate to conclude tonight without our thanking those in the convention who were involved in the fight for 50:50 representation. Particular credit must go to the Scottish Trades Union Congress women's committee for first raising the issue. As my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) pointed out, we will not achieve 50:50, but, owing to the Labour party's efforts alone so far, we are likely to achieve a high percentage of women Members, possibly one of the highest in Europe. We may well go on to achieve more.

With reference to the advice given on that subject, I maintain that there is nothing in our law or in European law to prevent political parties from taking steps to ensure equal representation in our Parliament. If I and others who share my view are wrong, I am indebted to Professor Noreen Burrows for pointing out that the equal treatment directive also applies to other matters in the constitution and political processes—for example, the succession to the Crown. The Princess Royal could take her case to an industrial tribunal. Although I am not a monarchist, I would say that, when the job goes a-begging, it should go to the best candidate, and many of us think that she would have an excellent claim. Likewise, peerages that pass from father to son under the present system could be challenged by the daughters.

I hope that I am not upsetting my hon. Friends too much, and I am glad that I will not be standing for the Scottish Parliament. If anyone tries to railroad our efforts and overturn them by taking us to an industrial tribunal, such consequences are likely to be raised, together with contests that were never aired before.

To conclude on a positive note, the Scottish Parliament will be different. It will bring about widespread discussion in our country and meet the needs of our people. I am glad to support it, as it will initiate change throughout the United Kingdom, to the benefit of us all in achieving more democratic processes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have received word that hon. Members on the Front Benches wish to make winding-up speeches, and I shall call them at 10.20. I hope that I can call at least one hon. Member from either side of the House before then.

Mr. Swayne: One of the principal weaknesses of the Bill was illustrated this evening when the Minister of State, in answer to an earlier debate, complained that, after 55 weeks—that was his timetable, not mine—we were still discussing this constitutional circus. It is extraordinary that, as the Bill leaves the House, we are still ignorant—[HON. MEMBERS: "You are."] The House is still ignorant of whether the Scottish Parliament will be able to initiate a referendum on independence in Scotland.

We have heard various opinions, but it has been suggested from below the Gangway that the matter will be decided in the courts. I hope that it will be decided by their lordships, rather than in the courts, but the issue properly remains to this House. The constitutional settlement that was offered in the referendum referred to a devolved Parliament, a subordinate Parliament, where the sovereignty of the Scottish people properly rests with this House.

A referendum on independence in Scotland should be triggered only when this House takes notice of the fact that a majority of Scottish Members of this Parliament are members of the party below the Gangway, the Scottish National party. That is the proper time for such a referendum.

This is a dreadful Bill. Another of its principal weaknesses is the extraordinary arrangements that it will put in place to elect the Members of the Scottish Parliament. Those arrangements are the product of what we were told would be new politics and a new consensus. We were told that Labour was a party for the new Jerusalem, and that everyone would agree and co-operate. So many of this Bill's arrangements depend on that and on the good will of the Scottish Members in working together.

As the processes have unfolded, as we have watched the Bill proceed and the opinion polls in Scotland change, we have seen the saints beginning to fall out. We know that politics has not changed, and that there is nothing new under the sun. We know also that these extraordinary electoral arrangements will return to haunt the Government as the matter proceeds.

Mr. Salmond: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Swayne: No, I do not have time.

The question that remains to be decided by those of us who are deeply alarmed by the Bill is essentially whether the problems that it will create will be greater if we stop the process now, simply as a consequence of the quite unrealistic expectations that have been raised.

10.15 pm

Ms Sandra Osborne (Ayr): I shall be brief in view of your earlier comments, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I believe that this is an evening for celebration, and I congratulate the Secretary of State and the Minister. The Secretary of State may look rather tired, but he certainly does not look haunted or hunted.

Although this has been a rather low-key debate, and some people might say that the Committee stage was not exactly scintillating, I believe that this is a significant day for the Scottish people. They gave their verdict on this and other issues on 1 May last year—and I note that the sun came out today in celebration of the achievement of a Scottish Parliament, just as it did then in celebration of the general election.

I do not share Opposition Members' views about the cynicism of the so-called "new politics". The right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) spoke uncharacteristically about new politics, which he described as a fairy-tale world. I believe that many people in Scotland and elsewhere regard this place as a bit of a fairy-tale world at times, and I am optimistic that the Scottish Parliament will be different. I hope that it will have a more co-operative approach, with more women Members and greater representation from ethnic minority groups. That will be very welcome. I shall not rehearse those arguments again, and I thoroughly agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe). There will also be more transparent procedures.

Mrs. Laing: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Osborne: No. I am sorry, but there is no time.

I support change, and I have great hopes for the Scottish Parliament and its new approach. I believe that many people in Scotland share my view. However, although there appeared to be a positive consensus across Scottish politics for a time, the situation is now very different. I for one am very disappointed about that. I believe it is because too much time is being spent discussing whether there should be a referendum and independence for Scotland even before the Parliament has had a chance to set up and get on with its business.

I support the Scottish Parliament because it will bring more democracy to the everyday issues that affect the lives of people in Scotland. As a former councillor, I know the importance of health, education and housing. We must be able to deal with those issues closer to the people, in a way that they feel is relevant. I realise that the consultative steering group is doing a lot of work examining structures.

I am worried that, when people hear the usual yah-boo exchanges, they will lose heart. I hope that, over the next year, we can discuss each party's position regarding the Parliament's responsibilities. We have had, "Where will it be?", "How much will it cost?" and, "What will it look like?"; it is now time for, "What will it do?" Scottish Office Ministers have made many announcements in the past year—today's announcement on child care to name just one. They have not achieved the publicity they deserve for the revolutionary and radical things they represent, especially in relation to child care, which is a subject close to my heart.

In spite of the conduct of Conservative Members today, I believe that far more detailed and constructive discussion will take place in the Scottish Parliament. The staying power to maintain the momentum for genuine consultation is crucial, and the Scottish people will not thank us if we do not make sure that there is a genuinely different approach in the Scottish Parliament. People outwith the chattering classes in Scotland want something different, which reflects Scottish values and aspirations. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames) must be fair to the hon. Lady. She has been in the Chamber all night, and she must have a hearing without interruption.

Ms Osborne: I am tempted to argue that, when the Scottish people look to the Scottish Parliament to reflect their values and aspirations, they will look to the Labour party, but, in the light of what I said previously, I shall resist temptation. I make a genuine plea to all parties and individuals to go forward to the Scottish Parliament in a genuinely co-operative and constructive manner.

Dr. Fox: At the end of consideration during which there has been extraordinarily low input from Labour Members representing English seats, it is worth stating the context within which the Bill has been considered—Scotland's politics remain Unionist. Three parties at the previous general election put forward Unionist agendas—the Conservatives believe in a unitary state, the Labour party has put forward its devolutionary ideas, and the Liberal Democrats believe in a federal United Kingdom—and 76 per cent. of Scots voted for a Unionist party of one sort or another.

The Government believe that devolution will strengthen the United Kingdom—the Secretary of State has been a consistent proponent of that position for many years, and is honest in his defence of it—and that creating devolution and creating an elusive dynamic will diminish the forces of separatism in Scotland. We do not believe that that is the case, which is why we have always argued against devolution. The risk is that it will not defeat the forces of nationalism, but strengthen them.

That is not a forgone conclusion, however. The end of this part of the Bill's passage through Parliament is the beginning of the fight against the forces of nationalism, which we shall all, in our different ways, have to confront if they are to be defeated. I believe that they can be.

I join—

Mr. Salmond: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Fox: I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman, because we are pushed for time.

I congratulate my hon. Friends who have taken part in the debates on the Bill. I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne), despite a year as a Member of Parliament, has not succumbed to the new politically correct, inclusive, third-way, emotionally incontinent school of politics, and continues not to mince his words. I also congratulate the Minister, who has returned to his place, on the courteous way in which he has carried the debates in the House—he has been generous in giving way—although the manner of its doing does not alter the nature of the deed. We still believe that too many questions have been left unanswered at the end of the Third Reading debate.

We have always worked on the principle that devolution poses a risk to the unity of the United Kingdom because it is an unstable model. As we have said many times, it pretends that the constitutional arrangement in one part of the United Kingdom can be changed without affecting the constitutional position in the rest of it. Given that we are vastly outnumbered in parliamentary terms, we have done our best to diminish the risks for conflict—what the Secretary of State called on Second Reading the "worst case" scenario on which we should plan future proceedings.

Many problems remain in the Bill. We have talked about the electoral system: the Bill will establish new relationships between electors and elected, and the relationship between directly elected Members of the Scottish Parliament and those elected on the list is unclear. To whom will constituents go? Who will deal with inconsistencies and with the inevitable poaching? How will the system work, because it will not be a stable model for new Members? The single-chamber system occurs almost nowhere in the developed, democratic world. How will that work, and how will a counter-balance be provided? Who will carry out revision, and what are the mechanisms by which that will be done?

We still have not had clear views on tax. The hon. Member for North Tayside (Mr. Swinney) said that one of the most important elements missing from the debate was a clear definition of a Scottish taxpayer. Clause 72 does not clearly set out exactly how the tax-raising powers will work, and, given the contradictions between subsections (4) and (5), we do not know how they will work in practice. Many tax experts say that it is simply not possible for two opposites to exist in the Bill and for the Bill to begin to operate smoothly. I hope that the other place will give those matters due weight, because we certainly did not have the opportunity to debate them as closely as we would have liked.

Much of what is to happen will be brought about by concordat, by trusting to good will, although I suppose that, if the Minister for Sport can take the oath with his fingers crossed, the Government can pass the Bill with their fingers crossed. The idea that it must be implemented with bonhomie is not a sufficient constitutional safeguard, and in the Bill it is safeguards that we seek.

On the issue of Europe, there has been widespread cross-party criticism of the Government's failure to accept that the relationship will change. The role of Scotland in Europe will change fundamentally as a result of the legislation. That was never better demonstrated than by the case of Scottish fishermen who, because they constitute the majority of those in the United Kingdom's fishing industry, are automatically represented by a Scottish Office Minister, who is the lead Minister in European discussions. We are told that arrangements will remain as they are, and that there will always be the same consensus. They will not: they will change fundamentally as a result of the Bill, as will the role of the Secretary of State.

What role will the Secretary of State have in the Cabinet? Whom will he speak for, and where will his loyalties lie? Who will answer in the House for the decisions of the Scottish Parliament? We have never had an answer to that conundrum, which was raised several times. Those of us who sit in the House are responsible for raising taxes. After the Budget, we each have to vote for the raising of taxes which go to the Consolidated Fund and to the Scottish block. What mechanism will we who take responsibility for raising taxes have to scrutinise how the tax money is spent? That question has not been answered.

There are still inconsistencies in schedule 5. We wanted to discuss abortion and euthanasia and the inconsistencies relating to those matters. The contribution by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) raised more questions than it answered. We shall want to explore those matters in the other place. Despite a full day's debate, we have not had an answer on what is called the West Lothian question. The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) said that it was not possible to have an answer to that question. That may be the correct assumption, given the form of devolution that we are debating. We have never dealt effectively with the English dimension, or with how it will proceed.

The Secretary of State has long believed in devolution as a way to maintain the Union. Expectations were raised in the White Paper, in the Bill, and in the run-up to the Scottish election. We must remember that the enemies of the Union sit below the Gangway. The Scottish nationalists are the enemies of the Union. Whatever differences we may have about how the Union is structured, it is the Scottish nationalists who see devolution as a Trojan horse. They are destructive, negative and introspective, and in many quarters they are defined as much by their anti-Englishness as by their pro-Scottishness.

It is the duty of all Unionists to make the new architecture work as best we can, but the architecture is unstable, because it fails to give equal weight to all parts of the United Kingdom. This part of the Bill's passage is over, but the real challenge to those of us who believe in the Union is just beginning.

10.29 pm

Mr. McLeish: It is with a great deal of pleasure and pride that I rise to say a few words at the end of the Third Reading debate.

What is depressing is that, on 1 May, the Conservatives were unsure of where they were, and tonight they are still unsure. For some people, that may seem a charitable interpretation, but that has been the style that I have adopted throughout the Committee and Report stages. The hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) sums it up—the style often subdues the substance—but, in some cases, it is grudging acceptance.

The Conservative view is, "Who really needs this Parliament?" There has been carping and criticism. In some respects, a group of people have been unsure about where they stand, not only on this Bill, but on many others. On 1 May, there was an overwhelming endorsement of the proposals that were put forward by a potential Labour Government. On 11 September, with the support of all parties except the Conservative party, the Scots voted overwhelmingly for, and gave a ringing endorsement to, the two questions. With the icing on the cake of an additional member system, which can deliver the Conservatives some MSPs, I should have thought that they might at least have accepted and acknowledged those things, but, sadly, we had none of it.

The right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) may snigger, but, in most countries, serious constitutional change has the support of every party in that country. [Interruption.] Someone says, "Why should we be the same?"

Mr. Paterson: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McLeish: No, I am not giving way.

The simple issue is that the Conservatives have to wake up to the fact that Britain is changing comprehensively and irreversibly. It is not a matter just of Scotland. On Friday in Northern Ireland, an historic decision will be made. Decisions on Wales have been made by the House. London is moving forward, which is again a positive result. The European convention on human rights is to be absorbed into British law. The freedom of information Act is coming. The House of Lords is going to be reformed. But where are the official Opposition? They are simply nowhere, time-warped in the past and unable to face or embrace the future. That is sad not only for the House, but for the House of Holyrood in Scotland.

I am a moderate man—

Mr. Paterson rose—

Mr. McLeish: But I am not giving way. When Scots experience the continuous and intense sniggering, it does nothing for the Conservative party or for the House, and it reinforces my central proposition that the Conservatives were nowhere on 1 May, and they are still nowhere.

The plight of the Conservative Opposition should not detract from the achievements of the Labour Government. We have delivered on every occasion: on 1 May, on 24 July with the White Paper, on 11 September with the referendum, on 19 December with the Scotland Bill, on 9 January with the site at Holyrood, and on 12 January with Second Reading; and, of course, this evening we complete Third Reading. We at least can take some pride and satisfaction in that achievement.

We have had contributions from other parties as well. Let me give a warning to the nationalists as the Bill embarks from the House to another place and as we embark on our work in Scotland. The nation of Scotland wants the Parliament to work for the people of Scotland. The test for the nationalists is simply this: do they want the Parliament to work for the Scottish National party? They have to make a big decision. We hope that they make the right decision and promote a people's Parliament, instead of a narrow self-interested policy of using the Parliament merely to cause a constitutional circus week in, week out, ensuring that we do not tackle the real issues that the Scottish Parliament faces.

We hear views about elections, but the interesting thing about Scottish politics is that Labour wins when we have an election, and some parties do well between elections. [Interruption.] Let me remind the Liberal Democrats, who are carping from sedentary positions, that, just over a year ago, Labour held 56 of the 72 Scottish seats. The Liberal Democrats held six. They attack the Tories for having nil, but six is not a large way from that.

I look forward—I relish the prospect—to the contest that lies ahead. Ultimately—although issues can be debated in this place, in another place or in consultative steering groups—the people of Scotland will make the biggest decision, on who is elected to the Parliament to serve as the 129 Members of the Scottish Parliament. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, there will be a Scottish Parliament, and he will embrace it. After today's Third Reading, I, too, can say that there will be a Parliament. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

NORTHERN IRELAND

That the draft New Northern Ireland Assembly (Elections) Order 1998, which was laid before this House on 11th May, be approved.—[Mr. Clelland.]

Question agreed to.

TEACHING AND HIGHER EDUCATION BILL [LORDS] (PROGRAMME)

Ordered,

That the following provisions shall apply to the remaining proceedings on the Teaching and Higher Education Bill [Lords]—

Report and Third Reading

1.(1) Proceedings on consideration and Third Reading shall be completed in two allotted days and shall, if not previously concluded, be brought to a conclusion three hours after the commencement of proceedings on the Bill on the second of those days.

(2) On the first such allotted day, paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 15 (Exempted business) shall apply to proceedings on the Bill for any part of the period of six hours after the commencement of proceedings on the Bill which falls after Ten o'clock.

Business Committee

2. Standing Order No. 82 (Business Committee) shall apply to proceedings on the Bill.

3. No Motion shall be made to alter the order in which proceedings on consideration of the Bill are taken, but the resolutions of the Business Committee may include alterations in that order.

Conclusion of proceedings

4. For the purpose of concluding any proceedings which are to be brought to a conclusion at a time appointed by or under this Order—

(1) The Speaker shall put forthwith the following Questions (but no others)—

(a) any Question already proposed from the Chair;

(b) any Question necessary to bring to a decision a Question so proposed;

(c) the Question on any amendment moved or Motion made by a Minister of the Crown;

(d) any other Question necessary for the disposal of the business to be concluded.

(2) Proceedings under sub-paragraph (1) shall not be interrupted under any Standing Order relating to sittings of the House and may be decided, though opposed, at any hour.

(3) If two or more Questions would fall to be put under sub-paragraph (1)(c) on amendments moved or Motions made by a Minister of the Crown, the Speaker shall instead put a single Question in relation to those amendments or Motions.

(4) On a Motion for a new Clause or a new Schedule, the Speaker shall put only the question that the Clause or Schedule be added to the Bill.

(5) If on an allotted day a Motion for the adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 24 (Adjournment on specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration) stands over from an earlier day or to Seven o'clock—

(a) the bringing to a conclusion of any proceedings on the Bill which under this Order are to be brought to a conclusion after that time shall be postponed for a period equal to the duration of the proceedings on the Motion, and

(b) paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 15 (Exempted business) shall apply to proceedings on the Bill for the period after Ten o'clock for which sub-paragraph (a) permits them to continue.

Supplemental orders

5. If a Motion is made by a Minister of the Crown to amend this Order and if an effect of the Motion would be to provide a greater amount of time for proceedings on the Bill, the Question on the Motion shall be put forthwith and may be decided, though opposed, at any hour.

6. If a Motion is made by a Minister of the Crown to supplement the provisions of this Order in respect of further proceedings on the Bill, the Motion may be proceeded with, though opposed, at any hour and the proceedings, if not previously concluded, shall be brought to a conclusion three-quarters of an hour after they have been commenced.

Interpretation

7. In this Order 'allotted day' means any day on which the Bill is put down on the main business as first Government Order of the Day.—[Mr. Clelland.]

Manufacturing Trade

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Clelland.]

10.35 pm

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): The United Kingdom's balance of payments in manufactured trade has long been a worrying issue. However, I did not quite realise the extent of the problem until I began to assemble material for this debate. We are in the throes of a very rapid deterioration in the balance of our manufactured trade. The deterioration of the situation will be prolonged. Once started, such processes are very difficult and take years to turn round. Moreover, we are at the end of a period in which we have had problems generally with our balance of payments.

The United Kingdom maintained a surplus in manufactured trade from Roman times until the 1980s. In every quarter until 1983, we had a manufactured trade surplus. Subsequently, our manufactured trade balance went into deficit—which hit its lowest point in 1989, and has been maintained in every quarter since. The deficit is now becoming a gaping one.

We have paid for the deficit by our surplus in invisibles, which has been maintained in trade with the world outside of the European Economic Community. Our current account deficit with Europe is £6.8 billion, whereas, last year, our current account surplus with other countries was £10.5 billion. We have an overall surplus of about £4.5 billion. However, that surplus is now slipping. The protection and cover provided by that surplus in invisibles is declining, becoming a deficit.

Our manufactured trade deficit represents a long-term failure, which is clearly due to the destruction of so much of our manufacturing base under the Conservatives. They lost more jobs in manufacturing, did more to shrink our manufacturing base and closed more manufacturing than the Government of any other advanced industrial country. The loss has been a debilitating one, forcing us to face our current difficulties with a manufacturing base that is weaker than it should be.

Our manufacturing base provides the basis of our export effort, and our trade deficit—specifically our manufactured trade deficit—is debilitating our economy. The fact is that 60 per cent. of our exports are manufactured.

Our poor record in exporting manufactures has led to several consequences. The first is that our overall export growth has been depressed because of our poor record in exporting manufactures.

Secondly, our manufactured trade deficit has depressed the rest of our economy. It has effectively created a low economic ceiling, depressing and preventing our domestic economy from expanding as we need it to. We cannot grow, because we cannot pay for growth.

A third consequence of the slow growth in our manufacturing, which has been caused by our manufacturing industry's comparative failure and our trade deficit, is low productivity growth. Productivity growth is achieved more easily in manufacturing than in services. Productivity growth is largely a feature of increased production—if production goes up, productivity goes up. Our production has not been increasing at the same rate as everyone else's, which is one reason why UK productivity is low. The deficit is also the reason why growth has been low. This country's growth record is the worst in the advanced industrial world. We have had cumulative growth of just under 2 per cent. a year, which is half the world average.

Why has there been such a deficit in manufacturing trade? It is not unique British incompetence—although our manufacturing has a smaller scale of production and has invested less than its competitors. The deficit is certainly not due to industrial relations and the so-called power of the trade unions. That power and those industrial relations are, in the main, a result of failure to grow rather than a cause of it, because the fight to share out the cake is greater and more intense if the cake is not expanding.

There are three basic reasons why we have a manufacturing trade deficit. First, historically, our interest rates have been higher than those elsewhere in the world. Those interest rates are accompanied by a capital system that demands a quick and very high rate of return. Secondly, tight monetary policies have kept down demand. The third and most important reason is the high value of the pound. It is as simple as that. There has been prolonged overvaluation of the exchange rate since the late 1970s, through the 1980s and into the 1990s. It was at its highest in the early 1980s and early 1990s.

Overvaluation hits manufacturing particularly hard because manufacturing is in the front line of international trade. It is a hugely competitive area. New competitors are coming along all the time all over the world; competition is intensifying.

Mr. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North): Does my hon. Friend agree that the most successful countries in the post-war era were Germany and Japan, which ensured that their currencies were kept low relative to those of other countries? Their success was based largely, if not primarily, on a low exchange rate.

Mr. Mitchell: I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins). Such countries began with a low exchange rate, which made it possible to invest in manufacturing and made exports profitable. They have maintained such exchange rates, failing to let them rise as much as they needed to when they were in surplus.

The world is becoming more competitive still. There are huge new competitors—specifically China. Prices of plastic goods, toys, basic stationery and all kinds of manufacturing equipment and produce are plummeting as China enters the market. Our industry is being asked to run a competitive race with the new tigers, especially China with its very low costs, with a ball and chain on each leg. The ball on one leg is marked "overvaluation" and the one on the other is marked "high interest rates". Together, they are crippling manufacturing.

The situation that emerged in the 1980s is getting worse. The balance of trade in goods and manufactures is turning sour. In the three months to the end of February 1997, we had a manufacturing trade deficit of £2.7 billion. In the three months to the end of February 1998, the deficit had risen to £4.6 billion, and it has accelerated since.

The Confederation of British Industry quarterly trends survey in April stated that manufacturing optimism about export prospects had seen the largest fall since July 1980; business confidence had seen the sharpest fall since October 1992; export orders had declined at the sharpest rate since January 1989; and firms with fewer than 200 staff that make intermediate goods had been harder hit than other sections. We are seeing a fall in export orders.

The CBI figures are paralleled by other figures from the Engineering Employers Federation, British Steel, Toyota, which is reporting a loss for the first time in three years, chemicals firms in Grimsby and food production firms. They all face international competition and are all shackled by overvaluation. Today's figures in the Marks and Spencer report show that the company is suffering in France owing to the high value of the pound. In a range of company reports, export prospects are dimming, exports are falling, and a wind-down in export sales is being predicted.

That is grim news for jobs in my part of the country and others that depend on manufacturing. It might not be so grim for the financial sector in London, but companies there will also be hit by the problem eventually. It is grim for investment and for growth. Manufacturing accounts for only 20 per cent. of employment, but it employs a lot of services because of the trend to contracting out. It is not accurate to look at the manufacturing figures in isolation.

The pace of those developments is growing because the pound is still grossly overvalued. It is overvalued because our interest rates are too high and speculative flows are coming out of Europe to buy sterling because it is a safe haven that gives a high return. It is overvalued because the deutschmark—some people might find this extraordinary—has been managed down and the French franc has depreciated with it. Sterling is also overvalued because many far eastern countries have undergone substantial devaluations.

The decline in our manufacturing trade and the growth in our deficit will not end until the pound comes down, and it will not end immediately even then. Because of the J-curve effect, the situation will turn round only slowly. It is no use clutching at the slight fall of a few pfennigs since the summit agreeing monetary union as a hope for the future. More rubbish is talked on that subject than on any other. A headline in the Financial Times of 13 May said, "Fall in sterling has yet to lift exports". That is the most incredibly stupid headline. The fall in sterling happened during the six weeks before that headline appeared. Does the Financial Times expect that exports will suddenly turn round because a few pfennigs have come off the value of the pound? Even that fall was only about 20 pfennigs from DM 3.10 to the pound at the end of March. It is incredible that people can clutch at that as a straw of comfort in a disastrous, deteriorating situation.

Mr. Hopkins rose—

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend wants to become a chorus.

Mr. Hopkins: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way again. He is pointing out that the journalists know nothing about the J-curve and time lags in such matters. Relatively small changes in exchange rates make almost no difference. Would he like to comment on the TUC's suggestion this week that an exchange rate target of DM 2.50 might be reasonable? I think that that is still too high, but at least it is a start.

Mr. Mitchell: The scale of depreciation needs to be more substantial. Once damage has been done, it is difficult to reverse. To aim at a target, we have to be able to manage sterling by controlling interest rates. I do not want to go too far into that matter.

This is a non-partisan issue. It is not career-enhancing for me to be making this speech. I have seen Back Benchers rallying round at Treasury questions and Trade and Industry questions in the past few weeks, asking supportive questions. Members from steel areas have said that even though the pound is a bit overvalued, we are still competitive and we are fighting on. Others have said that the situation reduces the price of raw materials, as though the value added in this country were unimportant. Others clutch at the straw that the pound is falling, or that exports are holding up. That makes no political sense. It is Back Benchers' responsibility to tell Ministers when things are going wrong. Things are going wrong in our areas.

Mr. Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye): Does my hon. Friend agree that companies that find niche markets in which they have particular expertise are doing well in the export market? Several companies in my constituency have been bucking the trend. That may not be an overwhelming success, but it is an achievement in the market that he has described.

Mr. Mitchell: There are always exceptions in any situation. We have to consider the overall figures, because they determine the prospects, the level of investment and the number of closures and jobs. A couple of swallows do not make a summer, just as a few pfennigs fall in the value of the pound does not make a devaluation. It is no use concentrating on those; we have to concentrate on the overall picture, and on bringing that home to Ministers so that we can have action. We should not try to coat the picture with honey for party political purposes.

The Conservatives will always say that the pound is in a disastrous situation. They put industry into this mess by the debilitating way in which they treated it for 20 years; no wonder it has been hit. It is hypocritical of them to make the present position a party political issue. None the less, it is the responsibility of those of us who represent manufacturing areas to say what the problem is—and, in my view, to say that there is no way out unless the pound falls.

If the pound does not fall, it simply will not be profitable to produce in this country with such overvaluation. If the overvaluation is sustained, production will go elsewhere. We have already seen the threat from Nissan, and the problems that Vauxhall has had in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North.

Overvaluation is a threat to inward investment. Why should firms invest in this country if it is not profitable to produce here? There is the right to roam. The new German and Japanese owners of British industry cannot be bought off, fobbed off and conciliated by the prospect of knighthoods or seats on the board of the CBI, as British management was. Those people have a more realistic view of things. They want to produce profitably, and if they cannot, it is "Sayonara—goodbye, that's it." They are warning us, and rightly, too.

Ministers say that industry must be efficient, reform itself and make itself more competitive, but industry cannot become 25 per cent. more efficient or produce a productivity surge of 25 per cent. to cancel out the overvaluation—and if it cannot do that it cannot survive in the increasingly competitive markets that we now face.

British industry is not the most productive or the most competitive, and the additional burden of overvaluation is an impossible hurdle for it to jump. The problems of British industry can be put right only by growth, which means expansion, improvement in productivity and investment. All those come from an exporting prospect, which in turn comes from competitiveness.

Without that prospect, people will not invest—and the situation that we now face is the very reverse of it. A balance of payments deficit that lies basically in manufactured trade is usually an excuse for deflation. We reduce the demand for imports with which we cannot compete, by deflating demand in this country. That is usually an excuse for higher interest rates. Indeed, interest rates have to rise if we are to finance the deficit that we are incurring.

I have seen that happen twice in the 1980s, and I do not want it to happen to my Government, blurring and destroying the bright prospects that we need to fulfil in terms of expanding the economy, generating growth, creating jobs and improving the lot of our people. I do not want us to be deterred from that process, on which we must embark by fighting and reversing the balance of payments deficit. We cannot do that by clutching at straws. We have to act.

I do not suppose that, in his reply, the Minister will suddenly decide to tell me how right I am. Adjournment debates are usually an opportunity for a defensive reply. I suppose that the Department, and the Government as a whole, cannot submit to the arguments of one Back Bencher. However, I hope that, beyond the defensive reply that we shall hear tonight, the Government are seriously considering what can be done.

The present situation cannot be prolonged, because it is ruinous for jobs. Unemployment is beginning to rise—as it will, because manufacturing will shed jobs. Overvaluation is also ruinous for growth and for all the things that Labour wants to achieve—indeed, it will undermine all that we need to achieve. Unless we turn the situation round, we shall fail.

It is no use hoping that economic and monetary union will stabilise Europe and rescue us. There is a nightmare prospect that no one seems to be considering—that the euro will not be the hard currency that everybody expects. All the expectations held out hitherto—such as the idea that the convergence criteria would be fulfilled—have been belied in the event. If expectations are now held out that a hard euro will save us by making its users less competitive in comparison with us, thereby improving our position, they can easily be belied too. There is every prospect that the euro will be soft. The Germans have depreciated the deutschmark, which could be a last fling before the hard and rigorous disciplines of marriage, but it could also be the prelude to further depreciation to create a soft euro, as that would be the best way in which to make the single currency acceptable—it would cause employment to expand, and unemployment is the horrendous problem in Europe at the moment. A soft euro could make things worse for us.

Given that there are lags—export performance picks up only some time, perhaps two years, after a competitive reduction in the exchange rate—we must act now and act quickly to bring down the pound. There are many ways in which that can be done—I shall not go through them tonight—but the balance of payments deficit in manufacturing trade will be put right only if the exchange rate is more competitive. We must now bend our efforts to find how we can secure a more competitive exchange rate—otherwise we shall be stuck in recession and a balance of payments trap.

The Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs (Mr. Nigel Griffiths): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) on raising the important matter of manufacturing. We all share the sentiments that he has articulated tonight. I assure him and the House that the Government will give no defensive reply; we intend to take his pertinent points and long-standing criticisms—which extend over at least 18 years—very much to heart and to address them directly.

I welcome my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins), who speaks eloquently for his constituents—he made some telling points, to which we have listened. In putting his constituents' case so well, he is proving that Luton, North is being listened to in a way in which it has never been before.

I say the same to my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Foster)—never has Hastings and Rye been better represented in the House. He speaks for business and manufacturing in his constituency with a concise articulateness that means that Ministers have to listen—as, indeed, we are.

That contrasts with the sorry state of the Conservative party. This is the first Adjournment debate that I have attended in 11 years as a Member of Parliament at which no Conservative Member has been present. Where is the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), the shadow Secretary of State for Trade and Industry? Does he really care about manufacturing? Is he listening to the real concerns that are being voiced by employees, families, businesses and manufacturers throughout the country? The answer, sadly, is no. Conservative Members have been absent throughout the debate, as have the nationalists. I welcome as the representative of the Liberal Democrats the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett), who managed to catch the tail-end of the contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby—we are pleased that he is listening.

We have heard tonight the real concerns about the deficit in manufacturing trade. I assure the House that the Government recognise the important part that manufacturing industry plays in our economy. It has both a direct and an indirect impact on local jobs and local prosperity. It employs 4 million people directly and its output amounts to a fifth of our gross domestic product.

The manufacturing sector provides a vital contribution to our trade. Manufacturing production is about 10 times as likely to be traded across international boundaries as services are. That means that firms in the manufacturing sector are much more likely to feel the full brunt of international competition. It can, however, serve to strengthen those firms and improve productivity, as I think we would all acknowledge, which is why the Labour Government are doing their best to ensure that manufacturers, as well as non-manufacturers, are given the opportunity to thrive. The latest figures show that, in the three months to February, manufactured exports were 1.5 per cent. higher than in the previous three months, but the legacy of the previous Government remains: the deficit still exists.

The Government inherited an economy with many fundamental weaknesses. Over the past 30 years, manufacturing output and exports grew at a slower rate in the United Kingdom than in any other G7 country. Under the previous Government, instability did incalculable damage to manufacturing. Trade in manufactured exports has been in deficit each year since 1983: the first time in our history that manufacturing has been in deficit in peacetime.

We have created a stable macro-economic framework in which British companies will be able to plan and invest for the future. Industry has long been asking for a stable environment with sustained growth, low inflation and sound public finances. Even my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby will acknowledge that the Government are delivering that.

A stable framework is also the key to achieving a stable and competitive pound over the medium term. Of course, we fully recognise the worries of manufacturers about the current level of the exchange rate—no more so than in Luton, North, Hastings and Rye and Great Grimsby—but we must avoid the short-term view that led to the damaging cycle of boom and bust. There are no quick and simple fixes to the short-term pressures facing manufacturing industry. A more stable exchange rate, which will suit more of our traders, will be achieved only through a stable framework. It is also worth noting that two thirds of sterling's recent appreciation occurred under the previous Government.

As has rightly been pointed out, macro-economic stability is not enough. If we are to reverse the current trade deficit in manufacturing, our firms will need to become more competitive. There is evidence to suggest that the UK became less competitive in the 1980s. The trade deficit in manufacturing grew rapidly from 1983 to 1989, and import penetration in the UK was higher than the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development average throughout 1979–96; over that period, UK import penetration followed an upward trend relative to the OECD.

The loss of competitiveness under the previous Government needs to be recovered and further improved on. That is why the Government are working in partnership with business to help British companies to become as competitive as possible, generating the wealth that the nation needs, as well as good jobs and opportunities for all our people.

Many vital areas must be addressed if we are to improve the competitiveness of British firms. The performance of all our firms—not only our weakest performers, and not only manufacturing firms—has to be improved. I fully acknowledge that the manufacturing sector makes an important contribution to UK trade, but we must not ignore the other components of the balance of payments.

UK trade in services has been in surplus every year since 1965—in Harold Wilson's Government—and in the three months to February the surplus was £1.8 billion; but export and trade promotion are as vital now as ever. Today, both the Prime Minister and the President of the Board of Trade are in Geneva celebrating the 50th anniversary of one of the greatest achievements of the post-war era: the creation of the general agreement on tariffs and trade. Our commitment to the multilateral trading system and free trade remains as strong as ever. We recognise the vital role that trade has to play in the creation of jobs, prosperity and growth, and we seek to promote trade wherever we can.

Improving British manufacturing firms' ability to exploit export markets is an important part of increasing our competitiveness. Here, the Government as a whole, and, in particular, the Department of Trade and Industry, have a crucial role to play. The DTI is assisting manufacturing companies in their marketing operations abroad in a number of ways. The export forum set up to review current activity has now issued its report; it makes several recommendations as to how support could be delivered more effectively.

One important recommendation is that we should select a smaller number of markets, based around two categories: those that are accessible, reasonably straightforward to enter and suitable for the new or less experienced exporter; and those that are growing fast.

High and sustainable employment requires a stable economic environment, to which the Government are committed, and not the boom-and-bust instability of the past. The whole House will welcome the fact that the latest figures show a rise in manufacturing employment of 6,000 in February, and of 22,000 on a year earlier.

There is clearly much to be done. I am grateful to all my hon. Friends who have contributed to this important debate, and no more so than to my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby.

Adjournment (Whitsun)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kevin Hughes.]

9.34 am

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire): A serious incident, which could have been disastrous, occurred in north-east Derbyshire last Thursday. It happened at about 5.30 pm in Killamarsh in my constituency on the Leigh Environmentals site which, since autumn 1997, has been owned by Sarp UK Ltd., which has a French parent company. A tanker leaked sulphuric and nitric acid, which led to the formation in the area of an orange cloud whose vapour threatened the Killamarsh community and, later, other communities as it moved around.

Vapour from sulphuric acid can quickly damage lungs, burn and eat away flesh and strip paint from cars. Sulphuric acid in water kills fish, and plants survive the vapour little better. Laboratory technicians know that sulphuric acid burns holes in their coats. Nitric acid is similar, but it vaporises more easily and was perhaps the basis of the cloud in the area.

The incident was so serious that emergency planners considered evacuating thousands of people from the Killamarsh area. However, they decided not to do that as they feared that they would move people into the path of the shifting cloud. The situation could have been worse if the fire brigade had not already been on the site dealing with a minor leak to which the management had alerted it. When the fire brigade arrived, the leak became much more serious and the vapour cloud developed. It could also have been worse if children had been at a nearby primary school and had had to be locked away in the school while their parents worried about what was happening.

The site is next to the Rother Valley country park. Fortunately, few people were there at the time of the incident—although its many fish, birds and other wildlife were in danger from the cloud. The vapour cloud moved into the Rother Valley constituency, then moved towards Halfway, which is part of the Sheffield, Attercliffe constituency, before changing direction in the wind and moving towards the Bassetlaw constituency and dispersing. Therefore, it moved through at least four parliamentary constituencies located in three counties—Derbyshire, South Yorkshire and Nottinghamshire—where different authorities are responsible for public protection.

Inquiries and investigations are being conducted by the Environment Agency, the Health and Safety Executive, environmental health officers and the county council. The four Members of Parliament from the constituencies that I have mentioned, including me, have asked the Minister for the Environment to co-ordinate action and to conduct his own investigation. I reinforce that call now. I also wish to raise some matters that must be pursued in the ministerial investigation.

At first glance, the emergency action at the plant seems to have gone according to the book. However, off-site emergency arrangements were ad hoc because there was virtually no plan on which to act. Some people did some excellent work in trying circumstances, but existing planning provisions must be examined closely.

The police blocked off some, but not all, of the roads into Killamarsh. Many of the drivers of the cars that were turned away had families in Killamarsh whom they wanted to reach. Buses were stopped, and passengers left them and walked into Killamarsh. Helicopters were sent to the area to tell the people of Killamarsh to get indoors, to close their windows and generally to close themselves in. Unfortunately, people had to go out of their homes to hear the messages. I have come across only one constituent who heard what was being said.

Other firms are situated next to Leigh Environmentals, and they seem also to have been in the dark. They did not know what was happening or what they were supposed to do.

Unfortunately, the Control of Industrial Major Accident Hazard Regulations 1984 do not apply to the plant. The regulations call for an off-site emergency plan—for example, having a siren system, providing instructions to householders about what they should do in the event of an emergency, and ensuring that emergency exercises take place so that the population in the area is used to what is done. That provision operates, for instance, in my constituency at Staveley Chemicals. People in the area have cards in their homes that explain what provisions are made when an emergency arises. Nothing like that was available when the incident took place at Killamarsh.

There are the questions whether the CIMAH regulations should apply to Killamarsh and whether they should be extended. Even if they are not to apply legally, should they not voluntarily be acted on quickly? Should there be alternative regulations operating in respect of the chemical reclamation plant that is known locally as Leigh Environmentals?

The 1982 European Union's Seveso directive is not yet fully in place. It sets up the EU regulations on the control of major accidents and hazards. A consultative exercise is taking place under the Health and Safety Executive, but it will not report until September. At the very least, the situation at Killamarsh needs to be taken on board by the HSE. Every encouragement needs to be given to ensure that the HSE's report is produced quickly, that it is a serious report and that it is acted on.

The incident arose from a leaking tanker, not from a failure of any of the on-site processes. There have been failures at the Leigh Environmentals plant. Following one such failure, I initiated an Adjournment debate way back on 20 February 1990. The current incident at Killamarsh was the result of a leak from a tanker, which could have occurred anywhere between British Aerospace in the west midlands, where the material was collected, and Killamarsh.

[Mr. Harry Barnes]

The tanker was one of Sarp's fleet of tankers. That fleet needs to be checked out thoroughly. Following this incident, the implications of all tankers carrying dangerous materials should be investigated closely.

Residents in the area continue to complain of nauseating smells, especially from the main drains and sewers in Killamarsh. They blame Leigh Environmentals for those smells. There is confusion over who is to be held responsible when complaints are made. The environmental agencies, environmental health officers, the district council and Yorkshire Water are contacted. People often find themselves moved from one authority to the other without any clear action being taken. Greater co-ordination is needed, as is greater clarity on who is responsible for what, so that when problems arise and are fed into one agency and it is decided that another agency should act, the relevant information is passed on quickly to the other agency and every effort is made by the body that received the information to assist the process.

The Environment Agency grants consents for the disposing of liquids from Leigh Environmentals to the sewers. When those liquids are discharged they may be subject to bacteriological change, which may cause the hydrosulphide smells. That, or something similar, may occur, given the mixture of elements in the sewers. That should be faced when the Environment Agency grants consents in the area. It needs to be taken on board by the Minister for the Environment.

I shall summarise what I see as the immediate requirements. First, we need a proper investigation through the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions that is openly reported. Secondly, we want a full off-site plan to be operated in the area. Thirdly, we want regulations requiring stringent community safety, which will be part of that plan. Fourthly, we want a checking of tankers, especially the Sarp fleet. Fifthly, we want clear environmental controls to tackle dangerous discomforts in the communities involved.

Unless there is a dramatic improvement, this will not be the last occasion when I shall endeavour to raise the matter in the House. However, this is my first opportunity to do so. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House will ensure that the information that I have put before the House is passed to the Minister for the Environment and that there are responses to the points that I have raised.

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West): Before the House adjourns for the Whitsun recess, I wish to raise four brief matters. Probably the Leader of the House is thinking, "My goodness, here he goes again. It was all raised during the Easter Adjournment debate."

First, there is the relationship between the Government and the House of Commons. Again, probably, the Leader of the House will be suggesting that I attend the debates of the Modernisation Committee. I thoroughly disapprove of what is going on here. This place is slowly but surely being destroyed. I think that the Labour party was primarily to blame for the appalling turnout in the local elections. We have only to think of Salford, where only 11 per cent. of the people voted. In many areas, the turnout was 20 per cent.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley): It is interesting that the hon. Gentleman is blaming the Labour party for a turnout of 11 per cent. at Salford. Would I be correct in thinking that, of the 11 per cent., probably only 1 per cent. was voting Conservative, if the Conservative party was lucky? The apathy lies with the Conservative party in Salford.

Mr. Amess: I have no detailed knowledge of the politics in Salford. Whatever the 11 per cent. who voted were, surely it is something which all Members should be depressed about. It is clear that 89 per cent. of the electorate did not think that it was worth voting. That is all about the way in which this place is being run.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the turnout at local elections has some relationship to the amount of literature that may be put through constituents' doors to remind them that the elections are taking place and to encourage them to vote? Is the hon. Gentleman aware that, in most of the wards that were up for election in my constituency, the Conservative party did not put a leaflet through anyone's door? I wonder whether that contributed to the low turnout.

Mr. Amess: Obviously, I regret that. I have no knowledge of the hon. Gentleman's constituency. However, the style of government since 1 May has meant that fewer and fewer people are interested in politics.

Mr. Hoyle: As the hon. Gentleman has so much knowledge, could he tell us how many people turned out to vote in Basildon?

Mr. Amess: The hon. Gentleman may be a little out of touch—I no longer represent the Basildon constituency. I am the Member of Parliament for Southend, West. My former seat is now represented by two hon. Members, one Conservative and one Labour.

The House will be delighted to know that I worked in six areas in the local elections. On election night, I worked in the constituency of Basildon, in the ward where the Labour Member of Parliament lives. I am delighted to say that we won the seat from the Labour party, so it was a Conservative gain. We also gained five seats in Basildon.

In the Easter Adjournment debate, I complained to the Leader of the House that the Prime Minister's attendance in this place was appalling. He might have listened to one or two people because he has made two or three statements since then, but his voting record is only 5 per cent. The voting record of his two predecessors, who were older than he is, was 30 per cent. The right hon. Lady will no doubt mention Ireland when she eventually sums up the debate, but the Prime Minister's two predecessors had just as important matters to deal with. For whatever reason, the leader of the Labour party simply does not think that this place is as important as talking to newspapers and appearing on television.

My main point is that, while some Ministers are excellent in dealing with constituency correspondence—their replies are courteous and they do everything possible to help—others take more than three months to reply, which is simply not on. Moreover, when letters are continually signed "pp", it is deeply insulting to hon. Members, and constituents will draw their own conclusions. I have tried to be non-partisan by praising those Ministers who deserve praise, but I hope that the Leader of the House will have a quiet word with one or two Government Departments—I am not prepared to name them now.

My second point concerns British Rail. I doubt whether hon. Members here today recall my "Public Journey" shown on television, which I undertook with one or two Essex Members of Parliament and a former British Rail chairman. It was a most unsatisfactory public journey—we used to call the Fenchurch Street line the "misery line". The chairman did not remain in place for long after that. I hope that a number of hon. Members saw the Evening Standard article last night, in which many of my constituents and others in Essex were interviewed. They have been very pleased since our line was privatised. Before that, the general manager on the line was second in unpopularity to Saddam Hussein. They now think that he is doing a splendid job. The punctuality of trains has risen to 95 or 96 per cent., and the service has improved immeasurably.

Would the Leader of the House be prepared to comment on the privatisation of the London-Tilbury-Southend line as it affects the area that I represent? Is she prepared to say that privatisation has been a success?

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): Does the hon. Gentleman recognise that that satisfaction is far from universal? In my area, which is served by Great Western, satisfaction levels have declined to such an extent that the company has written to us apologising for the fall in standards. I missed a meeting chaired by the Leader of the House last night because my train was an hour and a half late. If the hon. Gentleman has a good experience to report to the House, it is unique.

Mr. Amess: I note the hon. Gentleman's comments. I am quite satisfied to represent one constituency at the moment, although, for 14 years, I represented another. I am not prepared to get involved in the local matters of other hon. Members. I simply make the point that, throughout my time in this place, I have campaigned for the privatisation of British Rail and, in Essex—an important part of the country—people are delighted with the privatisation of British Rail. I just wondered whether the Leader of the House has plans to renationalise British Rail.

My third point concerns Southend borough council and Essex county council. I must be very careful with my language, because I am only too well aware of what has been going on in the House since 1 April. The Prime Minister is being fed completely inaccurate briefing. It is absolutely disgusting that the Labour party in the House thinks that it can blame everything that is unsatisfactory in Essex on the Conservative administration since 1 April, while the Labour Government, who have now been in office for more than a year, are not prepared to accept responsibility for anything that goes wrong. We hear endlessly about the Conservative Government—

Mr. Hoyle: The hon. Gentleman says that the trains now run well in Essex, and the Labour party should take the blame. Should not the Labour party therefore take the credit for the punctuality of the trains?

Mr. Amess: I should be delighted if the Leader of the House would come to the Dispatch Box and say that privatisation has been a great success and that Her Majesty's Government will take the credit for that. Unfortunately, the record in Hansard will prove that the Labour party fought the privatisation of British Rail from the very outset.

As I was saying on the subject of Southend borough council, a little while ago we had a by-election in Southend. We won the Chalkwell seat from the Liberal Democrats, so Southend borough council now has 19 Conservative, 13 Liberal Democrat and seven Labour members. Thus, with their majority of one, the Liberal Democrat and Labour parties together vote everything down. Interestingly, since Southend became a unitary council, the Liberal Democrat and Labour parties have voted for an increase in social service charges, which will come into effect on 1 June. The cost of meals on wheels will rise by a third, and home care charges, about which we heard endlessly before the Labour party assumed government, will rise by 70 per cent. Home care charges are being increased from £6.20 to £10.50 a week, and meals on wheels charges are being increased to £1.80 for a main meal. The Conservatives voted against all those rises.

None the less, the Labour Member of the European Parliament has been running round Essex petitioning people to sign up because of changes that the Conservatives in Essex county council have imposed since 1 April. Not a word has been said by the Liberal Democrats locally or nationally about the disgusting increases in social service charges in Southend, but plenty has been said about Essex county council, and plenty has been said from the Dispatch Box in the House. It is disgraceful.

On education, the main platform in Essex and Southend, the Labour party has broken its promises. Class sizes in my constituency are going up all the time. Some 1.3 million primary school pupils are in classes of 31 or more, which is the highest figure for 20 years. That has happened not as a result of 18 years of Conservative government, but because of Labour and, to an extent, Liberal Democrat party policies.

Westborough school, in my constituency, is the largest primary school in Essex, with more than 800 children, and the headmistress does not even have a room from which to work. All the schools in my area are full. Many parents come to my surgery to complain. Parental choice cannot apply to them because the nearest secondary schools with vacancies are about four miles away.

In terms of local government, will the Leader of the House say what the Labour party will do to rectify the problem in my constituency, given that the local authority, which has become a unitary authority, is controlled by the Labour and Liberal Democrat parties?

Incredibly, the Government allowed for increases of only 0.5 per cent. across all services, although inflation went up to a six-year high yesterday. The Prime Minister has the cheek to come to the Dispatch Box and pretend that the Conservatives are to blame for changes since 1 April. Every week, different figures are used by Labour Members in the House, so I am delighted to put the record straight. We should compare the Conservatives' spending proposals since 1 April with those of the Labour and Liberal Democrat parties, which cut education spending in real terms by £12 million last year. The Conservatives in Essex are spending £12 million more on social services than the Government set out in the standard spending assessment, and they have to deal with the dreadful mess left by the previous administration under which a huge amount was raided from our reserves.

My final point relates to young people. On Monday, I had the privilege of participating in an all-party forum that was organised by Essex county council. Young people aged from seven to 17 put their points to parish councillors, councillors and Members of Parliament, which was worth while.

I am the vice-chairman of the all-party scout and guide group. Last week, the hon. Member for Colchester (Mr. Russell) and I visited Baden-Powell house. We met the international secretary of the scouting movement, who shared with us a comprehensive programme to cater for the needs of young people in today's society.

The programme has a global educational background and I should like to share with hon. Members a few of the movement's thoughts. It believes that young people, first, should develop themselves to test their abilities and to discover the world around them, in whatever forum; secondly, require access to knowledge and competence to understand the real world; thirdly, need an active and responsible role in social life; and, fourthly, will acquire status and a stake in society through such a role.

Although some people may smirk at that, I believe that the scouting and guide organisations do a magnificent job. A huge army of volunteers are offered an opportunity to learn beyond the traditional boundaries of formal education. The organisations base their strategy on four pillars: learning to know, learning to do, learning to live together, and learning to be. They offer an environment in which non-formal education can flourish and, in today's society, where there are more dangers than ever before, non-formal education is an essential part of the education process. The scouting organisation believes that schools teach more and more, but, in some respects, educate less and less; that families give more freedom, but not more autonomy; and that we teach the cost of everything, but the value of nothing.

Many local authorities throughout the country are trying to launch youth initiatives. I praise Leigh parish council, which is the only parish council in my constituency, and congratulate its first chairman, Councillor Mike King, his successor, Councillor David Johnson, and the current chairman, Councillor Mike Dolby, on their initiatives to promote and encourage young people.

I hope that every hon. Member will take careful note of the Whip this week, because, thanks to the hospitality of Madam Speaker, the scout and guide organisations will enjoy a tea party in her state apartments on 18 June. Perhaps newer hon. Members are not aware that every hon. Member is entitled to invite scouts, guides, beavers or rainbows from their local organisations to enjoy the hospitality of the Speaker. On that non-controversial note, I hope that hon. Members will agree with my sentiments and do everything they can to support our annual tea party.

10.4 am

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley): I am sure that hon. Members will wish Madam Speaker well on the 25th anniversary of her election to the House. It should be a glorious day for her, as the sun is shining.

I want to speak about something radical and different—the reorganisation of police forces. Crime knows no barriers, and there is a great opportunity to consider restructuring. Police officers do a tremendous job in impossible conditions: resources are badly stretched, police officers are thinly deployed—they are the thin blue line—and there appears to be an impossible conflict between targeting major crimes and providing essential community presence and service locally.

The solution to that conflict of interest lies in reorganisation of the structure of our police force. I should like my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary to consider reforming the police structure to make it similar to that used by many other nations, especially on the continent, where there is two-tier policing. We would benefit from regional policing and local policing by a district police force.

Regional development agencies are being discussed, so there is no better time to consider reorganisation of the police force structure. There could be a north-west police force instead of the existing five forces, five chief constables and several assistant chief constables, which is a costly way to administer the area. In addition, we could provide community policing at local level with the introduction of local forces. Instead of separate county forces, pooled resources in one region would achieve a greater police force, with more officers being employed in the fight against crime.

Police forces no longer reflect crime areas. Using the motorway network, criminals can be in different counties in minutes. The north-west is best placed with motorways and has a good network of roads. Logistics ensure that people can be here, there and everywhere in a short time, but also that crime moves throughout the region. The north-west is not unique, however. In the south-east, for example, the M25 gives mobility to criminals.

The police force structure should be reorganised to reflect the new regional nature of crime patterns. That should involve rationalisation of the county constabularies, which were established when car ownership was low and crime was locally based. We should consider a single chief constable for each region. What person would be better for such a post than the chief constable of Lancashire, who is doing a wonderful job? We must consider the great specialism within the force and achieve even greater professionalism.

Chorley is between Greater Manchester and Merseyside. A gang from a neighbouring force area could commit a series of burglaries in Chorley and be back home in half an hour—and back in an area covered by a different police force, which makes it difficult to track such criminals. The region has shrunk with the advent of mass car ownership, so I want a force that is more co-ordinated and can share operations and intelligence much more closely.

We should consider air support. The Cheshire force has an aeroplane, and the Merseyside, Lancashire and Greater Manchester forces have helicopters, but I believe that the Cumbria force has neither. What could be better than them combining and developing their resources in a north-west region? Instead of competing with each other, they could position that air supremacy to be better deployed to deal with crime.

Sharing expensive resources would allow costs to be redirected into other operations. Police horses, which are an important part of policing, put a presence on the streets, but each force has its own horses. Instead of each force in each region having separate mounted divisions that are not used daily, would it not be better strategically to position mounted sections and move them to wherever they are required? I shall forward those ideas not only to the Home Office, but to the Association of Chief Police Officers, the Police Superintendents Association of England and Wales and the Police Federation, the people on the ground with expertise.

I think that all hon. Members would agree that community policing is important. Although I wish to maintain a highly motivated, highly efficient police force, that should not detract from the presence on the ground and in the community. Sir Paul Condon has stated that there is no longer a place for the bobby on the beat. That is not acceptable, and I do not believe that anyone supports that. Highly visible policing makes people feel secure, comfortable and able to relax in the community in which they live.

Perhaps, as a complement to the more specialised regional force, district police forces might be set up to concentrate on lower-level crime in the local community. For example, if a car radio is stolen, it is expensive for a constable to come round and, more often than not, people are given a crime number over the phone. A new generation of district police forces could deal with minor crimes such as a kiddie's bicycle being stolen, vandalism and petty theft. People feel that such crime should be covered and they would feel more secure because they would have a district policeman, not someone who has had specialised training and is a community policeman, who is with them for 18 months and is then moved when he is suddenly asked to train in another specialism or when the CID takes him for 12 months.

We do not have that community identity, that link with the bobby on the beat. We should re-establish that and this is a way. The Home Secretary talks about truancy and the police taking children back to school, but, to be realistic, that is impossible unless we can generate a new police force. There were many arguments when traffic wardens were introduced. People said that, by putting tickets on cars, they took away the rights of the police, but traffic wardens have proved to be successful. Without them, the roads would be clogged and we would not have been able to manage.

We have an opportunity to develop a district police force. It could give an enhanced role to the special constabulary, which performs an important, much-needed and valuable function, and which could be expanded to help police local communities.

It is farcical that highly paid, highly trained police inspectors in traffic divisions spend their time changing the film in Gatso speed cameras or setting up speed traps. Surely someone else should be doing that job. Local police forces would have the time and resources to make our local areas safer. Local police officers would have a better opportunity to build a rapport with the local community, improving relations between the local bobby, residents and local businesses, and having a specific knowledge of local trouble spots and problems.

In addition, a reorganisation would provide the opportunity to establish a national force for the motorway network, coverage of which varies greatly from county to county. It is interesting is that, when I go up the M6, I go through Cheshire, and, within minutes, I am in Merseyside and, again within minutes, I reach Greater Manchester and Lancashire. Surely the policing of different counties covering small sections of the M6 is not viable and should be examined. Crime on motorways does not take place in just one county area.

Those suggestions would require much work. I hope that the Home Office will look at them carefully and establish an all-party working group to look into new policing in the next millennium.

10.12 am

Mr. Alan Clark (Kensington and Chelsea): I should like to address the House on the subject of the nine volumes that have been compiled by English Heritage cataloguing 1,500 grade 1 and grade 2 listed buildings that are deemed to be at risk. I must declare an interest as I am the owner of a grade 1 listed building. That building has been identified in the directory. I ask the House's indulgence because not only am I speaking from personal experience, but, having been "named and shamed", I can try to illuminate from personal experience what exactly is involved.

I think that we would all agree that naming and shaming is a dubious practice at the best of times and never more so than when practised by the Government or one of their agencies.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): Or a diarist.

Mr. Clark: I named, but did not shame. My right hon. Friend interrupts me with a flippant reference to my authorship, but I do not think that I have shamed anyone in my life, although often perhaps brought opprobrium on my own head, but that is another matter.

The House will remember with respect, if not affection, a former President of the United States, Mr. Lyndon Johnson. He ran into difficulties before he was President when fighting a primary. It was in a state that was distant from his home and where he was not well known, and he was fighting against a very worthy opponent, a church-going, greatly respected pillar of local society.

Johnson was not making much impact and polling day was approaching. He and his staff had to make a decision. They had a little council of war, of a kind familiar to us all when we are behind in the polls, as to what they should do. Johnson said that they should leak the news that their distinguished and church-going opponent had been guilty of vile and unnatural practices, which I will not identify on the Floor of the House. The entire council said, "We can't do that. No one would believe it and, anyway, it is not true." Johnson replied, "I just want to hear him deny it."

[Mr. Clark]

I revert to personal experience. The sub-editor of The Times writes in fairly large type:

"Tory MP denies claims he applied for a grant".

An unnamed, unidentified member of staff at English Heritage had said:

"We have discussed this with the owner"— untrue—

"there seems to be no resolution at the moment"—

true enough, as there was no discussion—

"I think his inquiries have centred on grants."

Note the use of the word "think".

I weary the House with that only because we do not know how many people that has happened to, and they do not have the immense privilege of being able to rise immediately on the Floor of the House to ventilate their view. However, a member of a Government agency is revealing what should be confidential—although, as it never happened, it is even more preposterous. The Times was told:

"I think his inquiries have centred on grants", which I denied. I have never taken a penny-piece from the public purse for anything and never applied for the grant. However, the article goes on:

"English Heritage confirmed last night that there was no correspondence on file with Mr. Clark about grants."

In other words, the whole thing was pure invention.

The reason I cite that is that, the charge having been made, the sub-editor can enjoy himself and say, "MP denies it." It is totally bogus and totally without substance, but immediately there is a slight taint in the air. That practice is okay, I suppose, for Fleet street editors. It is standard practice by reporters to say things, get people to deny them and then say, just like Lyndon Johnson, that those people have denied this or that charge. Whether that is appropriate for Government agencies is another matter, as the House may agree. However, English Heritage is unrepentant. That or another spokesman went on to say:

"The register is intended to open constructive dialogue"— not one of my favourite phrases and utterly, as we know, without meaning of any sort—

"but if we don't get it, we'll name the names in next year's edition."

The House may, in passing, ask what is meant by "constructive dialogue".

What are owners of listed buildings meant to do when they have been named and shamed? It appears that they are meant personally to spend enormous sums on repairing the degradation, much of which has occurred over centuries. But at whose behest? In my case, at that of some nameless, faceless officials at English Heritage; I have never seen one, to my recollection. A couple of people came to Saltwood and meandered around about 20 years ago. I like to think that we treated them with courtesy. I have not heard from them since; nor have I been given any indication of what I should be doing to avoid being shamed, never mind named.

The House is being indulgent and treating this matter lightly—perhaps I am not doing the subject justice. There are 1,500 buildings listed in this directory as being at risk. In every case where the building is owned privately, pressure can be put on the owners to take action through legislation passed in this place—by Orders in Council, I believe. If they do not spend what is, in many cases, a virtually unlimited amount, the property can be confiscated. A compulsory purchase order can be issued if the property is held to be in danger.

It is not clear into whose possession the property would then be taken. Would it be taken by English Heritage, the local authority or the state? Would the property then be immediately repaired? Is there an enormous sump of public money with a tap that can be opened to pay for the repair of every building that has been compulsorily purchased? I rather doubt it. We need to know more. Threats have been made in a most pugnacious and menacing way, and we need to know what will happen if we do not engage in "constructive dialogue" within the next 12 months. Big brother will appropriate all the buildings. One could say that if big brother were then to write an endless series of cheques to repair them, a kind of service would be discharged. However, the buildings would be empty, and empty buildings are much harder to maintain than those that are occupied.

English Heritage has got much too big for its boots. Its director is a prominent figure in what is sometimes referred to as café society and he is seen enjoying hospitality in many locations, but what exactly does he want to achieve?

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): He is the chairman.

Mr. Clark: Is there a director?

Sir Patrick Cormack: Yes.

Mr. Forth: They are all apparatchiks.

Mr. Clark: They are all apparatchiks, and I do not doubt that they all have huge expense accounts.

The House may take the view that the conservation officers employed by local authorities could do most of the work themselves using the Heritage Lottery Fund. They have far greater knowledge and easier access to the buildings within their purview. They could do the work more simply and more cheaply.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): I am not at all surprised to hear that my right hon. Friend has not applied for a grant from English Heritage. Does he agree that he is, in a sense, rather fortunate not to have done so? A number of my constituents have complained to me, and I have reported to the Leader of the House, that they have found increasingly commonplace waits of up to six months before English Heritage determines whether their application for grant in aid is successful. Might that conceivably be because an individual member of staff at English Heritage is preoccupied with leaking inaccurate information about the intentions of my right hon. Friend instead of focusing on the responsibilities of his or her office?

Mr. Clark: I do not want to engage in extended research into the motives of the officials at English Heritage. However, I could claim to be bitterly affronted that someone to whom I have in the past extended hospitality—if it is the same person—and from whom I never heard again should have suddenly decided that I need to be named and shamed. In addition, that official has spread the extraordinary and, in some ways, mildly defamatory falsehood that I applied for a grant when, by his or her own subsequent admission on being questioned by reporters, there is no correspondence about a grant on file, still less an application.

It remains true and very sad that a number of important listed buildings are decaying. I would not feel comfortable taking money from the taxpayer to repair a building that I live in privately. That would not be appropriate. However, the Chancellor of the Exchequer should consider certain points. Hectoring the owners of historic buildings will not improve matters. The majority cannot even afford to do the repairs that they have apparently been asked to do. I have never been asked to do any repairs; I have simply been told that my building is at risk.

The key to preserving old buildings is to keep them in good repair and, where possible or necessary, to find a way for them to earn their keep. Such grants as there were have been cut. I have never had one, as I said. VAT has to be paid at the full rate on repairs, although new buildings are generally VAT free. It cannot be right that if a part of our heritage is at risk, VAT should have to be paid on its repair bills, when that is not the case for a brand new building.

Estate owners are not allowed to offset the cost of repairs to the building against other estate income in assessing their tax. In other words, the building must be an absolutely net liability—it is cum the income tax that has already been paid on the money that will be used to make the necessary repairs. The Finance Bill will end any such relief, so all income from the estate will be taxable and no offset can be made for repairs to any aspect of the building, even if it is listed grade 1 or grade 2.

One does not like to be too party confrontational in holiday Adjournment debates, but this attitude is part and parcel of the distasteful posture adopted by the Government. It is part of the pop culture, cool Britannia ethic that they will live to regret. People are already uneasy with that. This disdain for our heritage is part of a package that has led the Government to have the millennium dome constructed not in marble or granite, so that it could conceivably be a heritage building in future centuries, but in plastic. That is the culture of the image consultant; it is the culture of obsolescence. This is pop culture at its worst—top of the charts one month, bottom of the charts and taking an overdose of narcotics in an Australian lavatory three months later.

That is the culture to which the Government, like it or not, are trying to attach a part of their ethics. It is high time that we rejected that and said that there is a more permanent culture. Theirs is part of the move to modernise—if that is the word—the royal family by dressing the Household Division in fatigues instead of bearskins, even at the birthday parade, by making sure that when the Queen arrives to open Parliament she is wearing a suit, possibly, for all I know, even a shell suit, and by ensuring that she arrives not in a Rolls-Royce, which will not be possible anyway in 10 years, but in a black cab, perhaps. It is part of a deliberate attempt to extinguish our heritage in all its different aspects, a heritage which has illuminated and invigorated our society for so long.

Our heritage is nothing to do with class or with party, but everything to do with the intrinsic nature of what we are as a people. Pop culture is irredeemably opposed to it, and the cool Britannia ethic is distant from it.

I invite the House to consider the matter—the narrow topic—of dealing with heritage buildings, to discover how, consciously or subconsciously—complete with a leaking official in a Government Department, and an attempt to name and shame and to invoke overtones of class division—the matter is part of a total fabric which I believe that the House should reject. I know that many Labour Members would agree with that.

10.29 am

Mr. Mark Todd (South Derbyshire): I should like to express some concerns about management of the reorganisation of magistrates courts by the county magistrates courts committee in my area, and, more generally, about the lack of guidance of that process elsewhere in the country.

On Monday, Derbyshire magistrates courts committee confirmed its proposal to reorganise the magistrates courts in my county through a private finance initiative. Among its proposals was a proposal to close the court in Swadlincote—which is the only court in the 120 square miles of my constituency.

I realise the need to rationalise courts. Some courts are antique and expensive to run, and others are relatively close together. My concerns fall into five categories, several of which relate to the general process of court reorganisation.

The first category concerns access to justice. The original private finance initiative consultation document issued by my magistrates courts committee sought to define the meaning of "local justice"—words that we often hear used in discussions about how we should run our magistrates courts system. The suggested definition was:

> "Magistrates drawn from Petty Sessional Divisions sitting in judgement on cases arising in those divisions using accommodation which is reasonably accessible to Magistrates and Court users."

The phrase "reasonably accessible" in the definition is clearly material, and the committee consequently sought to define it, which it did in the following terms:

> "within 20 miles of the major centres of population that it might serve . . . and accessible by public transport with a travel time of up to 60 minutes . . . and within 15 minutes walk from the nearest public transport node".

In earlier correspondence with the committee's chief executive, I attempted to obtain some definition of a 15-minute walk. I can walk a lot further in 15 minutes than many other people can. No attempt was made further to define that term, however.

What about the 60-minute public transport time criterion? I think that we can reasonably assume that the chief executive of the committee was not a regular bus user: he had certainly not chosen to consult the bus timetable for the South Derbyshire area. My constituency is rural; the town of Swadlincote is essentially a necklace of villages; and getting to the bus station is an exercise in itself. It takes 67 minutes to travel from Swadlincote bus station to Derby bus station, which exceeds the time specified by the committee in its consultation document on the key criteria for the siting of a magistrates court—and the 67 minutes does not include the time it might take to find the magistrates court on leaving the bus station.

[Mr. Mark Todd]

Was the committee swayed when those facts were drawn to its attention? Regrettably not. The committee took the view that its failure to calculate the times correctly was an unfortunate accident. Although I am sure the committee thought that the 60-minute criterion was quite sufficient to provide for the areas affected by the closure, it miscalculated—and there we are.

My second category of concerns is convenience of access to other components of the justice system. Swadlincote magistrates court incorporates facilities for the probation service, which is thus readily able to make its important contribution to the court process. The court premises also provide the probation service with a local base. However, no proposals have been made on the integration into the court process of the critical role played by the service in the area should the court be closed. It seems likely that a visiting service into the area from Derby will be provided, using currently unspecified premises—at greater cost and less convenience both to existing staff and, more critically, to users of the service.

The Swadlincote court is immediately adjacent to the local police station. Currently, the attendance of the police to act as witnesses and—in very rare cases in my constituency—in other capacities, such as dealing with someone who is misbehaving in the court, is efficiently operated, with police being called from the station as needed. The alternative would involve a substantial increase in police travelling and attendance time. My area is already thinly policed, as the Derbyshire police force is one of the least well funded in the country.

The part of my constituency south of the Trent—the bulk of it, geographically—is policed usually by four to five officers and one sergeant. If we are to chew up substantial proportions of police time by requiring them to travel to and from a court in Derby, we will obviously have fewer police available to deal with issues in our community to which they should be attending.

The third category is community identity. The committee made the assumption that Swadlincote was in some sense a suburb of Derby. That is not how the citizens of Swadlincote view themselves. The bus time probably says as much about that as anything because, if people used the service more often, someone would no doubt have found it worth while to run a faster bus. People do not look towards Derby as the main centre for jobs, entertainment or shopping; they use other urban centres in the area, or choose to stay in South Derbyshire. The mistaken view of the community of which Swadlincote is a part does not seem to have concerned the committee—and I think that such views have been more broadly applied elsewhere in the country.

The fourth category is the importance of the convenience of court users. Only a tiny minority of people ever attend court. In a generally very law-abiding community such as South Derbyshire, only a very small number of people ever attend court—which, in some senses, is part of our problem, as the committee has claimed that the court is not used very heavily. We are actually rather proud of that, and do not wish to encourage greater court use because of wrongdoing in our community.

Although only a tiny minority attend court—and then only very rarely, perhaps once or twice in their lifetime—their rights and convenience should not be ignored. The chief executive of the magistrates courts committee was quoted as saying—and chose not to deny in correspondence with me—that criminals should allow in their activities for the cost of transport to a rather more distant magistrates court; perhaps they should thieve a little more to raise the funds for the bus fare to a court in Derby, rather than Swadlincote.

I drew to the chief executive's attention the fact that court users were not merely those rightly or wrongly accused of offences, but witnesses. We already have a problem nationally in persuading people to give up time to attend court as witnesses. I cannot believe that expecting people in my constituency to spend half a day travelling to and from a court in Derby—in addition to attending the court and waiting to be called—will encourage more of them to bear witness in cases.

Others also attend court. Magistrates handle the distribution of licences of various kinds to perfectly law-abiding people running businesses, and those people want to go somewhere locally convenient, rather than some distance away. I do not see why they should be put to that inconvenience either.

My fifth category of concern is the court premises. I could well understand that there might be concern if those were crumbling and decaying, but they are not. They were opened in 1978 and I readily concede that they are not a thing of beauty—they are an example of the architecture of the time. The right hon. Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Mr. Clark) referred to our heritage: I do not think Swadlincote magistrates court will feature in the list in the foreseeable future. I also concede that some routine maintenance would be desirable, but it is nothing serious.

Space is certainly sufficient to allow the separation of witnesses and defendants. One of the key problem areas in cramped, old-fashioned magistrates courts is that witnesses and defendants have to sit together, which can occasionally cause some friction. That is not the case at Swadlincote court. Also, the cells are appropriate for their purpose, although I would not say that they are luxurious. So, there would be appear to be no structural reasons to close the premises.

In addition, the local district council, having identified cost as one of the issues that might concern the magistrates courts committee, has said that it might be able to contribute towards the cost of the building by leasing it from the committee for training activities and so forth, thus supplementing the income drawn from the building.

Clearly, the proposal is ill founded and I very much hope that the paying authorities, Derbyshire county council and Derby city council, will not endorse it when they decide their position. The project will also be expensive—this is not a PFI that will save us a lot of money.

The proposal also raises some general concerns. First, I urge the Lord Chancellor's Department to review the rules under which magistrates courts committees operate. In this case, the committee has invented its own rules and then broken them. I am unhappy about that process in Derbyshire and would be surprised if it were unique in the country. I want the rules under which the committees operate when they consider the reorganisation of court premises to be reconsidered.

Secondly, I want a review of the way in which my magistrates courts committee, having drawn up a PFI document that made specific pledges on public access to the new court premises, has chosen in its proposal to break that promise. The Lord Chancellor's Department should also consider that matter and ask for an explanation from the chief executive of the courts committee as to its behaviour in this matter.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome): I wish to draw attention to a number of concerns that have been expressed to me by constituents in Somerset, which I know to be matters of concern to a great many people. There is growing discontent—one might almost say resentment—at the emerging discrepancies between the rhetoric of the Government on so many issues and the reality of what is happening in rural counties such as Somerset. As is often the case, the issues are not at the forefront of the political debate in this country, but nevertheless they are important to me and to my constituents.

I would not ascribe particular motives to Somerset electors a year ago, but I well understand their feeling that things had to change markedly. They had certainly lost confidence in the Conservative Government's ability to provide the sort of services and quality of life that they wanted and to which they aspired. The feeling of optimism at a change of Government has quickly been overtaken by a feeling that we have simply had 19 rather than 18 years of Conservative government. That is a shame. I am not ungenerous to the Government, who have done a number of admirable things in their year of office. There are areas in which I would whole-heartedly support them, but I feel I must draw attention to the patchiness of the outcome of their performance.

The first and most pressing reason for my addressing the House this morning is the vexed question of household numbers. That has been a contentious issue, and there have been strong expressions of concern from both sides of the House about the rationale and methodology used to calculate those numbers through structure plans and the degree to which that is putting unwarranted pressure on green-field sites and rural counties such as Somerset. Our debates have largely been constructive and I applauded the change of policy indicated by the Deputy Prime Minister in his statement a couple of months ago.

That statement was widely welcomed in my area. We recognise that we have a major difficulty, with which the county and district councils, as well as local people, have been wrestling for the best part of a year or more. The methodology indicates a level of housing requirement that simply cannot be met in a rural county without vastly expanding villages, extending the fringes of small market towns, eating into the countryside and creating an environment different from that which we have enjoyed historically—in other words, suburbanisation. We do not want that, and for good reason: it is not nimbyism or simply a reluctance to embrace change. We certainly want the houses that are needed for the local community, but we do not see the need to destroy the rural environment simply to accommodate aspirational developments to provide more and more high-cost housing so that people can move into the area, with no benefit to the local economy. That is a proper concern.

We thought that we had made progress. I entered a caveat when the Deputy Prime Minister made his statement, asking how it would change what was happening since a draft structure plan was being discussed and, having considered the matter carefully, the county council had rejected the idea that 50,000 homes was a sustainable level of development in Somerset and cogently argued the changes to the methodology that we believed were required. The council had brought the number down to 44,300, which was still too high to be accommodated within a rural county, but nevertheless was nearer to what people felt was appropriate. That proposal had still to be considered at an examination in public, however, and no change in Government policy had yet happened, despite the declaration of intent by the Deputy Prime Minister. I suggested that one way out of the dilemma would be to freeze the structure plan to enable the Government to put in place the policies that they wanted before they became locked into a forward structure plan that would extend to 2011 and lock in place unacceptable changes in the structure of the county.

Sadly, my plea fell on deaf ears. The examination in public has proceeded and, to our astonishment—I think the astonishment is shared by members of all parties in Somerset and independent observers of the scene—the inspector has not only rejected the view strongly expressed by all representatives of the local community that the 44,300 figure in the structure plan was too high and would have to be changed to accommodate the Government's new policy, but has replaced that figure with a new one of 51,600, which is higher than the number first thought of, and an increase of 16 per cent. How can that be reconciled with the Government's change of policy? What is the point of having debates in this Chamber and of Ministers making statements if the reality on the ground is that unsustainable increase? Whatever their political backgrounds, Members of Parliament who represent Somerset constituencies—and, indeed, members of the local authorities—want to press that point strongly. The argument is not yet over, but I ask the Leader of the House to consider how we can change the course of the policy juggernaut that seems to be out of the Government's control.

The simmering discontent that I mentioned is also felt about education. I believe that the Government have changed the rhetoric on education and have genuinely sought to provide additional resources, although it is a matter of political debate whether those resources have been sufficient or allocated quickly enough. However, the reality in some parts of the country is that there has been no change—teachers are still being laid off and class sizes are still being increased. The patchiness of provision means that, in some areas, it seems as though the Conservative Government have not gone away.

There are technical arguments about why rural counties lose out under the current formulation. We call the iniquitous area cost adjustment the tax on the west, although I suspect that the right hon. Lady regards it as a tax on the north—

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford): And on the midlands.

Mr. Heath: The hon. Gentleman rightly includes the midlands. I see no reason why, simply because of where they live, our children should be funded at a substantially lower level than children in the home counties. We face higher costs in rural areas—we have to accommodate the school transport bill, and we have smaller schools, whose unit costs are high, because there is no easy access to centres of population. We accept all that, but we want a fair deal from the Government—we want the Government to recognise the fact that the local authorities are having to spend vastly in excess of the standard spending assessment because of the additional costs. We do not want our local authorities to be capped, and we do not want to be told that we are receiving more money when we are not and when schools are still losing ground.

Agriculture is facing the greatest recession that I can remember. In the south-west, the incomes of dairy farmers have fallen by 35 per cent., and those of sheep and beef enterprises have fallen by 65 per cent.—that is a colossal drop. Again, I do not lay all that at the Government's door, but the Government should respond positively. The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food does his cause no good by failing to turn up, for the second year running, to the Royal Bath and West show, where he would have been able to talk directly to west country farmers about their plight.

Mr. Todd: The hon. Gentleman says that my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food should respond more positively. Will he give an insight into what that actually means?

Mr. Heath: I should happily do so at length. We are debating the common agricultural policy tomorrow, when some of the issues can be discussed, but I am particularly concerned about agrimonetary revaluation—I first mentioned the subject in the House last July, I think. There is a serious problem with the green pound. I accept that the Government have moved some way on upland farmers, but they seem to reject the idea that there is any difficulty in the lowlands. The small farmers on the Somerset levels are not rich—they have smallholdings and are struggling to make ends meet with relatively few cattle—yet they are not included in the schemes because they happen not to live high enough above sea level. There is no logic in that. The Government seem to think that the lowlands can look after themselves, but I am saying that they cannot—people in those areas face real difficulties.

I make a small plea—I would have it made on Monday evening, but, unfortunately, I was representing the House elsewhere—about the Somerset and Cornwall Light Infantry. I know that, in the lead-up to the strategic defence review, all hon. Members will want to mention the territorial regiments in their constituencies—it is a commonplace—but I make no apologies for doing so. The Somerset and Cornwall Light Infantry was formed by the amalgamation of two proud regiments, the Duke of Cornwall's Light Infantry and the Somerset Light Infantry, which goes back to the stormy days of 1685, with which hon. Members who know their history will be familiar. It is the only Army presence in the county, and I believe that it does an extraordinarily good job.

It would be a great shame if the Army were not represented at all in Somerset. I do not believe that that will happen, but the Government should recognise the role of the Territorial Army and its associations with the counties. The process of reduction and amalgamation has gone far enough; if it continues, we shall lose something that has been of great value to the country for many years and has served us well. I do not dispute that the role of the TA may need to change, but that role should be strengthened in the local community. The reserve forces make an important contribution to the regular forces in times both of war and of civil emergency.

I believe that some of the changes after a year of the Labour Government have been wholly beneficial, but there is still much more to be done. The funding of services in rural areas is inadequate not only to meet people's aspirations but to meet their needs. I ask the right hon. Lady and her colleagues to ensure that distribution across the country is as fair as the Government's rhetoric would have us believe.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford): I have listened with interest to this morning's speeches on the built environment, but I want to return to the theme of youth, echoing the sentiments of the hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess), who is no longer in the Chamber, about how we should invest more in the youth of today, as they will be the active citizens of tomorrow. I want to focus on those tens of thousands of children who are looked after by local authorities under care orders. In particular, I shall refer to an event in Stafford over Easter that gives some grounds for optimism about the future care of those children.

Some children are in local authority care for short periods and then return to their families. Others, regrettably, are looked after for many years. When they reach the age of 18 and adulthood, they must leave local authority care. As statistics show, many children are 16 or 17 when local authorities make arrangements for them to move on and to look after themselves. As policy makers, we need to pay more attention to that group. I sometimes fear that society does not feel the urgency of the need to save those people, who are peculiarly vulnerable to homelessness and joblessness, and to becoming victims of crime, drugs and prostitution.

At Easter, I convened and hosted a conference at Stafford college on that very subject. I warmly thank my guest presenters, people of national reputation, who attended to share the benefit of their experience for no remuneration other than their expenses, which was marvellous. They were Martin Ayres, a consultant to the Department of Health, James Cathcart of the National Childrens Bureau, Peter Hardman of First Key, and Janet Manders of the National Foster Care Association.

Every possible local agency was represented that day, from the statutory agencies such as social services, to all the health and education services and right through to the voluntary sector. Some of those present told marvellous stories of the excellent services that they already provide for children and adolescents, but one of the worrying features of the day was that some had not met others and did not know of the marvellous services that they provided. The picture was of fractured rather than complementary services.

One example given by a presenter showed how badly things can go wrong. A social worker told us of a boy who, in the 1990s, was coming to the end of his time in local authority care and was placed with a landlady. They got on well, for once he had a secure home, and he developed well. His 18th birthday came and went with no official recognition, except for the significant fact that the money stopped arriving. Neither of them understood at first why that was.

By chance, the landlady met the social worker at the market several weeks later. The landlady mentioned that the money had not arrived and the social worker explained that it had stopped because the boy was 18. The landlady rushed home to tell the boy—now a young man—that he should apply to social security for benefit. There was a delay, and she got so fed up waiting for the money that she evicted him. The next time she and the social worker met at the market, neither of them knew where he had got to. That is how things can go wrong.

The situation has improved in Staffordshire, but there are still problems. Under the Children Acts, local authorities can give help to people leaving care beyond the age of 18, but that is discretionary rather than mandatory, so they can wash their hands of young people at 18, either because they do not consider them important or because their funds are so stretched that they consider it better to spend the money elsewhere. More needs to be done nationally.

It is a good start if everyone collects information and makes plans on a common basis, and the Department of Health is trying to ensure that authorities collect the same information and plan in the same way. I am told that nine out of 10 English social services departments now follow the same planning processes and keep the same records. Part of those records consists of the individual care plan for each child under local authority care.

The best care plans should be co-produced with the young people themselves; involve other family members, if possible; try to take account of wider community ties; involve other agencies, such as housing and training providers; be positive about education and health outcomes, which are often overlooked; and, most important, plan for continuity of care, including the leaving of the looked-after system.

The conference at Stafford was very positive and told of collaboration between social services and housing associations to provide suitable housing and training opportunities for care leavers. Employment and careers representatives explained that they were willing to come out of their offices and visit the young people, rather than sitting back and waiting for them to come to the offices.

A good idea arose from the day, and I am taking it up with the Minister for Employment, Welfare to Work and Equal Opportunities: if the new deal could be extended to 16 and 17-year-old care leavers—a small number of people, and a marginal additional cost to the new deal—it would be a terrific boost for their support networks.

The conference was not a one-day wonder: the participants agreed to meet again to plan the co-ordination of their services and make them complementary, not fractured. New partnerships were formed before our eyes to maximise the support that can be given to young people. I am pursuing the idea of creating a Staffordshire forum where young people can meet and give their input to the planning of their future care.

Such young people are tremendously disadvantaged. They can help themselves, but they need our help to overcome some unusually large obstacles. Will hon. Members share my zeal and help those people urgently?

11.5 am

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): The issue about which I want to speak is of national importance, but I am concerned with its parochial, or county, significance. In Cornwall, we have three core industries: agriculture, tourism and the extractive industries. I want to deal with them in reverse order.

Everyone in Cornwall is very sad at the loss of the last working tin mine in Europe. It has gone because of the artificial level of the pound. It has had insufficient investment in the past, but the crucial issue for the industry is the exchange rate.

The holiday industry is equally badly affected by the current exchange rate. I understand that the pound is now quite a bit lower than DM3, but recently it has been as high as DM3.1. Set against DM2.2 just a few years ago, that shows the extent to which the situation is causing difficulties. It is not only manufacturing industry that gets clobbered by the artificial valuation of the pound.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): The hon. Gentleman's argument is extremely important. How does he judge the level of the pound to be artificial? In a free market, do not foreign countries and those who purchase our currency place a value on it that is a function of the competitiveness of British industry and the strength of the British economy?

Mr. Tyler: In that sense, the valuation put on any currency is always artificial; but stability is critical. If the sentiment is such that a currency continually goes up and down and causes huge problems to industry, the Government must deal with that artificiality. If the hon. Gentleman were to advance his argument over a longer period and in relation to some of our major industries, many in his party would disagree fundamentally.

Agriculture is perhaps the most obvious victim of the situation. Farm incomes suffered an appalling collapse in 1997. Most of the reasons for that collapse arose from the policies of the previous Government, but the cumulative effect is such that the present Government must take a long, hard look at what is happening. In 1997, there was a 47 per cent. drop in real incomes on our farms, according to the National Farmers Union. All authorities, inside and outside government, expect 1998 output prices to be well below 1997 prices.

Everyone acknowledges that the core issue is not BSE or the peripheral problems that may be addressed by tomorrow's debate: it is the strength of sterling. Despite a slight weakening in recent weeks, the pound has risen by 33 per cent. against the mark and by 30 per cent. against the franc since the beginning of 1996. The drop in farm incomes is having a huge cumulative effect on investment, not only in farming, but in supply. The prosperity of large swathes of rural Britain is threatened; that is symbolised by a 43 per cent. drop in new tractor purchases, following a 1997 figure already lower than that of 1996. No industry can afford that sort of haemorrhage over a long period. Most commodity prices have shown significant year-on-year falls. Milk prices have fallen from 22.5p a litre to 18.2p a litre, a problem that will not be speedily addressed.

The level of the pound is damaging in several areas. Agriculture is unusual, however, in that the Government have methods to hand to address some of the impact. The green rate, which affects direct payments to farmers as well as impacting on market prices, can be devastating, as is recognised in the mechanisms available to the Governments of European Union member states, and which several states have used to address the problem.

A difficult situation has arisen because an already uneven playing field is being made even more uneven. Countries that suffer valuation problems similar to ours have taken measures to mitigate the resulting difficulties, but the United Kingdom Government have done comparatively little. Over the next few weeks, more difficulties will arise. The increase in the pound's value during the first half of the year was large enough to trigger a 2.7 per cent. green rate revaluation on 3 May. Unless the pound falls significantly before 1 July, area payments to arable farmers will fall sharply from last year's level, which was not in any case encouraging. For example, payments per hectare for cereal will drop by £15.50 in England.

There have been several recent revaluations of the green pound under EU legislation, so our Government are permitted to pay temporary and degressive compensation to farmers. All other member states that were in the same position have done so, at least up to the extent of their EU contribution. The UK Government have so far applied for only £85 million as part of the December livestock aid package. However, they could have applied over the past 18 months for virtually £1 billion.

Hon. Members who represent rural constituencies appreciate that it is not easy for the Government to obtain such large sums, which have implications for the Exchequer. However, the continuing refusal to add to the aid paid to beef and sheep farmers in December 1997 is causing hardship to tens of thousands of farmers and their families all over the country, and to many ancillary industries. My hon. Friend the Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) referred to farmers in that category in Somerset, and it is also true of Cornwall.

Even if aid were paid in full, it would go only some way towards addressing the substantial fall in farm incomes. Again, I stress that, by allowing the problem to continue, not only the Government, but their predecessors, have built up a huge backlog that will be difficult to deal with. Even if the full sums were made available, they would not completely offset the loss that the industry has suffered, although they might provide a softer landing.

Some of the sum can no longer be paid, because EU approval must be sought within a year of revaluation. If the previous Government had taken the initiatives open to them, we might be in a better position, but the present Government could obtain about £424 million—half from the EU, and half from their own resources.

The Government's decision not to join economic and monetary union from its inception on 1 January 1999 will mean a continuing need for agrimonetary arrangements. More importantly, the freeze on the green rates of the UK and other countries, as applied to direct payments, will cease from that date. Unless steps are taken to offset change, British farmers' receipts will reduce by a further £165 million in 1999, and by £235 million in 2000. In view of likely developments in market receipts and costs, that will be a further severe blow to rural Britain.

The beef sector faces specific problems after two desperately difficult years since the fateful announcement by the previous Government on bovine spongiform encephalopathy and Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease. There has been a welcome and sustained recovery in the home market, but beef farmers are suffering a double squeeze because of increased imports. Perhaps not all hon. Members appreciate that the strong pound is a major problem—not only does it affect how farmers obtain their income; it subsidises beef imports. Our inability to export makes that a double whammy. The strength of sterling has made the UK an attractive market for beef from other EU countries, just when our producers are handicapped by the additional costs of our having the safest beef in the world because we have the greatest safeguards.

I return briefly to the holiday industry, which is of equal importance to Cornwall. Over the next few weeks, would-be holidaymakers from Berwick, Brecon or Bermondsey will compare the prices of holidays offered in brochures for Cornwall and the Costa del Sol. They will find a huge disadvantage in staying in the UK because of the way in which sterling has moved. Worse still, the Germans, the Dutch or the French who consider coming to Cornwall this summer will reach the same conclusion, and they will also find it difficult to ignore the discrepancy between value added tax rates. We shall receive fewer visitors from the continent this summer than we should because of the strength of sterling, and the VAT position will make that worse. Meanwhile, UK holidaymakers will be more attracted than ever to the continent.

Cornwall has three great industries, and each of them is disabled by the artificial value of sterling. I hope that the Government will address that matter. The wringing of hands that we have had from those on the Treasury Front Bench has not given much encouragement. Along with all hon. Members who represent great manufacturing industries, I ask the Leader of the House and her colleagues to consider the impact of the strength of sterling on the extractive industry, the holiday industry and, above all, agriculture.

11.18 am

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise a subject of enormous national importance and of special relevance to my constituency. I refer to the review of the fiscal regime that is applied to our offshore oil and gas industry, which is being carried out by the Government. I am not a taxation expert and I do not intend to take the House this morning through a mass of complex financial data, which the Treasury is no doubt evaluating.

My purpose is, first, to draw attention to the wider repercussions for the United Kingdom of applying significantly higher taxes to our oil and gas industry. It is essential that the Treasury does not simply take a narrow fiscal view. My second purpose is to explain that the industry no longer offers the easy pickings for the Treasury that many long thought there would be.

The review has been delayed. The Government announced early on that they would review the industry. Many people felt that some proposals would be announced in the last Budget, but the review is taking a long time. I hope that that signals a recognition that this is a complex issue and that the industry is not a simple cash cow. However, the delay is creating some drawn-out uncertainty for the industry that is not good, especially as the latest round of applications for licences to explore parts of the sea around our shores is taking place. Companies are having to bid almost blind. To that, we have to add the current moratorium on gas-fired power stations. I understand why that has come about. We have to consider the coalfield communities and the future of coal, but I remind the House that there are what might be termed oil and gas communities, too.

First, let me talk about the importance of the oil and gas industry to our country. It may be true that only 31,000 people are directly employed by oil companies, but 350,000 people are employed in the industry if one includes all the contractors and suppliers and many small and medium enterprises, right down to the tiny family firms that are involved in the business.

Shell alone is investing about £2.5 billion a year in the industry. We hear from time to time of £200 million, £300 million and £400 million investments by Japanese corporations and we rightly get excited about them, but let us put that beside the enormous annual investment by the oil companies. Three quarters of the investment is spent in the United Kingdom, benefiting the country. The oil and gas industry represents about 20 per cent. of national industrial investment. We are dealing with something big. So it is clear that the review requires extreme care. We must be careful not to damage the industry.

It is probably fair to say that the review is being driven by three commonly held views. The first is that big companies can afford to pay more tax. The second is that they were let off lightly by the previous Government, especially in the Thatcher years, and that an opportunity was missed for the nation to reap the fruits of our national resource. The third and most important is that the current fiscal regime is the most benign tax regime applied to the oil and gas industry in the world. I shall deal with those three in reverse.

It is true that the tax regime is the most benign in the world, but North sea oil and gas is also the most expensive to explore and produce in the world. We have deep water, deep drilling and hostile weather and sea conditions. It is also important to say that new higher taxes will not be retrospective but will apply only to new extraction. If ever there was a treasure boat, the previous Government missed it. I do not want to get into that argument; the important point is that the industry is now different from the one of the heady days of the past. The oil and gas industry around our shores is now at a mature stage. There are no great numbers of big fields to come on stream. What is happening is the mopping up of relatively small puddles of oil and gas.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman would like to move a few feet along the Bench. Apparently, the microphone into which he is speaking is not working and people cannot hear him.

Mr. Blizzard: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have never known anyone to suffer that before.

Oil and gas extraction in the North sea is continuing because we have developed new technologies that give access to those reserves of oil and gas that it was previously thought impossible to obtain economically. That is being done on the back of the existing infrastructure. The areas now being explored to the west of Shetland are extremely difficult to access. The conditions are very adverse.

As we approach the 30th anniversary of the industry, it is worth remembering that, 10 years ago, it was thought that, by now, the industry would be packing up and leaving. The fact that it is not is due to the benign tax regime that we have been discussing. If the industry were pulling out now, we would be leaving behind valuable natural resources. We would be wasting a finite resource. We would be leaving behind most of those 350,000 jobs. So taking out from the earth what was previously thought uneconomic to extract is good eco-management. That would not have happened if we had had a much harsher tax regime.

As things stand, we have a bright future. We can look to 30 more years of the industry and of high value to our national economy. That is good news for constituencies such as mine, but it can be achieved only as long as we do not jeopardise it by introducing a new fiscal regime that could have the effect of shortening that period and bringing forward the time when the oil companies pack their bags and move on.

The present level of tax has encouraged the extension of the life of the industry. The Exxon Corporation, through Esso, in its worldwide operation has invested a disproportionately high amount of its capital in the United Kingdom, matching that of Shell, with which it is a partner in exploration. That has been good for the United Kingdom.

As for the view that the large companies are easy targets and big international organisations, increased taxes would not hit those companies. They could simply change their investment pattern. There are plenty of other places in the world where they could go and find oil and gas. The people who would be hit are British contractors, and that means British jobs and companies large and small such as those in my constituency.

The British contractors in the oil and gas business have been a huge success story. What was once thought unextractable is now in production. That is as a result of the development of new technology such as floating production and storage vessels, innovative drilling, remote control drilling and advances in health and safety and environmental issues. Our contractors have become leaders in the world. They have had to be in response to the difficult conditions to be found in the North sea. Their expertise, skill and technology are now being exported all over the world. British companies are winning contracts all over the world. There are jobs for British people all over the world. There is a great opportunity to continue that for up to 30 years to come as long as we do not have a fiscal regime that discourages it.

I said that the subject was of special relevance to my constituency. The mainstay of the local economy of Lowestoft, my main town, is the oil and gas industry. We have lost our traditional industries. We all know what has happened to fishing. Where once we had dozens and dozens of trawlers and hundreds of small boats, we are now down to no more than 10 trawlers and a few dozen small boats. Lowestoft once had two shipyards. Brooke Marine was a famous one. The last famous vessel built there was Richard Branson's Virgin Atlantic craft. We had two canning factories—one called the Co-Op, with its brand name of "Waveney", the river which gives the name to my constituency. We had Eastern Coachworks, which used to build Leyland coaches. That has closed. We had Bally shoes. That has closed. Our only gain has been the oil and gas industry, which has been a saviour locally.

We have the headquarters of Shell's southern fields operation, which provides high-quality white-collar and high-tech work and is one of only two high-volume sources of such employment in my constituency. We have Odebrecht SLP, a fabrication company: people who come to Lowestoft ask what the blocks of flats being built in the harbour are and the answer is that they are accommodation modules for oil platforms. The benefit of that industry is that it has taken up some of the skills that were previously used in the shipyards. We have a company called KYE, which is a real local success story, having grown from being a family business into a company employing hundreds of people. It provides all sorts of services to the oil and gas industry and now exports its products and people all over the world. All those businesses are highly competitive, but we also have a college of further education that is submitting a bid to become an information technology centre of excellence, to provide high-tech training in the oil and gas industry. That is an exciting prospect and a successful bid would be good news for our town.

However, all those opportunities have not replaced all the jobs that were lost and we still have an unemployment rate of about 9 per cent. We look to the new Government to regenerate our area, especially through the regional development agency. We shall, in due course, apply for assisted area status and European funds. Since my election, I have pressed for improved roads to help increase the competitiveness of local industries. All that is a difficult task but we must not put at risk what we already have. Across the country, there are towns that, like Lowestoft, have little else but the oil and gas industry and, without that industry, the Government would face problems such as increased benefits payments to add to the already high bill. I hope that the Treasury will take the big picture into account when it makes its tax calculations.

It is not only my constituency that has this interest. A map has been drawn up showing all the constituencies colour coded according to employment levels in oil and gas. The black constituencies are those with more than 5,000 employees and the red are those with more than 1,000 jobs in the industry. The map has a lot of red, some black and a lot of orange, for areas with more than 500 jobs; there is not as much red as on the political map of the country, but the map shows that the industry spreads across hundreds of constituencies and throughout the country.

Nationally, the Government are committed to stimulating and supporting businesses and encouraging growth and investment. They have cut corporation tax and are reforming capital gains tax and the Department of Trade and Industry is setting up the export forum. All that effort to support business must not be undermined by damaging one of our major industries. If the Government get the tax review right, we shall have an industry with a 30-year future and there are few industries that can make that claim in the global economy of today. The Government must get it right. We have an opportunity to lead the world in the development and export of new technology, but that process needs the right fiscal climate in which to thrive.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): My request of the Leader of the House is that she considers urgently referendums and the way in which they have become part of our political process. I am increasingly worried by the frequency with which the Government resort to referendums and by the lack of thought that has gone into the way in which referendums are used as part of our political process.

We have all become used to the process: the Government have an idea about change of some sort, usually constitutional change; public opinion is softened up, although details may or may not be provided as to the nature of the changes to be made; the question is put and an announcement is made of overwhelming support for whatever was proposed. That announcement is made regardless of the turnout achieved or the size of the majority achieved among those who did bother to vote—a widely varying pattern has emerged in that respect. My question, which urgently requires an answer, is whether that is a legitimate or valid political process. The answer depends on several key factors, none of which has yet been satisfactorily addressed. My contention is that the Government, who have resorted so frequently to the mechanism of the referendum, have not given serious thought to the way in which that political device is used or to its potential effects.

We all know how crucial is the question. The outcome of a referendum depends to a large extent on the question put, and the most recent example is that of the London referendum. There was much debate about whether there should be two questions—"Should we have a mayor?" and "Should we have an executive body or assembly?"—but the Government cleverly decided to put those two separate questions together in a single question. Many of us argued that that was the wrong approach, which invalidated the process because the proposal involved two quite separate new political entities for London, but the Government insisted that only one question be asked. They got a yes answer on an extremely low turnout, despite the fact that little detail was given of what sort of powers were to be exercised or the relationship between mayor, assembly and boroughs.

That problem became even more obvious in the Scottish and Welsh referendums. The only question put to the people of Scotland was, "Do you want a new Parliament?" but no reference was made, except in the broadest terms, to the relationship that might exist between that Parliament and any other constitutional body. Crucially, the people of Scotland were not asked, "Are you content with a one-chamber Parliament? If you are to have a separate legislature for Scotland, would you not prefer to have the constitutional and legislative security of a two-chamber mechanism, whereby there would be a safety mechanism available?" In the Welsh referendum, the people of Wales were not asked, "Do you want a strong Parliament of the sort proposed for Scotland, or are you content to have a much weaker body, which looks like a gesture assembly?" My point is that the question asked is always crucial and that, more often than not, the really important questions are not asked at all. They are assumed or subsumed into a single question, so that the people are not given the opportunity properly to consider the issues put before them or what other options might be available.

The next consideration is the vexed one of thresholds. Do we believe that any referendum on constitutional change in our country will legitimise that change by a simple majority of yes votes, regardless of the number of people who choose to turn out and vote? Is abstention to be seen as a positive political statement or as an expression of indifference? The classic example is the London referendum, in which only one in three Londoners bothered to vote. I should have thought that that turnout was in itself a statement of the indifference of two out of three Londoners to the question being put, yet the result was hailed by the Government as an overwhelming triumph and an endorsement for their proposals to change the whole basis of London government for some time to come.

Even more important is a question that might surprise some hon. Members: who should be asked? That might appear to be self-evident, but I resent the fact that the people of England were never asked for their views on matters relating to Scotland or Wales. Questions crucial to the future of the United Kingdom were asked, yet the vast majority of the population and the electorate of the United Kingdom has not, to date, been asked for its view on the issue of giving greater powers to a Scottish Parliament or to a Welsh assembly. The English people will be affected and are to be the paymasters for the whole process, but they have not been asked whether they want the process to continue, or whether they are prepared to continue to pay for it.

That argument even applies to the London referendum. London residents were asked, but the millions of people who travel to London, who work in London and who sustain London in many ways were not given an opportunity to express their views, even though their way of life might be seriously affected by the decisions taken by a London mayor and assembly. The answer to the question of who should be asked has not been properly thought through.

The timing of the question is always crucial. We should consider whether it should be entirely at the discretion of the Government of the day, as the timing of the referendum usually has a distinct bearing—or at least an influence—on its outcome.

One could draw many conclusions from all this. My preferred conclusion is that we should never use referendums; I doubt that they are a proper, valid or legitimate way in which to settle complex questions. For those who argue in favour of them, I shall review the deal that I make on such occasions and say, "I might be persuaded if you would grant me a referendum on the restoration of capital punishment—a subject that has long been close to my heart." If we are all agreed that referendums are to be a key mechanism of political decision making, why not hold one on that subject? Even that would raise the questions that I have mentioned. The choice of question would be crucial—a matter of life and death in some cases.

A question also arises about the irreversibility of referendums. Once a matter has been determined by that, in my opinion, dubious political mechanism, should there be a minimum period before the question may again be put? When will we be allowed to ask the people of Scotland—and, I hope, in future, England—whether they believe that it was a good idea to have a separate assembly, a completely new bunch of politicians, more levels of bureaucracy, more expense, salaries, offices and so on? When will they be asked again whether that was really what they wanted? Supposing, as a result of a referendum, capital punishment were restored—as I suspect would be the case were the question to be asked—when could we revisit the issue and ask again whether people wanted that?

The political mechanism of the referendum gives rise to so many questions—the way in which it is used, the timing, the content of the questions, even who is entitled to vote—that obviously no thought can have been given to those questions by the Government, as they have decided to resort to the mechanism so frequently to legitimise, or seek to legitimise, their policy proposals.

This is an issue of increasing urgency. The mechanism must be considered seriously, here in the House of Commons, in our Parliament—the only proper vehicle for such consideration. I hope that, very soon—preferably before the Adjournment, but I hold out little of that—the Leader of the House will provide an opportunity for the matter to be properly considered by the House of Commons, before we contemplate using the mechanism again.

Mr. Martin Salter (Reading, West): I welcome the opportunity to participate in this extended Adjournment debate. Whatever modernisation of the House of Commons takes place, I hope that this institution will remain because it is valued, especially by new Members who have discovered the opportunity that it provides.

My short contribution, like that of my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney), concerns child care, and especially the need to regulate people who work with children in individual private homes—nannies, an awful expression, but one that we are stuck with.

Last week, I had the pleasure of holding a parliamentary reception for representatives from the Playpen campaign. I thank hon. Members who supported that reception, and especially hon. Members who supported early-day motion 1262, which is sponsored by me and the hon. Member for Taunton (Jackie Ballard), in a display of cross-party unity on this issue.

The Playpen campaign was set up last year, in the wake of Louise Woodward's arrest in the United States, when it was recognised that there was an urgent need for Government intervention to protect children, parents and nannies from unscrupulous practices and unsuitable people in the child care profession. Playpen campaigns for the setting up of a non-profit-making, independent national nanny register to check credentials, exclude or deter unsuitable people and protect children from abuse and bad practice. It argues that there should be a requirement to register, which should be a condition of employment, and that the registration process should include checks on an applicant's identity, academic career and qualifications, work career, character and criminal record.

It is incredible that this loophole in the law remains, and was not plugged by the Children Act 1989. Playgroups, nurseries and child minders are registered by the relevant local authority, by the social services department and so on, but there is no requirement for regulatory controls or registration of people who work in the home of the child's parents. That anomaly must be addressed. There is not even a requirement for nannies, or potential employees who are on a nanny register, to hold a first aid certificate, never mind a professional certificate of qualification.

A recent television documentary highlighted some of the potential abuses in the profession. It showed allegedly reputable nanny agencies sending people into parents' homes without checks and with references that had not been taken up. A pornographer, heroin addict or thief could obtain employment through a nanny agency, and gain the trust of parents and the ability to look after their most precious charges, with absolutely no control, making possible tragedies such as those that occurred in the Louise Sullivan and Louise Woodward cases. That unacceptable situation needs to be resolved before further tragedies occur. We want no more Louise Woodwards or Louise Sullivans.

Playpen has representatives from several reputable organisations, including the Professional Association of Nursery Nurses, based in Derby, and the Chiltern college for nursery nursing in Reading, in my constituency, and from respected child care trainers. I pay tribute to a founder member of Playpen, Cheryl Winton, a wonderful lady whose daughter, Jemma, was brain-damaged by abuse in her own home by an unqualified nanny. Cheryl is determined to ensure that other parents do not go through the private hell that she went through, and I suggest that we have a duty and a responsibility to plug that loophole.

How did we get where we are today? I do not believe that any hon. Member would argue that this situation is tenable and that the loophole does not need to be plugged. As usual, we have to look to the activities of the previous Government, especially the former Under-Secretary of State for Corporate Affairs, one Neil Hamilton, who piloted through the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994.

I do not believe that the previous Conservative Government set out to deregulate nanny registers. Having studied the record, I am also aware that the Opposition failed to spot the consequences of the 1994 Act. Labour Members made representations in Parliament concerning models, actors, musicians, seafarers and agricultural labourers, but we all missed the consequences of de-licensing—deregulating—employment agencies. Now anyone could set up a nanny register and provide people to work in the privacy of people's homes, with their children.

I am thankful that the climate is changing. I welcome the publication of the Green Paper, "Meeting the Childcare Challenge", and I welcome the fact that the campaign has cross-party support. I also welcome the fact that the Secretary of State for Social Security is prepared to meet a delegation from Playpen and that the Green Paper mentions the issue of regulation for all persons involved in child care.

Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for the opportunity to draw attention to this important issue. I look forward to a response from the Leader of the House and I hope that, as soon as possible, legislation will be introduced, building on the Green Paper.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): I urge the Leader of the House not to let the House adjourn for the Whitsun recess until her right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has made a statement in the House on why Her Majesty's Government did nothing to stop the European Union abolishing the sale of duty-free goods to travellers within the European Union from 1 June 1999. The right hon. Lady knows that we had a full debate on the subject on 6 May, and that there was unanimity in the House on the belief that the measure would be highly damaging to jobs in the United Kingdom—jobs in airlines, at airports, in ferry companies and at sea ports. Nevertheless, Her Majesty's Government proceeded to do nothing to prevent the abolition and the damage which would ensue.

The Government take great pride in their power and influence as holders of the presidency of the EU. At the Economic and Finance Council we saw exactly what that meant—that Her Majesty's Government would connive with EU initiatives and do nothing to protect Britain's interests. It is not as if the UK presidency did not have potential allies at yesterday's Council. There was strong pressure from Germany and Ireland to initiate a study on the effect of the abolition of duty-free shopping for travellers within the EU, and support also from France, Spain and Greece, yet the Economic Secretary sat on her hands and did nothing.

At least the Economic Secretary was following the Prime Minister's lead. In a written answer to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) yesterday, he put the Government's position clearly. The question was:

"To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 18 December 1997 . . . on duty-free shopping, what estimate he has made of the potential number of job losses that will arise from the ending of the trade in duty-free goods; whether, during the UK presidency, the Commission carried out the proposed survey; and if he will make a statement."

The Prime Minister replied:

"The Department of Transport, Environment and the Regions has undertaken a study into the effect on the transport sector of the abolition of intra-EU duty and tax free sales in 1999. During the UK presidency, the Commission has not undertaken a survey of the potential number of job losses that may arise from the abolition of duty and tax free sales within the EU. The position of the United Kingdom remains that it would not oppose a study should there be a consensus amongst member states in favour of such a study."—[Official Report, 19 May 1998; Vol. 312, c. 315.]

It is noteworthy that the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions has carried out this study, but we have not been made privy to its contents—indeed, the House was not informed of its contents in the debate on 6 May, as it should have been. At the very least, the Chancellor should come to the House and say that a copy of the study will be put in the Library of the House. Furthermore, under their much-vaunted EU presidency, the Government have done nothing to advance a study by the Commission into the effect of the abolition of duty-free sales.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has the gall to shed crocodile tears. The Daily Telegraph today states:

"Gordon Brown, the Chancellor and president of the finance council, surprised many when he voiced regret that his colleagues had not given their backing to its study.

In a belated"—

one can say that—

"public conversion to the cause he said: 'I would have preferred a further study of the successor regime and the effect of abolition. I don't like the decision we have made today.'"

In other words, the Government cannot lead and cannot exert any influence in Europe. The employment of my constituents who work at Heathrow in the duty-free shops and in the airlines, of which there are many, and their counterparts throughout Britain will suffer as a consequence of the Government's inertia and inactivity as they connive at the EU's job loss creation schemes. Fascinatingly, the EU Commission hailed yesterday's decision as a great success—a great success in doing away with people's jobs and in damaging the profitability of British enterprises, and other enterprises within the EU.

We are told, if the article in The Daily Telegraph is right, that the Commission does not believe that the sale of duty-free goods is compatible with the single market. Duty-free sales exist for travellers within the Mercosur countries in South America, the North American Free Trade Agreement countries and the ASEAN countries in south-east Asia. The Commission wants to abolish them because it wishes to do away with fiscal differentiation—in other words, the power of nation states to set their own tax rates. It wants the EU to behave as if it is already a single fiscal entity—in other words, a single state.

The European Commission says that it will now report on aid programmes that might be available to help areas adversely affected by the abolition of duty free. It seems that, at the Commission's behest, our taxpayers, who may in some instances have lost their jobs because of the abolition of duty-free shopping, will now, through their purses—through their EU contributions—have to provide a subsidy, or a subvention, to areas where jobs have been lost because of the abolition.

That is a classic little vignette. It is a perfect example of how Britain is seeing more and more power going to the EU, how our Parliament is impotent, how even unanimity in the House is ignored by the Government, who kowtow to the EU, and how excellent early-day motions, such as that tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond)—early-day motion 1339 on the timing of the abolition of duty-free shopping, which he and I and nine other hon. Members have signed—are ignored. I hope that the Chancellor will come to the House and explain himself.

Mr. Fabian Hamilton (Leeds, North-East): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for allowing me the opportunity to raise an issue of national, regional and local importance; it is certainly of great importance to my constituency. The issue to which I refer is the establishment of a new voluntary-aided high school in Leeds, a Jewish high school, for which many of my constituents have been pressing for a number of years.

The campaign started four years ago, when leading members of the Jewish community, a community which represents the third largest concentration of Jewish people in the United Kingdom, tried to establish, through the local education authority, a Jewish high school.

Previously, Leeds had a Jewish voluntary-aided primary school, Brodetsky primary school, and a Jewish voluntary-aided middle school, Morris Silman middle school. In 1992, the schools in Leeds were reorganised to do away with the middle school tier. At that time, the LEA applied on behalf of the Jewish community to the Secretary of State for Education and Science—then, I believe, Kenneth Clarke—to establish a Jewish voluntary-aided high school. Unfortunately, that application was turned down.

Since then, the community has set up a charitable trust and has struggled hard to establish that school. In my brief tenure of the office of chairman of the education committee, I tried to further that cause by commissioning a study from Leeds university into the viability of such a high school. That report was published after my election to the House and, unfortunately, my successor did not feel that it made a strong case. That view was different from the one taken by the high school's supporters.

Yesterday, I received the Jewish community's high school proposal, which is to be submitted to the Department for Education and Employment because the community wants it to look at its rational case for that school—and it has many strong supporters.

The mission statement in that proposal states:

"The school will:

Teach Jewish pupils the beliefs and practices of the Jewish faith and an understanding of the responsibility for religious and cultural continuity;

Afford the regular opportunity to non-Jewish pupils to worship in their accustomed manner as they choose, and to explore ethics and morality in a wider sense through regular RE lessons;

Instil into all pupils of love of moral behaviour and a genuine respect, rather than a mere tolerance of other religions, races and cultures;

Ensure that our able pupils strive for nothing less than academic excellence, and that our less academically able pupils are given every encouragement to realise their potential and to discover areas of study in which they can develop and grow."

Those are aims to which we would all subscribe.

The school has many strong supporters. The late Councillor Patrick Crotty, Conservative councillor and former chairman of the education committee in Leeds, said that he was "a firm supporter of the right of the Jewish community to educate its children in a Jewish environment."

The office of the Chief Rabbi, of course, supports the establishment of the school and states:

"It is the Chief Rabbi's view that Leeds will prove to be a role model for the community with its educational facilities in general and the Jewish High School in particular."

The Bishop of Ripon, the Right Rev. David Young, writes that in principle, he supports the establishment of a Jewish high school where a good case can be made for it, and continues:

"I would be happy to be involved in negotiations with the LEA"

if that would be of assistance.

The Roman Catholic Bishop of Leeds, the Right Rev. David Konstant, states that "the dual system agreement was a milestone in the history of education provision in this country and established a unique and valuable relationship between public and voluntary bodies."

My hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Mudie) says that he "fully supports the proposal and understands the reasons why it is necessary."

[Mr. Fabian Hamilton]

My worthy predecessor, Sir Keith Joseph—the late Lord Joseph—stated that he could not but applaud the thinking of the proposers and their colleagues. He continued:

"There is strong evidence that Jewish schools with the support of Jewish parents produce firstclass education. The fact that you propose that the school be open to non-Jews removes one of the only possible objections."

I hope that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House will respond to my plea to the Government to support the establishment of such a school, which will not only benefit the Jewish community, but further the provision of high-quality education and academic excellence in Leeds. The survey that Leeds university was commissioned to undertake when I was chairman of the education committee in Leeds found that the vast majority of Jewish parents in Leeds and many non-Jewish parents supported the establishment of the school. Of course there is a question about its effect on other schools in the area, but the survey found that many of the pupils who would come to the school were not in the system already. Some of them attended the independent school, Leeds grammar school; some attended schools outside the local authority area, perhaps King David school in Manchester or schools in Liverpool or Harrogate. The establishment of the school would meet the demands of the Jewish community in Leeds for a religious voluntary-aided school, and would contribute to the attainment of the higher standards for which we are all pressing.

I pay tribute to the proposers, including Victor Zermansky, retired solicitor and prominent member of the Jewish community in Leeds, who has pushed for the school for many years and who compiled the document to which I referred earlier, and Dr. Jonathan Bodansky, consultant physician at Leeds general infirmary and chairman of the charitable trust, who has pushed so hard, together with his colleague, Rabbi Ian Goodhardt. Those three men have worked extremely hard for the establishment of the school.

With the existence of Catholic voluntary-aided high schools and Church of England voluntary-aided high schools, it must be right to allow the establishment of a Jewish voluntary-aided high school in Leeds. That would be only equitable and proper. I hope that my right hon. Friend will pass the message on to the Department for Education and Employment so that such a school can be established before much longer.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): I cannot speak for the Leader of the House, but I can tell the hon. Member for Leeds, North-East (Mr. Hamilton) that he has made a powerful and eloquent plea. He cited among his distinguished supporters the late Lord Joseph, when he was Sir Keith Joseph. I add my voice to those. The hon. Gentleman's plea seems to me to be worthy of support. Let us hope that the right hon. Lady will be able to give him some encouragement when she replies.

The debate has been, as such debates always are, an extremely interesting series of pleas from hon. Members in various parts of the House. In responding, it is difficult to be both courteous and thorough. I shall try to be as thorough as possible, but I shall not deal at length with the speeches of hon. Members who are not in their places. When hon. Members raise subjects in such a debate, expecting a response from the Opposition Front Bench and, much more importantly, from the Leader of the House, it is important that they should be present to listen to what is said.

As was said by the hon. Member for Reading, West (Mr. Salter), who is not present, the Adjournment debate is a useful forum. He expressed the hope that modernisation would not sweep it away, and I echo that hope. I am sorry to have to correct my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson), who seemed to think that there could be a vote. That used to be the case because we could vote on whether the House should adjourn, but we have already approved the Adjournment of the House, and now we are merely having a general debating exercise.

We heard from two Derbyshire Members. From the hon. Member for North–East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) we had a plea for a thorough investigation into the circumstances leading to the leak of sulphuric acid from a tanker, but as he is not present, I shall not deal further with that. The hon. Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) made an interesting speech about the closure of the magistrates court at Swadlincote. I echo his plea for the operation of magistrates courts committees to be reviewed. As one who comes from a constituency that is likely to suffer in a similar way, I believe that that plea should be heeded by Government. I hope that the right hon. Lady will respond to it.

I refer to the hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle), not to deal with his points about the police force as he is not in his place to hear what I have to say, but to endorse what he said about Madam Speaker. She is commemorating today her 25th anniversary as a Member of Parliament. I am sure that I carry the support of every Member of the House in wishing her many happy returns of the day.

The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) appealed for co-ordination. We heard the appeal for the co-ordination of police forces in fighting crime from the hon. Member for Chorley, but the hon. Member for Stafford spoke with commendable brevity and lucidity—the hon. Gentleman is my neighbour and had the great good fortune to inherit part of my constituency at the last election—about the need for the co-ordination of care for a particularly important and vulnerable section of the youth community. I pay tribute to him for his initiative in convening the conference to which he referred. He spoke of the desirability of setting up a Staffordshire forum to assist that group, which seemed a sensible plea that would have my support and, I hope, the support of other hon. Members throughout the county.

My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) has become a regular participant in these debates. He spoke about the scouts, and he always comes prepared—prepared to talk about not one or two subjects, but generally at least three and, today, four subjects. We all hope that the scouts' tea party will be well attended. Opposition Members may listen with sympathy to his criticism of the operation of the Labour-Liberal Democrat pact on Southend council, but that will not carry the support of Labour Members. He also made an important point about the style of this Government.

My hon. Friend has raised in the House before, and need make no apology for raising again, the subject of the signing of ministerial letters. I know that the right hon. Lady, who is a person of impeccable courtesy, will agree when I stress the importance of Ministers signing their own letters. Unless a letter is sent as a matter of real urgency—when we all excuse the pp-ed signature—it should bear the signature of the Minister concerned. Some 90 per cent. of such letters are sent on to constituents who are worried about the topic that they have raised. They like to feel that, at the very least, the letter has passed before the Minister's eyes. It is a travesty of the system if letters come couched in fairly evasive language bearing the pp-ed signature. I hope that we shall see far less of that in the future. There are some Ministers from whom it is as rare to find a signed letter as it is to find an unsigned copy of a novel by Lord Archer.

We all appreciate that Prime Ministers bear heavy responsibilities. The Prime Minister bears many at the moment, and we wish him well in his journey to Northern Ireland today. We hope that the result for which he is campaigning will be achieved and that it will be a decisive majority. The Prime Minister goes to Northern Ireland with our total good will. However, as I have said before, he appears far too rarely in the Chamber.

When I first came to the House in 1970, it was common to see the Prime Minister pop into the Chamber to sit and listen to what was said in debate. That practice continued for many years. It was certainly very common to see all the Prime Minister's predecessors, including my right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), in the Division Lobby two or three times a week. The Prime Minister has voted in fewer than 5 per cent. of the Divisions that have occurred since 1 May last year, and that is frankly not good enough. It is not acceptable, and I hope that the Prime Minister will heed the advice of those of us who wish to see him more often. After all, he is the Prime Minister of this country and he should attend Parliament as often as his other duties permit. I believe that he is not here as often as he should be—especially in the Division Lobby.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) referred to the discrepancy between the Government's rhetoric and their performance. I agree that there has been a significant discrepancy in that area. I would not be as charitable to the Government as the hon. Gentleman was—but he would not expect me to be. I entirely endorse his plea for a fair deal for the countryside. He talked about the pressures on green-field sites and the way in which structure plans seem to pay no regard to sensitive rural surroundings. I hope that the Deputy Prime Minister will use all the powers of his elevated office to ensure that we preserve our green belt. A few months ago, he made the immortal remark that the green belt was a Labour achievement and that it was the Government's intention to build on it. I hope it is the achievement that they intend to build on and that the remarks of the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome will be heeded.

The hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) made a skilful speech—he generally does—about the problems for agriculture caused by the strong pound. It was, in fact, a veiled plea for signing up to economic and monetary union tomorrow—but he would not expect me to go along with that. However, I certainly endorse his comments about the need for the Government to make more provision for farmers. He pointed out with real force and eloquence that existing funds could be made available, and that more could have been done to help the hard-pressed beef farmers in particular. I hope that, in this season of agricultural shows, the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food—I am sorry to hear that he has not visited the west of England show—will devote some concentrated thought to that matter and follow it with proper action to assist the farmers of this country who have had a very difficult couple of years.

The hon. Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard) demonstrated that there is nothing like a constituency interest to concentrate the mind. He talked about the problems faced by the oil and gas industry and made a plea, which any Conservative Member would have been proud to make, for a continuation of sensitive tax treatment. There is more joy in the Chamber over one taxer who decides that he wants to repent than over a thousand who remain wedded to their previous principles. Let us hope that the Chancellor will heed his remarks.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Mr. Clark) made an inimitable—as one would expect—and entirely impromptu speech. My right hon. Friend was stung by his "naming and shaming"—as he put it—by English Heritage. He knows all about that because although he said rather disingenuously that in his diaries, he had never shamed anyone, by Jove, some of those about whom he wrote must have felt a little less than chuffed when they read what he had to say about them.

My right hon. Friend made two extremely important points today which deserve the support of all hon. Members. It is quite unacceptable for unnamed officials to leak pseudo information—or even real information for that matter—of the sort to which he referred. My right hon. Friend told a quite appalling story of how he was quoted as denying something that was never an option as far as he was concerned. He also made a powerful plea for mitigating the burden of value added tax. I have campaigned for that for many years. VAT is particularly iniquitous for those who are charged with the maintenance of our historic churches, for instance. It is not fair that they should bear such a large VAT burden. The Archbishop of Canterbury made a speech last year in which he pointed out that more is paid in VAT on repairs to listed churches than is received in grants. That cannot be right.

Although I have taken the point a little further than did my right hon. Friend, his firm endorsement of the need to preserve our heritage should command our support and respect. I particularly enjoyed his comments about the plastic dome. Would that the building being erected to commemorate the millennium were able to stand the test of the millennium and be around for the next one. Many buildings in this country have stood for a thousand years or more, while I suppose that that trumpery piece of tawdry plastic will hardly last a decade.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) talked about the device of the referendum. In Wales and in London, only 25 per cent. of people endorsed a particular scheme, which does not signify massive popular support. I agree with the call by the hon. Member for Reading, West—who is now in his place—for the registration of nannies. My hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood asked to be informed about the details of the duty free studies, and I warmly associate myself with his remarks. However, if I associate myself with much more, I shall deprive the right hon. Lady of her ration of time. Therefore, I shall leave it at that.

The President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mrs. Ann Taylor): I shall begin on a note with which I hope the whole House will agree. It is 25 years since Madam Speaker came to the House. Some of us were privileged to present her with a birthday cake this morning on behalf of the House, courtesy of my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. Turner) in his capacity as Chairman of the Catering Committee. I am sure that all hon. Members echo the congratulations that we offered to Madam Speaker.

We heard 13 Back-Bench speeches this morning and I have 12 minutes in which to respond to them. I shall be as thorough as I can, but if I miss some points, I shall write to hon. Members. I begin by echoing what has been said about the usefulness of a debate of this kind. To have three hours when Members can raise any subjects that they want is something that the House would wish to guard. I cannot speak for the members of the Modernisation Committee on all aspects of procedure, but I think that we want to preserve opportunities for Members to raise issues in this way.

My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes), who is a regular attender of these debates, raised a serious incident in his constituency, at Killamarsh. Obviously, my hon. Friend has not been able to return to the Chamber. He made important points and he asked me to pass his concerns to my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment, and I shall willingly do so. However, action has already been taken to follow up the incident to which my hon. Friend referred. The relevant authorities—the Environment Agency and the Health and Safety Executive—are looking into the causes of the incident and trying to learn lessons from them.

The hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) is a regular attender on these occasions, as he was in the previous Parliament when he represented Basildon. The hon. Gentleman raised, as the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack) said, four different issues. I shall not deal with them all in great detail, but there is one point, ministerial correspondence, that I wish to take up because the hon. Member for South Staffordshire did so from the Opposition Dispatch Box.

Members will know—I know that the hon. Member for South Staffordshire is well aware of this—that I have been taking up cases on behalf of individual Members. The hon. Gentleman may not have seen the parliamentary answer that I gave on Monday in which I stated that further to my comments in the House on several occasions, and in particular on 12 March, I had written to all my ministerial colleagues about the matter, asking them to take action where necessary. Sir Richard Wilson has written to all permanent secretaries asking them to make sure that replies are of high quality and timely.

It is not always possible for Ministers to sign every letter, as is wished by some Members. I hope that Departments that have had a vastly increased volume of correspondence will be able to take action to ensure that Members receive replies as quickly as possible.

I will not go into all the other points raised by the hon. Member for Southend, West, except to say that his boasting about rail privatisation contrasts with the usual questions that I receive at the Dispatch Box and the recent report on the failings of the rail service since privatisation. I know that those failings are of concern to many hon. Members.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle) talked about the possible reorganisation of the police force. My hon. Friend knows that the Government are committed to maintaining an efficient and effective police service. Of course, we are always willing to consider suggestions for improvement. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will consider any representations that are made to him. I can tell my hon. Friend that at present, there are no plans for a merger along the lines that he is suggesting. I know that my hon. Friend may wish to pursue the matter in other ways.

I think that the hon. Member for South Staffordshire said that the right hon. Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Mr. Clark) was inimitable. I thought that the right hon. Gentleman was entertaining, as ever. He raised two separate points, one being that grades 1 and 2 listed buildings have been deemed to be at risk and, therefore, have been named so that attention can be brought to that fact. There is nothing wrong with making it clear that there are problems in that area. The Government hope that the register that has been published will alert people to the importance of historic buildings.

I know that the right hon. Gentleman does not approve of naming and shaming, but I thought that he took the view that all publicity was good publicity. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman recognises that there is a real problem with these buildings and that more needs to be done to help them. The right hon. Gentleman said that he did not want any financial assistance. However, he then detailed two ways in which he wanted my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give financial assistance for these projects.

Mr. Alan Clark: Not direct grants.

Mrs. Taylor: Not direct grants, but it would be direct financial assistance.

I reject what the right hon. Gentleman said about the Government not being willing to respect our heritage. We have welcomed the list to which I referred because of our respect for our heritage. We need to look to the future and to respect what is good in the past. That applies to changing the House of Commons or respecting buildings.

I take up the important question raised by the right hon. Gentleman about a leak. If there has been a leak along the lines that he outlined and an official has given information to the press in that way—

Mr. Clark: False information.

Mrs. Taylor: If false information or, indeed, any information has been given to the press in that way, the matter will have to be examined. I shall ensure that the relevant Minister is informed of that problem.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) raised the issue of magistrates courts in Derbyshire and the hon. Member for South Staffordshire mentioned his interest in the matter. There has been a great deal of discussion and I think that the Derbyshire magistrates courts committee has sought to keep local people informed. At present, there are no plans to change the structure for consultation. However, if people have ideas, they can be passed to Ministers as well.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) said that the Labour Government had made no difference, but he then gave us support for some of the changes we have made, which he said were wholly beneficial. We welcome the usual Liberal Democrat approach to these issues. We have made significant progress in terms of our commitment to developing on brown-field rather than green-field sites. We are spending more than the Liberal Democrats asked for on education. I shall say more about agriculture when I respond to the comments of the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler).

The hon. Member for North Cornwall said that the strong pound seemed to be the cause of most of the problems in north Cornwall. It is not the case that the Government have not provided help for agriculture; last year, we provided £1.8 billion of support. The hon. Gentleman mentioned that we could have had another £1,000 million from the European Union. He failed to remind us, although he made incidental mention of the fact, that that would have cost the British taxpayer a great deal. The British taxpayer pays 71 per cent. of money that is made available in that way.

I found the comments of the hon. Member for North Cornwall on the pound especially interesting. If he looks back to what his party leader said when the previous Government left the exchange rate mechanism, he will find that the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) said:

"Freedom to devalue is the freedom to suffer inflation, to have lower growth, to decline while others prosper and to boom and bust, just as we have done for the past 40 years."—[Official Report, 24 September 1992; Vol. 212, c. 33.]

It is precisely because we want stability and not a return to that sort of economics that we are making sensible decisions. For the Liberal Democrats now to be the party of devaluation contradicts what the right hon. Member for Yeovil was saying earlier.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) made an interesting speech about children in care and their long-term needs. I think that there would be a great deal of support and admiration for his suggestion about bringing people together at local level to ensure proper co-ordination. These issues, especially the transition to independence, are important. I wish my hon. Friend well with this project. Other Members may wish to follow his example.

My hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard) mentioned a constituency interest with wider implications—the fiscal regime affecting the offshore oil and gas industries. My hon. Friend said that he was not a tax expert, but at times, he sounded like one and I commend him on that. He asked the Treasury to take a wider view, but he acknowledged that it was not a simple issue. I shall ensure that his remarks are passed to my ministerial colleagues. There will be proper consultation before any detailed plans are finalised.

The right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), to whom I always listen with great pleasure, raised the question of referendums. It is a little ironic that he is criticising referendums on the day when the leader of his party is, rightly, in Northern Ireland campaigning for a yes vote. He asked whether referendums were a legitimate or valid process. I am afraid that he will simply have to live with the fact that the House has approved legislation that he does not like, and he will have to live with the consequences.

My hon. Friend the Member for Reading, West (Mr. Salter) discussed the Playpen campaign. The Government are undertaking consultation on future regulation in that area, so it would be wrong if I said anything that might pre-empt that.

The hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) mentioned duty-free goods. I remind him that it was the Conservative Government who, in 1991, signed up to the abolition of duty-free procedures. The hon. Member for South Staffordshire also mentioned that matter—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order.

Cherry Tree Nursery, Wakefield

12.30 pm

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise a series of concerns relating to the operation of the Registered Homes Act 1984 and the Children Act 1989 in respect of the recent registration of Cherry Tree day nursery, which operates in premises that were, until recently, used as a residential care home known as Garden house. The establishment is situated at the junction of Upper York street and Borough road, close to Wakefield city centre.

When the House previously discussed the operation of the 1984 Act and wider issues concerning care provision, I expressed my worries about weaknesses in the legislation in respect of the suitability and fitness of the owner or owners of businesses that are subject to registration. The developments that I shall outline today in respect of the former Garden house establishment and its transformation into the Cherry Tree day nursery, under the same ownership, provide a clear illustration of the need to ensure that the forthcoming proposals for reform of registration and inspection procedures deal clearly with the suitability and fitness of owners as well as managers and staff.

I want to make it clear at the outset that I have no reason whatever to raise questions about the fitness, suitability or competence of those staff working in the Cherry Tree day nursery who had no previous involvement in the running of the former Garden house care home. I hope that when they are aware of the numerous representations that I have received about this matter, they will understand why it has been necessary to bring it to the attention of the House. I emphasise that my prime concern is to illustrate a major weakness in the law that has allowed Mrs. Pauline Webster, the owner of a care home that had caused the local registration authority serious concerns, to register another care enterprise with a different client group and legal framework.

My involvement in the matter began in 1996, when some constituents sought my advice on the placement of their elderly mother. I recall advising them to contact the local Abbeyfield trust, which operates an excellent establishment in Wakefield. I later learned that their mother had, for whatever reason, been admitted to the Garden house residential home. Prompted by its owner, Mrs. Webster, they wrote to me asking for my support in objecting to a planning application to convert a carpet shop adjacent to the home into a nightclub and discotheque. The local authority refused the application in November 1996, but I am advised that Mrs. Webster asked all relatives to keep an eye on planning applications mentioned in the local paper.

The daughter of one of the residents has given me a written statement, which sets out in her terms the subsequent events. Although I have permission to quote verbatim from that statement, and from statements made to me by relatives of other former Garden house residents, I do not intend to reveal their identities during this debate because at least one of them—along with me and the local newspaper, the Wakefield Express—has already received what I can only describe as threatening letters from solicitors acting on behalf of Mrs. Webster. However, I am only too willing to make available to the Minister all the correspondence and evidence that I have received on the matter, which substantiate in detail the serious concerns that I shall express.

The daughter writes:

"One Friday evening in February (1997) on my way back from visiting my mum in Garden House, I picked up the local paper as usual. Whilst having my lunch I was horrified to see Mrs. P. Webster, Day Nursery, same address as residential home in planning."

The lady was understandably deeply concerned that, having only recently settled her mother into Garden house, assuming that it would be for the rest of her days, the establishment was apparently to be converted into a day nursery. She immediately rang Garden house and spoke to Mrs. Webster's niece, Ms Amanda Lodge, with whom she had already conversed earlier that day when nothing had been mentioned. She said:

"She assured me Mum would be fine for at least two or three years, nothing at all to worry about, it's just in case Hanson's (the carpet shop) does become a nightclub or pub, then it would not sell as a residential home. It all sounded fine to me and others too."

On 4 March 1997, the daughter paid £940 advance fees in respect of her mother's care, effective from 6 March. On 18 March, Mrs. Webster rang her to say that the home was closing and her mother had to leave as soon as she could find her an alternative place.

The daughter of another resident wrote that she, too, had sought assurances from Amanda Lodge after the appearance of the planning application for a nursery. Ms Lodge had said that there was no way in which that could happen. In a letter the daughter says:

"I carried on visiting my mother until on 17 March Mrs. Webster rang me at home and asked me to look for somewhere else for my mother within the next fortnight as she was closing. I was absolutely shocked and in my opinion she should have told me earlier if she knew what was happening. I think she just kept everybody there to keep her money coming in."

Another letter that I received states:

"I did not like the way I was given 12 days notice for my mother to find another home. My mother did not want to go into a home in the first place and she had just settled down and then we had to go through all the upset again."

Other letters from relatives of residents make similar statements, some of which refer to disputes with Mrs. Webster over allegations of outstanding fees. In one case, the family concerned had clear evidence of having paid in advance for the care of their relative, but, as she left the home, Mrs. Webster allegedly threatened them in "a very hostile and abusive manner".

One of the relatives said that the family paid the £235 fee only "to stop Mrs. Webster besmirching my mother's or our name".

The family then immediately put the matter in the hands of solicitors.

Another family was owed £470 for overpayment of fees at the time of the closure. I have evidence to show that the cheque that Mrs. Webster issued to them on 20 March for that amount bounced when presented at a building society.

It is now apparent that alterations to turn the home into a day nursery were being undertaken while the elderly residents were living there, unaware that they would shortly be made to leave. The first relative whom I quoted states:

"Sometime at the end of January, beginning of February (1997) work started on Garden House and it got worse. When I asked, it was 'Oh, a leak here and another one there.' It was still going on when my mum moved out and a large fireplace was taken out of my mother's bedroom whilst she and the lady she shared the room with were still using that room and which they had paid for."

Another relative wrote that her mother was moved from her own bedroom to another one as the alterations started before the residents even knew that they were to leave.

Unfortunately, I became aware of those developments only after Garden house was closed and several relatives of former residents complained to me about their treatment. I was especially concerned to receive detailed complaints about the quality of care received at the home, which in some cases became apparent only once the residents had moved elsewhere. For instance, one person had had serious worries about an itchy rash that her mother had had on her body for several months. It caused her to scratch, sometimes until she bled. When she moved to another home, the rash was immediately recognised as scabies, for which she and all the other residents received immediate treatment. I find it astonishing that that condition had been deemed to be a nervous rash during her stay at Garden house. After the concerns of relatives featured in the Wakefield Express in 1997, I received a letter from someone who had worked at Garden house, making detailed allegations of residents being frightened of Mrs. Webster.

After receiving representations from relatives of former residents, I took up their detailed concerns with the chief executive of Wakefield metropolitan district council, the registration authority. I was advised that a range of concerns about Garden house had culminated in the issuing of a section 20 notice in August 1994, to ensure compliance with standards. The registration authority had become aware of the possible change of use in December 1996 through informal inquiries by Mrs. Webster about day nursery registration.

After the environmental health department had been asked in February 1997 to make an advisory visit regarding day nursery proposals, the registration and inspection unit wrote to Mrs. Webster on 18 February 1997, referring to the possible change of use of Garden house. The letter advised:

"In view of the need to ensure that the needs of current users are met, it would be important to ensure good communication between her and the Adult Section of the Registration Unit if she decided to proceed with an application for a change of registration."

During the following month, the unit spoke to Mrs. Webster about the need for careful planning to minimise disruption to residents, and she was asked to forward information about residents for whom the local authority had responsibility. It says that she did not provide the information until it made a follow-up telephone call.

The unit learned of the imminent closure of the home following a telephone call from the contracts section of the community and social services department on 24 March 1997. It visited Garden house that day, and established that a number of residents had been moved and that the home was due to close on 28 March. In his letter to me of 22 May 1997, the chief executive of Wakefield metropolitan district council states:

"Mrs. Webster was not at the home on this visit and had not at any time advised the unit of the home's closure date."

In the same letter, he advised me that, on 25 March, a letter was sent to Mrs. Webster summarising previous correspondence and communication between the unit and her over the closure, advising her that she had again not complied with the requirements of regulation 14 of the Residential Care Homes Regulations 1984 and requesting the immediate return of the certificate of registration.

Mrs. Webster did not reply, so a further letter was sent to her on 15 April 1997. The certificate was returned to the unit through her solicitor on 17 April. The chief executive's letter advised me at the time that a letter was being sent to local authorities in England and Wales recommending that they contact Wakefield metropolitan district council should Mrs. Webster apply to register a residential care home.

On 1 July 1997, a sub-committee of the council's community and social services committee cancelled Mrs. Webster's registration as the person in control of Garden house, and that of Mrs. C. Russell, its registered manager. On 16 December 1997, the sub-committee considered an application by Mrs. Webster and Ms Lodge to be registered to provide full day care at Cherry Tree day nursery, which had the same address as Garden house.

The committee was given legal advice in relation to sections 79(9), 71(10) and 71(11) of the 1989 Act which explain that powers to refuse registration have to be related to the fitness of an applicant to look after children aged under eight. The sub-committee was advised of the concern of officers about the abrupt closure of Garden house and the complaints received about that. It was also advised of the serving of the notice on Mrs. Webster about the breach of regulations under the 1984 Act.

It was recognised, however, that, despite those concerns, the authority was constrained by the legal advice relating to the fitness of the applicant to look after children, as defined in the 1989 Act. In the circumstances, the sub-committee took the view that registration would not be granted until it was provided with specific information about the qualifications and experience of those who would have day-to-day responsibility for the service. That information was considered by the sub-committee on 10 March 1998, and, because of the satisfactory arrangements that had been made for the day-to-day management of the day nursery and on the basis of the available advice, registration was granted.

I have no criticisms of the actions of the local authority in respect of the case. I believe that anomalies in the 1989 Act prevented it from refusing a registration when it had clear grounds for serious concern arising from the running and subsequent closure of Garden house. In a letter to me on 15 May 1998, the director of social services wrote that, under the Act,

"the employment of suitable qualified and experienced staff who will manage the service on a day to day basis in the form of Officer in Charge and Deputy Officer in Charge, is the issue which registering authorities have to decide on with regard to the fitness of an applicant. In this context, the employment of suitable staff with responsibility for managing the service on a day to day basis, effectively places a barrier between Mrs. Webster's role with regard to the closure of Garden House and the extent to which this can be taken into account in the operation of Cherry Tree Day Nursery."

In effect, the 1989 Act became a barrier to proper consideration of information on the actions of two people previously registered under the 1984 Act and involved in the day care of children.

The registration of the Cherry Tree day nursery was reported in the Wakefield Express on 20 March 1998. To its credit, concern over subsequent developments was fully reported, despite threats of a libel action by Mrs. Webster's solicitors over coverage of the closure of Garden house. As a consequence of that further press coverage, I received a fax that same day from Mr. David Crisp of Gough and

[Mr. David Hinchliffe]

Norris Construction, a building company based in Wakefield. I have Mr. Crisp's permission to refer to its contents.

Mr. Crisp advised me that

"Gough and Norris carried out a significant amount of work for Mrs. Webster on improving the car park and the garden/play area at the nursery. To date Mrs. Webster has not paid a penny for the work and clearly has no intention of doing so. Gough and Norris have taken Mrs. Webster to court and I attach the awards made in our favour. Sadly, the courts cannot, it seems, make Mrs. Webster pay and we have to find a way of securing our debt."

He continues:

"We are not the only company that Mrs. Webster employed and we are aware of others who are either owed money or who have had to turn to the courts to secure payment. We are a small company and somewhat naively assumed that Mrs. Webster would honour her agreement when the works had been completed—Mrs. Webster is clearly not an honourable person and has in our opinion openly manipulated the system to avoid paying her debts."

The company enclosed copies of a judgment of Wakefield county court dated 20 January 1998 ordering Mrs. Webster to pay it £3,564.24, and a copy of an application from Mrs. Webster dated 28 January 1998 for the judgment to be set aside because the court's information was sent to Zermansky's solicitors, which she states no longer represents her. That is especially interesting, because the solicitors Zermansky and Partners of Leeds wrote the letter threatening legal action on behalf of Mrs. Webster to the Wakefield Express on 29 September 1997.

On 16 April 1998, the firm also wrote to a woman whom Mrs. Webster believed had written to the Wakefield Express complaining about the way in which Garden house closed. On the same day, it also wrote to me, on behalf of Mrs. Webster, suggesting that I was not aware of what it termed the full facts of the case, of which it was preparing a detailed summary. It promised that summary, for which I asked urgently, more than a month ago; it was faxed to me earlier this week, presumably because this debate was to take place. I have made it available to my hon. Friend the Minister. In my view, it does not in any way address the serious concerns expressed by my constituents.

For a considerable time, I have been under enormous pressure from many of my constituents to bring the matter to Parliament's attention. Since the day nursery's registration, I have had to balance the serious concerns of those affected by the Garden house closure, and of companies such as Gough and Norris, with the interests of staff who work at the nursery, but have no connection with Garden house. I hope that the staff concerned understand that I would have been failing in my duty if I had not acted on the representations received.

I hope that the Minister will assure me that this apparent anomaly in legislation will be addressed and that steps will be taken to deal with other issues that arise from this case. I appreciate that several of these issues relate to the responsibilities of the Department of Health, but, for the record, I should like to make the point that Age Concern in Wakefield was extremely perturbed that, when Garden house was closed, there was a lack of sanctions available to the local authority. It suggests that a local authority should have the ability to take control of a private home in such a situation until suitable new homes have been found for residents—rather like an official receiver takes control of a business.

I add one other point, which is also relevant to the Department of Health's role. At the time of the closure, the local authority was obviously primarily concerned with those residents whose care costs it had met. The other residents were fortunate to have relatives who were able to seek alternative placements, but, if they had been elderly people with no families, I wonder how they would have fared.

I appreciate that much of the debate relates to Department of Health concerns as well as to those of the Minister's Department, but I look forward to her comments on the concerns that I have expressed.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Ms Estelle Morris): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) for bringing this matter to the House. It is clearly an issue of great concern in his constituency, not only to people who have been residents and their families, but to others who may, as he says, find themselves in a similar situation. As he says, the case that he has quoted spans legislation that is covered by both the Department of Health and the Department for Education and Employment. I welcome the opportunity to respond to his concerns and to set out the Government's views on the subject.

There are clearly two issues: the registration of the residential home and the registration of nurseries and child care establishments, which is perhaps of greater importance, given the work that the Government are doing.

I understand my hon. Friend's concern about the history of the Cherry Tree day nursery. He has set out important details relating to the nursery's former existence as a residential care home for the elderly, which was closed at short notice by the owner, causing considerable distress to the residents of the home at the time. As he is aware, such homes are registered under the Registered Homes Act 1984, which is the responsibility of the Department of Health.

I assure my hon. Friend that registration authorities can decide to cancel a home's registration if the home is considered to be seriously in breach of registration conditions. Emergency powers are also available. He will also be aware that there are occasions when, for a variety of personal reasons, a home owner may choose to cease trading and that it is very difficult for the Government or local authorities to intervene in such a decision.

I understand from contacts that my officials have had with Wakefield metropolitan council that the closure of Garden house was at the owner's instigation, and that, at that time, the local authority had no evidence of any impropriety or serious risk to the home's residents to cause it to consider closure itself. However, my hon. Friend paints a disturbing picture of the events surrounding the closure of Garden house and hints at misconduct by the owner. He will agree that local authorities should take action only when clear evidence is put before them and that, in the interests of fairness, it would not be reasonable to do otherwise. However, the general fitness of a person and their ability to care for children should be taken into account when deciding not only on original registration, but on matters that might be brought before local authorities subsequently.

I turn to the process of registration for the Cherry Tree day nursery, as carried out by Wakefield metropolitan council. I understand that, in December 1997, an application was made to the council for registration under the Children Act to provide full day care at Cherry Tree day nursery, at the site of the previous residential home. Primary responsibility for making judgments on those issues rests with the local authority.

In deciding whether to register the nursery, the authority considered carefully the fitness of the people who were applying for registration. I shall return to that matter because I accept that it is at the core of what my hon. Friend has been speaking about. The authority's consideration covers the fitness of the person who seeks registration to care for children, the fitness of anyone likely to be working or living at the premises where care is provided, and the fitness of the premises.

The authority concluded at that time that it had no evidence or other grounds to refuse registration. If such evidence were forthcoming, the authority would have ample scope within the legislation to refuse registration for the nursery. Indeed, if there is concrete evidence or serious concern that any person is not fit to care for young children, the authority has ample powers under the Children Act to cancel registration. It is important to note that it is not only initial registration that ensures use; the authority has powers to cancel that registration as well. If the evidence suggests that any child who uses the service is at risk of serious harm, emergency powers are available for the immediate cancellation of registration. I understand that no such evidence has been brought to the local authority's attention, so it has not felt able to act.

Let me outline what we have done and are doing to help to reassure families and to improve services for children. We know that early years services have evolved considerably over the past few years. As well as an increasing number and variety of providers, there is a strong move towards the integration of early education and day care. Indeed, for all children, particularly the youngest, the two concepts cannot sensibly be separated. Regulating the provision of early education and day care is essential to ensure the safety and welfare of children; to provide additional assurance to parents; and to ensure that public funds are well spent.

It is crucial that any parent who puts their child in any caring establishment that claims to provide care, education or both has the reassurance that their child will be well protected. The system of regulation and inspection for both child care and early years education that we inherited from the previous Government leaves a lot to be desired. As both those sectors have grown in importance, there has been no cohesive action to make sense of the different regulatory and inspection frameworks that operate.

That is why, on 27 March, we issued an important consultation paper on the way forward for inspecting and regulating establishments such as the Cherry Tree day nursery. I reassure my hon. Friend about the five principles on which the consultation paper is based. They are those identified by the better regulation task force: consistency, transparency, proportionality, targeting and accountability.

The paper is out for consultation. Because we do not want to prejudge the issue, it asks a series of questions about what we have identified as the key issues. I reassure my hon. Friend that one of the questions that is specifically raised is what we should do when we consider fit people and premises requirements in relation to the regulations. We look forward to receiving many constructive and thoughtful responses, which will help us to devise a more appropriate regulatory regime. I will take his comments as a response to that consultation, but, given his wide experience in this matter and his clear constituency interest, I hope that he will feel able to respond further and in greater detail to the specific questions that we have asked.

My hon. Friend has raised a crucial issue: the care of those who are often the most vulnerable in our community. They have a right to be protected, and that will happen only if we have a regulatory and inspection framework that enables that inspection to be robust. His debate is timely not only because the Department of Health is reviewing its inspection arrangements for residential homes, but because we are reviewing our regulatory framework for people who look after young children.

I shall consider the questions that my hon. Friend has raised, in particular whether owners are included in the category of fit people. I shall ensure that, in further consultation, we emphasise the need, as my hon. Friend rightly did, to ensure the appropriateness of the owner of an establishment, as well as those who run it. I thank him for bringing the matters to the attention of the House, and I look forward to hearing his further comments as part of our consultation.

School Choice

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham): I am grateful for the opportunity to hold this debate. Its subject is very familiar to the Minister. I do not want to repeat the mantras about the Greenwich judgment; I want to try to update the problem in the light of new developments, particularly the effect of the School Standards and Framework Bill and the requirements for smaller primary classes, which materially affect the issue. I want also to make practical proposals as to how we can make headway on the matter, which I know the Minister has discussed.

I come here in the hopeful expectation that the Minister of State is in a listening mode. I am encouraged by the fact that I wrote to him a few weeks ago on the more specialised subject of the lighting deficiencies of one of my local secondary schools and I was pleasantly surprised to receive a letter from him informing me that the money would be available in the capital budget for the following year. I realise that this is a much wider issue, but none the less, that suggested that I should have some hope and faith in ministerial attention.

The starting point for my remarks is parochial because I want to make initial references to my borough, Richmond. I do not do so in a narrowly parochial way because my points relate to a substantial number of boroughs. Around nine boroughs in London, which is roughly 20 constituencies, and about six in other parts of the country—probably more now that we are changing from county councils to unitary authorities—face the same problem in different ways. Richmond's experience is instructive and, I hope, from the Government's standpoint, positive in several ways.

First, Richmond, perhaps more than any other council, has taken seriously the Government's edict of regarding education, education, education as the main priority in expenditure, so much so that the borough has made painful decisions to give overriding priority to schools. It has taken standards extremely seriously to the extent that in the primary sector, and to a lesser degree in the secondary sector, it is probably pre-eminent in the country. Perhaps most important, the borough ignored all the blandishments of the Conservative era and not a single school opted out of local authority control and became grant-maintained. Parents, teachers and the council maintained faith in the local authority principle, so the authority has many positive features that the Government would find attractive.

The Greenwich judgment problem has affected Richmond in several key respects. We have roughly 10 per cent. of the primary intake from other boroughs and almost 45 per cent. of the secondary intake. That is partly a function of geography. Richmond is a small, elongated borough, and there are probably several natural neighbourhood movements across the border, but the school intake is far in excess of what would be achieved simply as a result of neighbourhood concentration.

What causes strong feeling in the area is the process of migration from low council tax, low service standard boroughs such as Wandsworth into my borough, where council taxes are relatively high, partly as a result of very high expenditure on education. If that were happening in international trade, it would be called an unfair trading practice, but it is a practice that we must accommodate as a result of the way in which the legislation gives the authority no discretion to favour local residents.

That practice is causing specific problems, of which I know the Minister of State is well aware. First, there is a great deal of parental frustration. During the past couple of years, more than 100 parents in the primary sector, which is the least affected, were unable to get their first choice, and most of them appealed. There were many more such cases in the secondary sector.

There is a problem of physical overcrowding. The projections undertaken as part of the council's forward planning exercise show that about seven and a half additional classes at first-form entry will be required to meet additional demand, much of which comes from outside the borough. That figure will increase as a result of the class size reduction planned by the Government.

Apart from those purely statistical problems, there is a deeper political problem that I have sensed during the year in which I have been a Member of Parliament. I have tried to justify to electors on the doorstep an overriding priority for education as an expenditure and a social objective. I often get from residents, particularly older ones with grown-up children, the riposte, "Why are we in this borough spending so much on education? What benefit do we receive from that? We pay high council tax for our schools, but so much of the capacity is used up by people from outside the borough. Why do we bother?" Our commitment to education is being eroded because under the current law, the council is not allowed to give its own residents and council tax payers preference in the allocation of school places.

That is the problem, but there are two new considerations, which I hope will advance the debate a little. The first is the passage of the School Standards and Framework Bill. One of its key features—of which the Minister, as the Bill's architect, is well aware—is that it gives local education authorities responsibilities for school standards and enhances their role. However, it gives them the end without giving them the means to achieve it. A local education authority's additional responsibility should be reflected in greater authority and discretion in admissions policy.

The other development, which quantification suggests will have a significant impact, is the decrease in class sizes as a result of the maximum of 30 in a class that the Government want to introduce. In broad terms, that aim is absolutely right and we have fought and argued for it. It represents considerable progress. Research shows that class sizes, particularly in the primary sector, should be as small as possible, probably much smaller than 30. Therefore, the Government's aim is an admirable advance, and we fully support it. However, it presents practical problems because it will require a considerable increase in the number of classes that have to be accommodated. The early calculations in Richmond suggest that the shortage of classes in 2000 will increase from the present seven and a half to 10. Those classes must be accommodated.

The spirit in which the Government propose to approach that problem is reflected in the draft regulations, which have been put out to consultation. A key phrase in the draft regulations says that "where extra places are needed, they should be created in popular, over-subscribed schools with high standards".

Those are exactly the schools that Richmond has and where the additional pressure will be felt. In our borough, we are extremely conscious that the Government's requirements, which I stress we strongly favour in principle, and the methods to fulfil them suggested in the draft consultation document will greatly accentuate the practical problems of dealing with cross-border migration.

I have a few suggestions as to how we might find a solution. I am well aware that the Minister of State has taken part in several debates with my colleagues on this matter. He has been approached by national associations, the subject has been raised at teachers union conferences and there has been extensive correspondence. I have recently been shown a helpful letter on the subject from the Minister to my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge).

I stress that when we speak of abolishing the Greenwich judgment or changing the law, we are making a modest suggestion. No one who is concerned with the problem seriously expects the Government to introduce primary legislation. Indeed, in the letter to my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond Park, the Minister of State specifically rules out legislative change, and we understand that.

There are probably two ways in which secondary legislation and regulations could be used to deal with many of our problems. First, written into the admission regulations issued after the passage of the new legislation could be the right of local education authorities to consider an authority's boundaries as a legitimate criterion in admissions policy. I imagine that the Government might well respond to that proposal by saying that allowing such a criterion could be open to abuse, and by saying, "We might have a leafy shire borough trying to exclude all the yobs from across the boundary. We must not allow that to happen."

I envisage that such abuse could be avoided by building into the legislation a proviso that the local education authority's policy must in the final analysis provide for an appeal to the Secretary of State, who would have overriding powers to ensure that the more flexible admissions approach was not abused. However, with that proviso, the local education authority should be recognised as having a status in consideration of preference—so that, when pupils are competing for a place, a pupil's origination in the tax-paying authority should be regarded as a legitimate basis of preference.

We are therefore talking about overturning the Greenwich judgment not in any very grand way, but simply by allowing authorities where the judgment is a problem to take local residents into consideration in their admissions policy. That would be one way of dealing with the problem.

Another way of dealing with the problem, within broadly the same framework, would be the independent appeals system, admirably introduced by the new legislation, with a higher authority to that appeals system. If the appeals system had incorporated within it the provision that appropriate weight should be given to someone's residence in the tax-paying authority in considering an appeal against rejection of an application for a school place, it would go some of the way in meeting our concerns.

Therefore, many of the concerns of my borough and of boroughs like it could be met appropriately through admissions regulations, appeal regulations or a combination of the two.

I suspect that the other way of dealing with the problem—through financial flows—is probably less palatable to the Government, although it certainly follows from the logic of a free-for-all, if that is what the Government wish to allow to continue. In the past few years, under the standard spending assessment system, money has effectively followed pupils, as the Minister knows. However, the system does not take into account capital costs.

One of the mounting problems that I have already described—overcrowding of schools, aggravated by the Greenwich judgment, and combined with the smaller class requirement—will create major demands for capital funding for our local authority. If the Government cannot find any way of changing the regulations, they will have to make available substantial additional capital funding to enable all those children to be adequately provided for within the framework of local authorities' obligations. I appeal to them to do so, although I suspect that that option would be more expensive and perhaps less efficient for the Government. Nevertheless, it is the other way of dealing with the matter.

I ask the Minister to try to help us to move the debate forward, because we have a genuine problem. Although we realise that the problem does not affect the whole country, it affects authorities that attach a high value to education and—in the case of Richmond—a very high value to staying within the maintained sector. Although my constituents wish to comply with the Government's expectations of higher standards, they strongly believe that—ultimately, as a matter of principle—if one pays one's council tax to the local council to improve education services, one should have preferential access to its schools. It is a simple principle, and I hope that we shall be able to find a way of recognising it.

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) and the Minister of State for allowing me to put in my five penn'orth. As my hon. Friend knows, we share the borough of Richmond upon Thames, and my constituency also spans the borough of Kingston upon Thames, which has a similar problem with the Greenwich judgment.

The problem in Richmond upon Thames is—judging by my postbag—mainly in the secondary sector, as all but one of our secondary schools are on the borough's borders. Consequently, 45 per cent. of children in secondary schools in Richmond upon Thames are not Richmond children but from other boroughs, which, as my hon. Friend explained, has caused much ill-feeling among the borough's residents.

If the borough had the money or could find a site to do so, we could move all those schools and plonk them in the centre of the borough. Although doing so would solve the problem, it is not possible.

We could expand our schools, although doing so would be against the wishes of parents and governors, who think that the schools are already large enough. Moreover, if we expanded the schools, more children from out of the borough would come in, as they would still be on the borders, and we would still run the schools nearest to many children in other boroughs.

I have sympathy for parents who are near the borders of a borough with excellent schools. It must be very difficult to live a mile away from a suburban school run by the borough of Richmond upon Thames, and to be struggling to ensure that one's child receives a good education, when one's own borough is not providing the same education. Nevertheless, we shall have to deal with the problem in the ways suggested by my hon. Friend.

The Greenwich judgment has created an acute problem for some London boroughs, particularly Richmond, and I urge the Minister to consider possible solutions. Within the borough, we have tried everything that we can possibly do. I myself have been a councillor in the borough and have struggled with the problem. Although we have tried, we simply do not know what to do, to be fair to our own children.

I wonder whether the Minister—who very kindly and courteously replied to correspondence from me—or his civil servants could come to the borough to hold discussions with our officers and staff, to try to reach some sort of solution to a terrible problem.

1.15 pm

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. Stephen Byers): I congratulate the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) on securing this debate on the consequences of the Greenwich judgment, and particularly on the reasonable way in which he addressed the issues. We are always pleased to have solutions proposed to problems as they arise, and I hope that we are a Government who are prepared to consider sensible propositions, from whichever political party they may originate. We want to put children's interests first.

I am pleased also that the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) has been able to speak in the debate. We have corresponded on the issue, and—both since she was elected to the House, and for a few years before that, as a locally elected council member—she has shown concern for her constituents, and about the way in which they are affected by the Greenwich judgment.

It might be worth outlining the exact consequences of the Greenwich judgment, as there has been a good deal of confusion about the judgment's meaning in practice. Sometimes, there is a tendency to blame all the difficulties of an admissions procedure on the Greenwich judgment and its consequences.

The judgment was largely a result of the abolition of the Inner London education authority. Many London boroughs were within the ILEA, but they did not have responsibility for education. On the ILEA's abolition, the individual boroughs themselves became local education authorities, which caused some difficulty.

The abolition certainly caused problems in Greenwich and Lewisham. As the two boroughs were within the ILEA, over the years, many children residing in Lewisham went to schools in Greenwich, and many children in Greenwich went to schools in Lewisham. There was much free trade, as there was no local education authority.

On abolition of the ILEA, with education responsibilities being passed down to individual inner London boroughs, the two boroughs themselves became local education authorities. Greenwich decided that it wanted to give overriding priority to children whose parents resided within the Greenwich area, and to establish a boundary based on local authority areas.

In 1989, the Court of Appeal had to decide whether Greenwich's decision should be binding. The decision was that priority should not be given to an applicant solely because he or she resided in a local education authority area. However, the judgment does not mean that schools have to expand to admit out-of-LEA-area applicants. They can simply admit up to their published admissions limit and then refuse applications. Therefore, an admissions authority has the power to cap the number of pupils who may come to a school.

When a school is over-subscribed, the duty to comply with a parent's choice is disapplied and is no longer a priority. Instead, admissions authorities have to use any reasonable criteria to allocate places among applicants. If an admissions authority so wishes, it can give priority to those living closest to a school. That is clearly the case.

There is some confusion on the matter. The Greenwich judgment does not deny local parents a choice of school. It lays down that an admissions authority cannot give priority simply because an applicant resides within an LEA area. It is a question not of locality or proximity, but of an administrative area—the local education authority—which cannot be regarded as giving priority to a particular applicant.

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough): Do not the Minister's comments fly in the face of the Rotherham judgment—the other judgment that must be considered—which gave a different primacy in admissions policy?

Mr. Byers: I am not sure that the Rotherham judgment does that. It concerns the expression of an order of preference by individual parents and is not related to where the parent may reside, so the two issues are quite different. The Rotherham judgment will cause a number of problems in certain local education authorities because of the way in which they have traditionally operated their admissions arrangements, but it is sensible to consider that judgment as a separate set of problems, to which we look forward to solutions being offered, as opposed to the problems created by the Greenwich judgment, which are different. The Greenwich judgment still allows proximity to be an issue—a reasonable criterion to be applied—but does not restrict it to residents within a particular LEA area.

We have been considering the implications of the Greenwich judgment in the light of the School Standards and Framework Bill and, in particular, the code of practice on admissions that we shall have to publish as a result of the provisions in the Bill. I am sure that we shall reflect upon some of the comments made by the hon. Member for Twickenham when we draw up the code of practice, which we expect to be able to publish some time early next year. There will be a full debate in the House on the details of the code, because it is subject to agreement by both this House and the House of Lords.

In the interim, guidance will be issued on admissions for September 1999. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State hopes to issue that guidance within the next four to six weeks. Once again, it will be for consultation and will provide another opportunity for hon. Members who are concerned about the impact of the Greenwich judgment to make representations.

The Government's priority on school admissions, which will be reflected in the interim guidance, is to enable local education authorities and schools to meet the preferences of as many parents as is realistically possible, regardless of where the parents happen to live. We have listened carefully to representations on what we can put in the Bill, but we are not convinced of the need to reverse the Greenwich judgment. Indeed, the White Paper, "Excellence in Schools", which we issued last July, referred explicitly to admissions and did not reveal a national ground swell of opinion for changing the impact of that judgment. In many areas, it has opened up opportunities for many parents.

Local education authority planning should support parental preference. Patterns of cross-border movement have become well established, some even predating the Greenwich judgment itself. LEAs should be able to plan school places around those admissions patterns. That does not mean that there should not be proper cross-border co-operation. Our proposed new framework for school admissions will require consultation and the agreement of admissions authorities throughout LEA areas.

I recognise that some parents feel strongly about the effect of the judgment. We heard this morning from the hon. Members for Twickenham and for Richmond Park, who represent Richmond, about the problems and the way in which parents feel the Greenwich judgment is affecting their choice. However, many parents have welcomed the removal of what they saw as an artificial restriction on their choice. On balance, it is preferable to have an open system in which all school applications are considered on an equal basis, rather than one that depends critically on residence within a particular local authority area. To put it bluntly, local authority boundaries should not be given preference over the interests of parents and their children. Under our proposals, those interests will be put first.

By removing a purely administrative criterion, the Greenwich judgment has opened up opportunities for parents and children. For example, it removes a barrier to children going to more distant schools that perhaps have a specialism and could best meet the educational needs of that youngster. Most significantly, in some cases it means that children can go to more local schools, which just happen to be over the road in another LEA area. We must recognise that many schools are situated close to LEA borders. In such situations, it cannot be right for children to be refused a place at their local school simply because they live on the wrong side of a line drawn for purely administrative purposes.

Cross-border movement works both ways. Local education authorities import and export. Bringing down an iron curtain, as a return to the situation before Greenwich would do, would disfranchise hundreds of parents in many local authority areas. However, the status quo is not good enough. There has to be change because of the flaws in the present system, which have been identified and about which we heard most recently from the hon. Members for Twickenham and for Richmond Park.

The School Standards and Framework Bill provides the opportunity to overcome many of the difficulties at present being experienced. We shall give an additional responsibility to individual LEAs to plan the places in their locality, devolving power to local levels so that they can more readily respond to the needs of local people, and parents in particular. The proposals in the Bill will overcome many of the difficulties that exist at present.

The hon. Member for Twickenham referred to funding. Many of us have real concerns—we can hear parents or perhaps grandparents on the doorstep, asking, "Why am I paying more in my council tax bills when we are providing education for children across the border in authorities with lower bills?" That is an important point and one that we should not ignore. It would not be right to go back to the days of mandatory recoupment, when there was a paperchase and local authorities invested literally thousands of pounds to chase up and identify where a child had gone for his or her education. That would not be an efficient use of public money.

It is best to deal with the problem through the standard spending assessment system. We are in the middle of a wide-ranging review of education SSAs. Most of us recognise that the present system is flawed and needs to change generally. If LEAs feel that particular difficulties are being caused by the Greenwich judgment and have specific proposals for changing the education SSA formula in some way, I should be happy to consider such suggestions alongside the other options for change that we are considering.

The Government are acutely aware of the concerns of hon. Members, parents and LEAs about the Greenwich judgment. It is important that the judgment is not used as a ready-made excuse for all the difficulties that may be thrown up during an admissions round. The challenge that the Government face is to provide for parental preference with a fair, open and transparent admissions framework. In our view, the School Standards and Framework Bill will do that. Perhaps most important, it will allow us to raise standards in schools across the country, so that all parents will have access to a school that meets their needs for a high-quality education, thereby offering their children the best possible start in life.

Health and Safety Representatives

1.29 pm

Mr. Ian Stewart (Eccles): First, I must declare an interest as a lifelong trade unionist—in my previous job as the north-west regional official of the Transport and General Workers Union, health and safety ranked as my greatest interest alongside job security.

Twenty-four years ago, the Labour Government enacted the most important piece of health and safety law—the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974. For the first time, all those who worked for a living, with the notable exception of domestic servants—to this day, I cannot understand why they were excluded—were covered by health and safety law. It is timely, under the new Labour Government, briefly to review the success and limitations of that Act.

At first glance, the Act seems to have been a success. In 1974, there were 479 workplace deaths, 161 of which were in construction. By 1996–97, the figure had fallen to 302, 98 of which were in construction. However, that figure represented a rise in workplace deaths from the previous year, when there were 258 deaths, of which 82 were in construction. In agriculture, the death rate has increased by 40 per cent.—from 45 in 1995–96 to 63, eight of which were children. That means that there is more than one death a week.

The director general of the Health and Safety Executive called the recent rise a tragic blip. That sounds like the less-than-sensitive defence of an administrator with too few resources for the job. We do not know how the families and friends of those who died feel, but we know from many HSE studies over the past 20 years that most of the deaths were preventable, which means that they were not true accidents—they were not unforeseen events. The HSE studies also show that, in about 70 per cent. of those cases, positive management action could have prevented the deaths. The relatives and friends of those killed could quite properly have asked the HSE why the deaths were not prevented.

In addition to those largely preventable deaths, 50,000 major injuries were reported to the HSE in 1996–97. When the HSE annual report for 1996–97 was launched in November 1997, the Institute of Employment Rights released figures showing that, of the 50,000 major injuries, only 2,158—4 per cent.—were investigated. However, in 1995–96, 12 per cent. of cases were investigated, and, in 1994–95, 15 per cent. of cases were investigated.

As a more specific illustration, in 1996–97, only six of the 100 blindings—6 per cent.—were investigated. Again, in 1995–96, 26 per cent. of such cases were investigated, and, in 1994–95, 35 per cent. of them were investigated. In 1996–97, only 297 of the 1,158 amputations—25 per cent.—were investigated, whereas, in 1995–96, 42 per cent. of amputations were investigated and, in 1994–95, the figure was 48 per cent.

Although the number of investigations in 1994–95 was nothing to cheer about, the decline in investigations in recent years is alarming. The figures for deaths and serious accidents are bad enough, but the figures on workplace ill health are also worrying. A few weeks ago, the HSE released the results of the 1995 household survey on work-related illness. More than 2 million people—one in 10 of the working population—felt that their health had been damaged or made worse by their work. The major problems of self-reported workplace ill health were backache and repetitive strain injury, stress, chest disease, deafness and tinnitus, skin disease, headache or eye strain, and vibration white finger.

The HSE has admitted that about 20,000 people die from work-related illness each year. Asbestos disease alone—mainly cancer—still kills at least 3,500 people each year, which is more than are killed on the roads. However, the number of road deaths is falling, whereas, according to HSE-funded research carried out by Professor Julian Peto, asbestos deaths will increase for the next 30 years in the United Kingdom—from 5,000 per year now to 10,000 per year in 2025.

Asbestos was first described as an evil dust 100 years ago in the 1898 report to Parliament of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Factories. Members of Parliament know something about asbestos, as, in 1978, most of the asbestos in Parliament was removed in a major operation. The new Labour Government promised an asbestos ban in a debate in the House in June 1997, soon after they were elected—we have yet to deliver on that promise. Ten other European countries—including France as recently as 1996—have banned asbestos. Are we to be the last after Greece?

A major reason for the failure to prevent workplace deaths, illnesses and ill health has been the low prosecution rate, and the pathetic fines for breaking the criminal law on health and safety. In 1996–97, the HSE secured 1,052 convictions, whereas, in 1995–96, it secured 1,451—a fall of almost a third. The average fine for those serious offences—the HSE prosecutes only in serious offences—was £5,421. If the seven largest fines of between £100,000 and £500,000 are subtracted, the average falls to only £3,266.

Alan Dalton, the health and safety co-ordinator of the Transport and General Workers Union, which represents some 25,000 farm workers, had to pay the HSE £75 to find out that the HSE brought prosecutions in only two of the 63 farm deaths last year, and that the average fine in those two cases was only £2,500. Surely farmers will not take seriously their responsibility for work-related deaths if the sanctions are so pathetic. I do not think that £3,000 will deter any employer, however small, from breaking the health and safety law.

I know that, in the June 1997 debate that I mentioned, the Minister responsible for health and safety, my hon. Friend the Member for Wallasey (Angela Eagle), expressed concern about the low fines for health and safety offences. Moreover, the Lord Chancellor has urged magistrates to deal with breaches of health and safety law more seriously. He recently told the Magistrates Association that people injured as a result of health and safety offences were victims no less than if they had been assaulted. He called on magistrates to fine more heavily.

What can be done to make the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 more effective in preventing workplace deaths, ill health and disease? The HSE was subject to deregulation, constant attack and seven demoralising reorganisations by the previous Government, and it needs more support and funding, as soon as economically possible. That will allow more inspections and prosecutions to take place.

It cannot be right or safe that each of the 750 companies licensed to remove asbestos received on average less than one site visit from an HSE inspector in the whole of 1995; but an increase in health and safety inspectors, more and larger fines and more imprisonments, although welcome, will not be enough on their own. A health and safety inspector from the HSE cannot be in a workplace week in and week out.

The answer lies with more employee participation and awareness about health and safety, and, crucially, the role of trade union safety representatives. Even with whistleblower protection rights, many part-time employees on short-term contracts in small workplaces, who are getting older or who are simply too frightened of losing their jobs, will not complain to their employer or to the HSE about hazardous workplaces.

For that and other reasons, the previous Labour Government introduced the ground-breaking Safety Representatives and Safety Committees Regulations 1977, providing for the appointment of trade union safety reps where trade unions are recognised by the employer for negotiating on other matters such as wages, sick pay, holidays, pensions and discipline.

Trade union safety reps have the legal right to workplace inspection at least four times a year; to inspection after accidents or ill health; to set up joint management and union safety committees; to see health and safety information; to independent training; and to paid time off to exercise those rights. Those are rights, not duties. Health and safety reps monitor employers' actions; they do not substitute for them.

There are now about 200,000 trade union safety reps throughout public and private industry and services in the United Kingdom: an excellent achievement in itself. The HSE under the previous Government cited 1995 research by Reilly, Paci and Holl that showed that trade union safety reps could reduce injury rates in industry by a third.

After 20 years, the safety reps regulations are clearly due for review. The trade unions report problems with getting time off to carry out their duties—especially in the public sector, where little staff cover is available—and with gaining information and getting employers to act on risk assessment.

The Transport and General Workers Union has called for safety reps' rights to be extended from only health and safety to environmental issues, which are a growing area of concern for both unions and management. There is an even bigger, and growing, problem with trade union safety reps: they can exist only where the employer recognises the union, but, by 1993, 10.7 million of the 21.3 million employees in this country worked in units where trade unions were not recognised for collective bargaining, so 50 per cent. of the work force do not have the right to representation by trade union safety reps.

It can be no accident, if hon. Members will excuse the pun, that workplaces with the highest rates of death, injury and illness—agriculture, construction and small and medium enterprises—are those in which trade union recognition is lowest, or even, as in agriculture, non-existent.

Even with the proposed new guidance on union recognition, it is clear that the growth area of the economy—the smaller workplaces, where most people work—will be excluded from the requirements. One answer is the concept of the roving safety rep. Since 1974, roving safety reps have been working successfully in Sweden, where about 1,500 of them represent 700,000 employees in 170,000 workplaces. The reps are not employees of the workplaces they inspect and provide advice for, but the trade union employing them must have at least one member in the company or workplace that they intend to visit.

In 1995, Swedish roving safety reps undertook 65,000 workplace visits—on average, each rep was responsible for 250 workplaces—and Swedish employers paid £5.5 million, or two thirds of the cost of the scheme, with the unions paying the other third. The cost to a workplace of each rep was about £50, with a site visit costing about £140.

In 1996–97, the agricultural section of the TGWU, with the help of a European Union grant, piloted a UK roving safety reps scheme in agriculture, based on the Swedish model, and 10 T and G agricultural safety reps were trained. In 1997, the HSE funded an independent evaluation of the scheme by Dr. David Walters of South Bank university, who found that the scheme had some success but lacked two vital factors: the right of access to farms, and adequate funding for training, time off and support to the roving reps.

There was total employer hostility to the project, from the National Farmers Union, despite the 40 per cent. rise in farm deaths. In February 1996, in a debate on agriculture, health and safety in another place, the Conservative agriculture spokesman, Lord Lucas, said:

"The noble Baroness, Lady Turner, mentioned the TGWU roving safety representative scheme. That has had active HSE support from the start and will continue to have it. It is an excellent example of what unions can do and something of which the unions should be thoroughly proud."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 6 February 1996; Vol. 569, c. 194.]

In January 1998, T and G representatives met the Minister responsible, my hon. Friend the Member for Wallasey, to ask for the roving safety representatives scheme to be formally recognised. They pointed out that the principle of roving safety reps already exists in regulation 8 of the Safety Representatives and Safety Committees Regulations 1977, concerning cases in which representatives need not be employees. That allows for the appointment of non-employee safety reps by the actors' union, British Equity, and by the Musicians Union.

The most recent major law on safety was introduced by the Labour Government in 1974. Although the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act is still fundamentally sound, it awaits effective enforcement by means of fines and imprisonment to match the crime of workplace death, serious injury and ill health. More workplace inspectors and inspections are required, but the real advances will be made by the involvement of all working people collectively in improving their own workplace environment, which is an aim of our Government.

Some improvements are still required in the rights of traditional union safety representatives, who exist only where trade unions are recognised by the employer. They need time off and rights on environmental questions. The concept of roving safety representatives is vital for the half of the work force for which there is no trade union recognition. That is the growth area of the economy, and more accidents, injuries and ill health occur in it, especially in agriculture, construction and small and medium enterprises.

[Mr. Ian Stewart]

The rapid implementation in the UK and the rest of Europe of a scheme such as the T and G's pilot based on the Swedish model would do as much to raise awareness and reduce death, injury and ill health in the workplace as the 1974 Act has done. It would be a lasting memorial to the many thousands of people needlessly killed at work in the UK during the past 20 years. It would be wonderful if the new Labour Government could save lives and give safer working environments to the working people of the United Kingdom.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Ms Glenda Jackson): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Mr. Stewart) on raising a debate whose importance was underlined by his chilling litany of statistics. My right hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment will tomorrow launch important new guidance supporting the offshore version of the Safety Representatives and Safety Committees Regulations, so my hon. Friend's debate is fortuitously timed.

Employees and the public have a fundamental right to acceptable standards of health and safety protection. A healthy, well-protected work force is not only right, but good for business and society. The Government are determined to give health and safety at work a much higher profile than it had during 18 long years under our predecessors. We have demonstrated our commitment by providing new resources for the Health and Safety Commission and its executive. An extra £4.5 million has been allocated in this financial year to be spent on increasing the number of HSE inspectors, and therefore their enforcement activity. I know that my hon. Friend will welcome that.

My hon. Friend touched on asbestos, and I want to make it clear that our resolve to ban white asbestos remains unshakeable. We are pressing the European Union to agree a ban quickly through an amendment to the marketing and use directive. We are also contributing to understanding the science surrounding asbestos, so that we can be sure that its substitutes are safer. I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree that that is an important step.

We have freed inspectors from bureaucracy imposed by the previous Government to enable them to concentrate on their primary role of enforcing health and safety law. The cumbersome "minded to" procedure in enforcement practice was dropped on 1 April, and inspectors can now enforce the law as soon as they encounter a breach, instead of having first to put offenders on notice that that might happen later. My hon. Friend will agree that that is a step towards the higher standards that we all want.

We are particularly concerned to get the message across to employers that accidents at work and occupational ill health are neither inevitable nor acceptable. A strengthened HSE is only part of our approach, and we are doing more to prompt higher standards. Breaches of health and safety law should carry tougher penalties, as my hon. Friend said. He rightly pointed out that fines for health and safety offences currently average about £2,500, and fines are often derisory, seeming not to reflect the seriousness of offences. We have begun discussions with the Lord Chancellor and the Home Secretary on the options available to address that problem. We want penalties to fit the crime, and to act as a deterrent to health and safety law breakers.

We need to create a culture that includes all those with an interest in reducing the toll of accidents and ill health. An approach based on partnership between employers and workers is in everyone's interest. We have seen such an approach at the European level, in our work with the Advisory Committee on Safety, Hygiene and Health Protection at Work, and at national level in the Health and Safety Commission. It can also work at company level.

If records for accidents and occupational ill health are to improve, employers need to manage health and safety effectively. To do that, they must involve their work force. A management system can succeed only if there is consultation with employees. No less than 25 years ago, the Robens committee, whose work led to the setting up of our present occupational health and safety system, identified involvement of the work force as a key factor in better self-regulation by industry. In spite of that, there has been less development and success on worker involvement than on many other aspects of the UK health and safety system.

Safety representatives have a vital role, as my hon. Friend said. Their commitment, and their experience of workplace conditions, enable them to identify potential problems where prompt action could lead to a healthier and safer workplace. It is, after all, those who do a job who know best what the hazards are. Employees, through their safety representatives, have an invaluable part to play in reducing risks in the workplace.

Safety representatives are important to the explanation of safety measures, and to securing a commitment from the work force. Safety procedures are effective only if those involved understand the reason for them; if not, procedures may all too often and all too easily be bypassed. Research carried out a few years ago, using data from the workplace industrial relations survey, showed that workplaces with trade union-appointed safety representatives and committees have up to 50 per cent. fewer injuries than those in which there was no consultation on health and safety.

In recent years, the role of safety representatives has been greatly undervalued, and we intend to redress that. My right hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment will hold regular meetings with safety representatives, which illustrates the value we place on their experience and views. As my hon. Friend pointed out, trade unions can offer safety representatives considerable support, such as training courses, information about workplace hazards and safety systems, and in some cases a national structure able to give advice on particular issues. That helps representatives to take an informed, independent role in health and safety issues. I hope that trade unions will appoint safety representatives wherever possible.

The regulations that give trade unions the right to appoint safety representatives are more than 20 years old. Over the past 20 years, the UK has moved away from being predominantly based in manufacturing and construction industries with highly unionised work forces; the service sector now provides 70 per cent. of employment, and workers, especially outside the public sector, are less unionised. Often, they work part time or are self-employed.

Employers who do not recognise trade unions must by law consult employees on health and safety, directly or through elected representatives. The regulations that introduced that requirement have been in force for less than two years, and it is not yet clear how well they are working. Aspects may need to be reviewed, and the Health and Safety Executive plans to commission research this year to examine awareness of the 1996 regulations and their impact.

My right hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment will launch new revised guidance tomorrow in support of the Offshore Installations (Safety Representatives and Safety Committees) Regulations 1989. That guidance was developed following research by Aberdeen university into the working of the regulations. The study confirmed that the regulations were working well, and that problem areas would be best addressed by strengthened guidance. Revised guidance will play an important part in ensuring that safety representatives offshore are able to fulfil their vital role effectively.

In too many workplaces, employers no longer recognise trade unions. The Government seek to create a fresh approach to industrial relations based on partnership rather than conflict, and that will benefit employees as well as improving competitive performance. We will soon publish a White Paper on fairness at work, containing a framework for a new era of employment relations based on decent standards and partnership.

Arrangements for health and safety consultation must be reviewed. The justification for variations in the law on consultation, such as differences in functions of union and non-union safety representatives, will need to be examined. The review will also consider ways to enhance the role of safety representatives, and whether steps can be taken to improve the effectiveness of consultation. I expect the Health and Safety Commission to carry out that work. My hon. Friend raised a number of interesting ideas, and I will ensure that they are considered in the review.

The review will need to cover roving safety representatives, a point forcibly made by my hon. Friend. I know that the Transport and General Workers Union recently carried out a pilot scheme on roving representatives in agriculture, and the lessons of that will help the review. Industry initiatives supported by employers and employees can help to improve health and safety standards. The practical implications of any proposed change to the law need to be carefully considered, however, and we intend to do that.

It is important that safety representatives should be given appropriate support by enforcing authorities. The HSE will take several initiatives to promote employee involvement, particularly relating to the role of safety representatives. The HSE's guidance to its inspectors on contacting employees or representatives has recently been revised—

Oral Answers to Questions

WALES

The Secretary of State was asked—

Llanelli/Dinefwr NHS Trust

1. Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): How many representations he has received to date about his proposal to abolish Llanelli/Dinefwr NHS trust. [41413]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Win Griffiths): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have received almost 2,500 pre-printed letters on this subject, as well as several petitions containing approximately 12,000 signatures. We have also held meetings to discuss the matter with hon. Members and others.

Mr. Davies: There has been much talk of consultation on the proposals. How does my hon. Friend propose to consult the citizens of Llanelli, who use the trust's services, and are satisfied with them? Perhaps we may look forward to a focus group or two—or a citizens jury, even—or perhaps we may have a one citizen, one vote referendum in Llanelli. Or is the reality that all this chatter about consultation is a charade and that the Welsh Office is determined to drive through the proposal without any regard for the views of my constituents?

Mr. Griffiths: My right hon. Friend will know that I went to Llanelli to discuss the proposals when they were still at the gestation stage. The project team is currently holding meetings throughout the area to consult people on the development of the final proposal. As a consequence of the trust reconfiguration, I expect the accident and emergency services at Prince Philip hospital to be strengthened, and the MRI scanner there to be used more effectively and efficiently. At some stage in the consultation process, I shall be happy—in addition to all the other things that we do through our representative democracy—to visit Llanelli and see whether the proposals to improve the service have people's support.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): My hon. Friend will be aware of the extreme disquiet in the northern part of the Bro Taf area about the proposals. I thank him for meeting me and others on a number of occasions. At one of those meetings, he promised that he would let those who were critical know the composition of the group that will be set up to examine the changes. Until now, we have heard nothing. We do not know who is involved. The nurses and other people involved at that level of operation have heard nothing about the proposals that are coming forward.

Mr. Griffiths: I shall ensure that my hon. Friend and others, and certainly staff in the health service, are well aware of the work of the project team. Staff should already be well aware of it. The team's job is to make proposals which can show that the reconfiguration will benefit people living in the area.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Does the Minister agree that hardly anybody is in favour of the abolition of the trust? There have been more visits by the Lord Chancellor to B and Q than there have been sightings of people in favour of the abolition of the Llanelli/Dinefwr hospital trust.

Is it not time that the Minister started to concentrate on the health of the people of Wales? We had to wait almost four months longer for publication of the health Green Paper than did England and Scotland. Tomorrow, we expect to learn that waiting lists have increased in Wales, as they have in the rest of the United Kingdom. Would it not have been far better to divert the £686,000 wasted on the publication of the devolution proposals in Wales and the £300,000 set aside for publicising the Welsh assembly when it is established next year to front-line services to help the people of Wales to get a better health service?

Mr. Griffiths: For a start, I have visited Llanelli far more times than any Lord Chancellor has ever visited B and Q; that was about the level of the hon. Gentleman's whole question.

We have already put £9.5 million into the health service to deal with winter emergencies, which was very successful. We have another £25 million, most of which is to go towards reducing waiting lists so that, by this time next year, they will be at the very least back to the level at which they stood when we entered office, and as part of a programme to continue to reduce them. Our public health Green Paper was produced absolutely on schedule—as I promised the hon. Gentleman it would be—and was generally welcomed in Wales. The reconfiguration of trusts will produce savings to the tune of £10 million, which will be spent on patient care, so that patients in Llanelli and elsewhere in Wales will receive a far better health service.

Aerospace Industry

2. Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): If he will make a statement on the prospects for the aerospace industry in Wales. [41414]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Ron Davies): Earlier this year, the Government demonstrated their support for the aerospace industry with the grant of launch aid to British Aerospace. That public-private partnership will secure more than 2,000 jobs throughout the United Kingdom and will provide a significant boost to British Aerospace at Broughton in my hon. Friend's constituency. I am therefore confident that prospects for the industry are extremely good.

Mr. Jones: I thank my right hon. Friend, his Department and his Ministers for the support that they have given to the industry in my constituency. Does he agree that the £123 million given by the Government to Airbus in my constituency means that it looks as though the next century will be greatly successful? Does he know that my constituents working for Raytheon Jets are desperate for the Astor project to be won for them? Is there any way in which the Welsh Office can help in respect of the Astor project?

Mr. Davies: I shall certainly look carefully at the case my hon. Friend puts to me. When I visited the Raytheon facility with my hon. Friend, I was impressed by the attitude of both management and unions and the way in which they have come together in partnership. The partnership between management and unions at Raytheon and the public-private partnership that is largely responsible for the success of the British Aerospace project demonstrate that partnership is the way forward. I am confident that the two successes in my hon. Friend's constituency show the value of that approach. I am personally confident that it is good for my hon. Friend's constituency, good for Wales and good for Britain as a whole.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): In addition to the good news about launch aid for the A340 500 and 600 aircraft in Broughton in north Wales, in the constituency of the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones), is it not welcome news that the pre-contract agreement between British Aerospace and Boeing allocates several hundred million pounds-worth of work to British Aerospace—it is to be hoped including at Broughton—in the event of the Royal Air Force procuring the C17 heavy lifter, provided that the strategic defence review confirms that procurement?

Mr. Davies: Military procurement is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence, but I am conscious that the hon. Gentleman has shown a close interest in the project and I am grateful for his support this afternoon.

EU Structural Funds

3. Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones (Ynys Môn): What representations he has received on the future of European structural funds for Wales. [41415]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): We have received numerous representations stressing the importance of structural funds for Wales.

Mr. Jones: Does the Minister recognise that, unless something happens very quickly, Wales could well be at the back of the queue when up to £1 billion of objective 1 money is secured? Does he realise that, with the Chancellor and the Foreign Secretary battling for Scotland, and the DTI battling for South Yorkshire, Merseyside and Cornwall, Wales could lose out altogether? What assurances can he give that Wales will not lose out? The credibility of the Welsh Office is at stake on this matter.

Mr. Hain: I do not recognise any of the points made by the hon. Gentleman. I put it to him, in the friendliest possible fashion, that he should be working with the Welsh Office. The Secretary of State has met Commissioner Wulf-Mathies twice; I have met her once. We have made all possible representations throughout the system. Wales's case is well recognised and understood, specifically in terms of NUTS 2 areas and generally in terms of low GDP within Europe. The hon. Gentleman's time would be better spent supporting the Welsh Office in what could be very difficult negotiations with the European Union.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): Can my hon. Friend confirm press reports that he and fellow Ministers are deciding to adjust the assisted area status map in Wales as part and parcel of the case that he will make to Europe? If so, has he any assurance from Europe that, if such adjustments were made, we would obtain objective 1 status?

Mr. Hain: As my hon. Friend knows, the assisted area status question is separate from—although parallel with—the question of structural funds and NUTS 2 boundaries. We are reviewing the entire situation. I do not believe that the press reports that my hon. Friend mentions are accurate, but we are considering the best way of reconfiguring the assisted area map to ensure that Wales achieves the maximum benefit.

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes): Can the Minister confirm that any adjustment to the assisted area status map could have a beneficial effect on applications for objective 1 status for other parts of Wales? Does he accept that Conservative Members are very keen for Europe to give proper support to the most hard-pressed parts of Wales? Can he assure the House, however, that, in anything that he does, he will not risk giving up existing assistance without a categorical assurance that he will receive from Europe a balancing assistance in return; that he is not risking throwing out the baby with the bath water; and that, ultimately, Wales will end up better off overall?

Mr. Hain: For once, I welcome the right hon. Gentleman's constructive question on this matter, because he is obviously as aware as Ministers in the Welsh Office of the delicate balance that must be achieved. We do not want Wales to lose out in any way, but we want to ensure that such aid as can be attracted in is focused on those areas, not neglecting the valleys or west Wales, which suffered very badly under the Conservative Government of which the right hon. Gentleman was a member.

Trunk Roads

5. Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): What plans he has to improve trunk roads linking north and south Wales. [41417]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): Improvements are needed, and these will be addressed in our review of the Welsh trunk roads programme.

Mr. Paterson: The A483–A5 road, south through Ruabon on to Shrewsbury, is the main link between north-east Wales and south Wales. It is currently single carriageway; it is subject to frequent accidents and delays. In the past five years, 25 people have been killed on that road. What plans does the Minister have to upgrade the Welsh stretch to dual carriageway? What discussions has he had with his English counterparts? Given the Secretary of State's stated enthusiasm for the PFI initiative yesterday in the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs, has he discussed that means of finance to speed up the project?

Mr. Hain: The previous Conservative Government, whom the hon. Gentleman supported, had 18 years to solve these problems, but I recognise the point that he raises. Indeed, I believe that, word for word, it is the point that he made a couple of weeks ago, when he served his apprenticeship to the boy Nigel in the Welsh Grand Committee in Carmarthen. I answered it then as I answer it now: we recognise that the problem exists, and we shall do our best to solve it.

Mr. David Hanson (Delyn): Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the best ways to improve road transport between north and south Wales is to take steps to remove cars and lorries from those roads? What steps can my hon. Friend take to ensure that transport links between north and south do not depend on roads alone, and, with other Departments, help to improve rail and air transport links, which are far more environmentally friendly?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend expresses the position exactly as I see it. The A470 and A483 clearly need to be upgraded to improve north-south links, but the priority for the moment must be to establish—I am working on this actively—better air and rail links, because those are the areas of public transport policy which will enable us to address what is otherwise a difficult problem.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnorshire): Will the Minister take note of representations that I know he has received about the A483 on the boundary of my constituency with that of Montgomery? That important road is not even of trunk-road width and the planned improvements to it will not be completed for 12 months. Will the Minister do something to enable that work to be started much sooner so that we have a more effective north-south link?

Mr. Hain: I shall certainly consider the hon. Gentleman's point again. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State tells me that, if the hon. Gentleman drives slowly at that point in mid-Wales, he may see red kites, which are of great interest to people in Wales generally.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): As the Minister has just said that it is important to upgrade the A470, why has he apparently shelved phase 2 of the Blaenau Ffestiniog to Betws-y-Coed road improvement scheme? I am grateful for the first phase, but without the second phase it is nonsense. If the hon. Gentleman is serious about upgrading the A470, this is a priority, and I ask him for a positive response.

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman has identified a clear problem which is well recognised in the Welsh Office. Will he await the outcome of the roads review to see what progress we can make on the matter?

Social Exclusion

6. Mr. Martin Caton (Gower): If he will make a statement on his plans for tackling social exclusion in Wales. [41418]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Win Griffiths): I announced on 1 May, the anniversary of our great election victory, a new social exclusion programme for Wales. The programme will tackle social exclusion in Wales through co-ordinated action to promote community development in six or more communities.

Mr. Caton: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the priorities in tackling social exclusion in Wales must be to deal with the problem of street homelessness? Can he assure me that, in tackling that problem, he is prepared to learn from best practice in other parts of the United Kingdom and, in particular, from the way in which the rough sleepers initiative has been implemented in England and Scotland?

Mr. Griffiths: I can assure my hon. Friend that we want to ensure that we have the best practice in community development to regenerate our deprived communities and, where homelessness is a serious problem, I shall certainly want to see it included in the projects that we approve.

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes): Does the Minister think that his social exclusion policy is working for farmers and others in rural Wales? Does he not realise that, month by month, the agriculture crisis is becoming worse; that the need for direct assistance for farmers and farm workers is becoming greater; and that, while he and the Secretary of State mouth platitudes and blame everyone but themselves, Welsh farming is quietly starving to death? Does he appreciate that, despite our holding the European presidency, Welsh agriculture has gained nothing from Europe, and the incomes of some Welsh farmers are now 83 per cent. lower than they were last year? Has the time not come to stop giving us complacent soundbites and do something for the hard-pressed people of rural Wales?

Mr. Griffiths: It is about time that the right hon. Gentleman took the matter seriously rather than seeking soundbites from it. In homing in on the figure of 83 per cent, he knows that he is exaggerating. Total farm income—we accept the seriousness of the position—has gone down by 43 per cent., which is rather less than the figure that he has given.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex): So that's all right, is it?

Mr. Griffiths: It is not all right, but let us deal with the problem in a serious fashion, not by soundbites. We have already provided some £155 million extra in England and Wales, which would not have been provided under Tory spending plans. We are already researching into beef and lamb to improve the quality of Welsh products. We predict that during the next decade Welsh farming will be in a far stronger position than that in which it was left by the previous Conservative Government, who caused BSE, the root of our present problems.

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone): In the context of tackling social exclusion in Wales, will my hon. Friend initiate an Industrial Injuries

Advisory Council study to find out whether there is recent research showing that those suffering from respiratory diseases include slate quarrymen, so that slate quarrymen may be covered by the PD12 provisions for chronic bronchitis and emphysema?

Mr. Griffiths: My hon. Friend raises a serious matter, which would probably not come within the social exclusion programme, but my right hon. Friend is discussing it with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security.

Parliamentary Representation

7. Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): What representations he has received regarding the number of hon. Members representing Welsh constituencies. [41419]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Ron Davies): Fewer than a dozen.

Mr. Robathan: Given that the Government are determined to foist on Wales an assembly which only one in four of the people wanted, will the Secretary of State take action to ensure that the over-representation of Wales in this House is reduced? He knows that there are 40 Welsh Members whereas according to English criteria there should be 32. Will he take action to reduce that over-representation?

Mr. Davies: No, I will not. The basis of the representation of Welsh constituencies in the House was determined in 1944 by a Speaker's Commission. There are no proposals to change that. When we debated the Government of Wales Bill, there were no such proposals from the hon. Gentleman or from the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram). The assembly that we propose, and for which the people of Wales voted on 18 September, does not have any legislative function: accordingly, there is no case to be made for the number of Welsh Members of Parliament to be reduced.

Mr. Huw Edwards (Monmouth): Does my right hon. Friend share my concern that, in 70 years, there have been only seven women Members of Parliament from Wales? Will he join me in congratulating the Wales Labour party, which last Saturday decided to introduce a system of twinning by constituencies to ensure that there is fair representation of women and men in the Welsh assembly?

Mr. Davies: I am anxious to ensure that the Welsh assembly is representative of the whole of our society in Wales. It is therefore important that we ensure that women are properly represented. Positive discrimination, as my hon. Friend knows, is a difficult matter. My party resolved on Saturday to adopt the policy of twinning, which now has my whole-hearted support. I look forward to my colleagues in the Labour party in Wales working vigorously to implement that policy so that we have fair representation in the assembly.

Unemployment

8. Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): If he will make a statement on the level of unemployment in Wales. [41420]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): According to the labour force survey, in the period January to March 1998 unadjusted unemployment in Wales was 97,000, a rate of 7.5 per cent.

Mr. Wigley: Does the Minister accept that there is still a wide divide between the unemployment levels in the eastern part of Wales and in the western part and the old coalfield areas? Does not that underline the need for that area to be accepted as a NUTS 2 area for regional planning, particularly in the European context? That being so, why was it possible for the Office for National Statistics to have a map for Cornwall out in Eurostat on 30 June last year, but no map for Wales? Who in London is standing between Wales and Europe to stop us getting that map in?

Mr. Hain: The right hon. Gentleman's point about the plight of west Wales in terms of joblessness, low gross domestic product and many other economic indicators is well understood by the entire Government. That is why the case put forward by the Welsh Office for west Wales and the valleys to be a NUTS 2 classified area is being pressed vigorously. I ask him and all other Welsh Members to support us in that endeavour.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): Since the glorious 1 May last year, Welsh Office Ministers have made welcome promises about reducing the imbalance between south-east Wales and south-west Wales. May I gently remind my hon. Friend that we are still waiting for a change in practice?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend makes a strong point and, as a fellow south-west Wales Member, I understand it very well. That is why we are pressing hard to get the maximum amount of investment, inward and otherwise, into west Wales. We shall continue to do that, but we cannot turn around immediately the dreadful legacy of neglect of west Wales that the Conservatives bequeathed us. We are doing our best to tackle that appalling legacy.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York): Does the Minister agree that European Union structural funds have a role to play in reducing unemployment in Wales? Does he therefore share my regret that there are serious delays in those European Union funds being released and spent in Wales?

Mr. Hain: The situation is far more complicated than that, and, if the hon. Lady were a Welsh Member of Parliament, she would recognise that fact.

Freight Transport

9. Mr. John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan): If he will make a statement on the freight transport strategy for Wales. [41421]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Ron Davies): My hon. Friend will be aware that, on Monday this week, I announced plans for a £15 million European rail freight terminal at Wentlooge, which will open in 1999. It is a very exciting project, which will bring huge benefits to the economy and the environment of Wales. It is a major step forward in the Government's encouragement of rail freight instead of road freight. The Government will shortly publish a United Kingdom transport White Paper setting out our integrated transport policies, including further measures to encourage and develop freight transport. At around the same time, I will publish a complementary transport policy statement for Wales, which will reflect the particular circumstances and transport needs in Wales.

Mr. Smith: I am grateful for that reply. Will my right hon. Friend join me in welcoming the announcement this week of a rail freight terminal in Cardiff that will serve to make Wales one of the most attractive investment locations in Europe by providing direct rail freight access to the largest consumer market in the world? Will he contrast his decision, which was taken one year into a new Labour Government, with the actions of his predecessors, the Tory Secretaries of State, who prevaricated and damagingly delayed the decision—and especially the lamentable Leader of the Opposition who is still damaging our business and trading relationships with Europe?

Mr. Davies: I am far too modest to claim personal credit for the project, but I can recall two years ago pressing the then Secretary of State for Wales, the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague), to pull his finger out and get on with the job. He failed to do so, but I am delighted to say that this is yet another resounding success for the new Labour Government.

Farming

10. Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale): What representations he has received concerning assistance for farming in Wales. [41422]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Win Griffiths): My right hon. Friend and I have received considerable numbers of representations, both written and oral, in respect of the condition of Welsh agriculture since the start of the crisis, and we continue to do so.

Mr. Collins: Now that the Minister has been in charge of Welsh agriculture for more than a year, during which time it has endured probably its worst 12 months for half a century, will he review his policies and actually do something for Welsh farmers?

Mr. Griffiths: We have already done a lot for Welsh farmers. They have received more than £12 million from the agrimoney compensation scheme and £70 million has gone into the cattle traceability and specified risk material regulations in order to give consumers confidence in British beef, and in Welsh beef in particular. We have initiated a research programme for lamb and beef to help raise the quality of both products. We are promoting a very strong food strategy to give Welsh farmers confidence in the future, and I am sure that, before our term has ended, we will have taken considerable steps to revive the Welsh economy.

Ms Jackie Lawrence (Preseli Pembrokeshire): Does my hon. Friend agree that the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) has a very short memory if he has forgotten that Welsh agriculture is in a mess primarily because of the BSE crisis, which the Conservatives ignored and which the present Secretary of State for Wales was first to bring to their attention? Bearing in mind the fact that a document about the crisis in Welsh agriculture was published today, will my hon. Friend support calls for the Office of Fair Trading to investigate the role of supermarkets in the supply chain and the vertical restraints within it?

Mr. Griffiths: I assure my hon. Friend that we shall examine carefully all the recommendations from the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs. We know that the Committee took a great deal of evidence, which gave it cause for concern, about the way in which the market works. We shall be prepared to discuss those matters with other Departments to try to ensure that we have the best response possible.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield): Will the Minister deny that just 10 minutes ago he said that farm incomes have fallen by 43 per cent.?

Mr. Griffiths: I shall not deny it. Total farm incomes have fallen by 43 per cent.

Parc Prison (Deaths)

11. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): If he will request the Home Office to conduct an inquiry into the recent deaths at Parc prison in Bridgend. [41423]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Win Griffiths): I understand that the Prison Service has already made arrangements for investigations to be carried out into both the recent apparent self-inflicted deaths at Parc prison. My hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office with responsibilities for prisons and probation has also asked the Director General of the Prison Service for a report on the current situation at Parc prison.

Ann Clwyd: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. However, may I tell him of my concern? One of my constituents is believed to have committed suicide at Parc prison last year. There has still not been an inquest seven months later. Given the criticisms made by the Public Accounts Committee of Parc prison—understaffing, a lack of specialist staff and the fact that Wales has more overcrowded prisons than most parts of Britain—will my hon. Friend give this matter his urgent attention?

Mr. Griffiths: My hon. Friend will know that Parc prison is in my constituency. I can reassure her that I pursued all the matters that she has raised as constituency questions and that the Prison Service and the Minister with responsibilities for prisons are also taking steps to deal with issues relating to suicide in general.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Unemployment (European Union)

Q1. [41393] Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East): If he will raise at the next meeting of the European Council the level of unemployment in the EU.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): Before answering the question, let me say that I gather, Madam Speaker, that today is your anniversary of 25 years as a Member of Parliament. On behalf of the whole House, congratulations.

Promoting employment and tackling unemployment are key features of our presidency and will be a major focus of our discussions at the Cardiff European Council in June.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Do not the horrific levels of unemployment in the European Union of more than 15 million in each of the past six years—it is now 10 per cent. compared with 4.6 per cent. in America and 3.6 per cent. in Japan—show that the EU and its policies are not a recipe for job creation? As every previous currency experiment in the world has ended up in disaster and more unemployment—[Interruption]—yes, they have, and that is a fact—could the Prime Minister at least give the people of Britain an assurance that, if they opt against the euro clearly and decisively in the referendum, he will honour his pledge and look for a new arrangement with Europe rather than bringing forward a repeat referendum?

The Prime Minister: On the last point, we are not actually at the stage of having a referendum yet. I should not want to bind the hands of a future Parliament. On the hon. Gentleman's first point, I simply say to him that I believe that there needs to be economic reform in Europe. That is one of the reasons why we put this on the agenda for the Cardiff European Council. I also point out that there are a variety of levels of unemployment in Europe. Some of the countries that want to join monetary union have lower levels of unemployment than we do.

I understand the hon. Gentleman's position on monetary union, but it is a position that is against monetary union whatever the economic consequences. The truth of the matter is that, after yesterday's speech, the Leader of the Opposition has joined with the hon. Gentleman and his shadow Secretary of State for Trade and Industry against the former Chancellor of the Exchequer. I think that that is an interesting decision.

Engagements

Q2. [41394] Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 20 May.

The Prime Minister: Today, I had meetings with Ministers and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further such meetings later today. Later today, I shall be visiting Northern Ireland to assist efforts in bringing about a decisive yes vote in Friday's referendum, which I believe to be the only result that can offer peace and stability in the future.

Mr. Morgan: With the Scotland Bill having received Third Reading last night and with democratic devolution therefore certain to be a reality in Scotland and Wales next summer, cannot the benefits of constitutional change in the United Kingdom be kept going in its momentum if the land of St. Patrick joins with the countries of St. David and St. Andrew by voting yes in Friday's referendum?

The Prime Minister: I agree. As I just said, a yes vote in Friday's referendum is important. After all, the agreement puts the principle of consent—no change to the constitutional status of Northern Ireland without the consent of the majority of people in Northern Ireland—right at the heart of politics in Northern Ireland and, indeed, in the Republic of Ireland, for the first time, and gives Northern Ireland, through the assembly, a chance to govern more of its own affairs directly in Northern Ireland.

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks): I second the congratulations that the Prime Minister has given to you, Madam Speaker, and support what he said about Northern Ireland.

Will the Prime Minister confirm that tomorrow's figures will show a further rise in hospital waiting lists, demonstrating the Government's complete and utter failure to meet their early pledge of reducing waiting lists?

The Prime Minister: It is correct that waiting lists are going up—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] However, we have pledged to reduce waiting lists, and reduce them we shall. We did not pledge that we would do so in our first year in office, but we have put some £2 billion more into the national health service than the previous Government, and we shall ensure that the pledge that we gave on waiting lists is put into practice before the next election.

Mr. Hague: So it is true that hospital waiting lists will rise further. Will the Prime Minister now give us the figures? Why does he not have the courage to give them? They can be leaked to national newspapers, and the Secretary of State for Health can discuss them on the radio, but the official announcement has to take place after Prime Minister's Question Time and at the beginning of a recess. The Prime Minister promised to cut waiting lists by 100,000 as an "early pledge". It is now rumoured that waiting lists are up by 130,000 since the general election. Is not the Prime Minister even a little bit embarrassed about that?

The Prime Minister: As I have just explained, we accept that waiting lists are going up, but the only way to get them back down is to put the necessary extra investment into the health service. As I explained, we have already put some £2 billion more than the figure in Conservative spending plans into the health service, and we shall put more money in over the next few years. However, that extra money will be put into the health service when it is consistent with prudent public finance to spend it. It will be put in alongside reform and change within the health service to ensure that the money—which is far in excess of what the Conservative Government put in—is spent wisely.

Mr. Hague: The Prime Minister's "early pledge" in the election did not come with all those footnotes and excuses. After more than a year in office, his excuses are beginning to wear thin. If he is not embarrassed that he has broken his promise on waiting lists, is he embarrassed about his "early pledge" to cut class sizes? Can he confirm the rumour that figures—also to be published, surprise, surprise, tomorrow after Question Time and before the recess—will show that class sizes have risen since the general election?

The Prime Minister: As we have said, class sizes have risen since the election. They have had to, because of the spending plans that we inherited from the previous Government. Furthermore, we would have been able to get class sizes down if, for nine months, the Conservative party had not opposed the Bill to reduce class sizes by phasing out assisted places.

Mr. Hague: Not only are the Prime Minister's excuses wearing thin, but blaming somebody else is less and less convincing. He promised to cut waiting lists and they have gone up; he promised to cut class sizes and they have gone up; he promised, as an early pledge, low interest rates and low inflation, and they are now at a six-year high. Those are three of his five early pledges. Does he not wish that he gave an early pledge to bring chaos to the Foreign Office? At least one Minister would then have delivered. Does he understand that, when he called them "early pledges", people thought that he meant early in the Parliament, not early next century?

The Prime Minister: We set out those pledges and we shall meet every single one of them. Waiting lists and class sizes went up for years under the previous Government. We shall bring them back down. We have already put additional resources into health and £2.5 billion more into education. When we meet those pledges—as we shall before the next election, as we promised—I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will congratulate us.

Mr. Hague: In just one year, a man with confident early pledges has become full of meaningless waffle. The Prime Minister told the British people, "Things can only get better." The fact is that waiting lists have got worse, class sizes have got worse and inflation has got worse. Was the Daily Mirror right when it said that he should not be embarrassed; he should be ashamed?

The Prime Minister: No, because, as I have just pointed out to the right hon. Gentleman, under the Government of which he was a member, waiting lists and class sizes went up year on year on year. I should explain to him that waiting lists went up for the four years before we took office—I think that Conservative Members should know the facts—and class sizes went up for 10 years in a row before we took office. Despite Conservative opposition, we have got the Bill on class sizes through. From this September, 100,000 children will be taken out of higher class sizes for the first time in years, and health service waiting lists will be brought back down. When they are, we shall see what he has to say.

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle): May I bring the Prime Minister back to the referendum? Is he aware that there is great interest and great concern on both sides of the Irish sea about the matter? There is a feeling on the mainland that, to an extent, people are excluded, because they cannot vote. We have supported Ulster for the past 30 years, financially and with the armed forces but, if Ulster votes no or if determined politicians in Ulster wreck the agreement, is it likely that there would be grave concern and a backlash in this country? Would it be much more difficult to carry forward the policies that we have carried forward in the past 30 years?

The Prime Minister: Obviously, I very much hope that people vote yes. I have said throughout that, even if people were to vote no, the Government of the United Kingdom would stand ready to take the matter forward in the best way that we could. Plainly, we shall have a far better chance of stability and prosperity if the agreement, which is fair and reasonable, is accepted by the people in Northern Ireland. If it is accepted by them, I hope that the politicians who are elected to the assembly have the desire and purpose to make it work for the people whom they represent.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): Is it not clear that, not only here but throughout the United Kingdom and across the international community, people are wishing and willing the Northern Irish people to cast a decisive yes vote on Friday? Does the Prime Minister accept that there is work to be done to reassure some people, especially in the Unionist community? Will he confirm that the British and the Irish Governments are prepared jointly to act, very robustly, against any dissident minority group that uses violence to frustrate the expressed will of the Northern Irish people? In particular, will he confirm that anyone committing such an act after a yes vote on Friday cannot expect to receive the benefits of the provisions on prisoner release in the Good Friday agreement?

The Prime Minister: Yes, that is right on both counts. There is no question of people who are engaged in, or threatening, violence having the benefit of any part of the agreement in respect of seats in the Northern Ireland Executive or accelerated prisoner release. I have made it clear, as have the Republic of Ireland Government, that we shall take the firmest measures possible to deal with any dissident splinter groups that may carry on violence and acts of terrorism. The agreement, if it goes through the referendums in Northern Ireland and in the Republic of Ireland, will represent the settled will of the people—in Northern Ireland and in the Republic. Anyone who then goes against the agreement by using violence or terrorism can expect no let-up and no mercy from either the British or Irish Governments.

Yvette Cooper (Pontefract and Castleford): Is my right hon. Friend aware of a new report from the Centre for Economic Performance, which shows that the persistent pay gap between men and women is largely a result of the absence of family-friendly employment practices in the workplace and that, for example, access to maternity leave reduces the pay gap? Will he assure the House that family-friendly employment policies will be at the heart of the Government's fairness-at-work agenda and that Government Departments will take a lead in putting those policies into practice?

The Prime Minister: Yes, and that is in addition to three other measures that we are taking which will improve the friendliness of employment policy towards the family. The first is, obviously, child care. The second is the statutory minimum wage and the third is to ensure that part-time workers are treated as fairly and with the same rights and entitlements as full-time workers.

Ministerial Visits

Q3. [41395] Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): When he next intends to visit the Macclesfield constituency.

The Prime Minister: I have no immediate plans to do so.

Mr. Winterton: Is the Prime Minister aware that I am genuine when I ask him to come to the borough of Macclesfield, which has been Conservative controlled for decades; where, at the last local elections, we gained two seats from Labour and two from his friends, the Liberal Democrats; where the borough council and chamber of commerce recently organised a highly successful business exhibition to promote local industry and commerce; where Macclesfield Town football club, affectionately known as the blues or the silkmen, gained promotion to the second division, having come up from non-league football only the previous year; and where we are opening our own community radio station, Silk FM, on Monday? Will he come to Macclesfield to see Conservative success at work, rather than merely talking about success? I am genuine when I say that I want Macclesfield's success to be spread throughout the country. My right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition has accepted an invitation to come at the beginning of July.

The Prime Minister: Despite having no plans to visit Macclesfield, I now know an awful lot about it. I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his result in the council elections. However, he will know that there was an 8.5 per cent. swing to Labour at the general election, but the truth is that neither of us did quite as well as his football team.

Engagements

Q4. [41396] Mr. Malcolm Savidge (Aberdeen, North): Following last week's disturbing developments in India, will the Prime Minister commit the Government to urgent and strenuous action both to discourage nuclear proliferation and to give fresh impetus to the process of multilateral nuclear disarmament?

The Prime Minister: Along with our G8 partners, we have condemned India's recent nuclear tests and urged it—and, indeed, other states in the region—to refrain from further tests and the deployment of nuclear or ballistic weapons. We have also called on India unconditionally to sign up to the comprehensive test ban treaty. It is very important that it does so.

As my hon. Friend may also know, I have spoken to the Pakistani Prime Minister within the past couple of days. I congratulate the Pakistani Government on the restraint that they have shown so far and urge them to continue to do so. I ask them also to look at the example of Brazil and Argentina, which could have gone down the road of nuclear testing, but decided not to. Nuclear testing is not the way for countries to enhance their standing in the world.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): On the question of hospital waiting lists, may I remind the Prime Minister of this fact? A little over a year ago, when he was Leader of the Opposition, waiting lists in hospitals were 1.1 million and he described the NHS as "in crisis". Today, after a year of his Government, they are 1.3 million. If 1.1 million equals a crisis in the NHS, how does the Prime Minister describe 1.3 million, or is he, like the Secretary of State for Health, frankly embarrassed?

The Prime Minister: No. We recognise that waiting lists have grown, despite the extra money that we have put in. I point out that, like class sizes, waiting lists were growing for several years before we came to power. It was important, first, to put extra money into the health service, which we did. We put more money into health and education than the Liberal Democrats were asking for. However, that had to be consistent with strong control on public finances. Since the general election last year, the Liberal Democrats and the Conservative party have been asking for ever more spending on everything as well as demanding that we raise no revenue whatever. That is simply not a credible economic position.

Let me assure the right hon. Gentleman: we made the pledge and, once we have sorted out the public finances and put extra investment into the national health service, we shall meet our pledge. The people of this country trust us with the national health service that we created a great deal more than they trusted the Conservative Government who undermined it.

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): Will the Prime Minister meet the Royal British Legion to discuss the problems of those in receipt of war widows' pension and war disablement pension in local authorities that do not disregard the pensions for the purposes of housing benefit? The majority of local authorities—including Sedgefield and Thurrock—under the control of all political parties, do the right thing and disregard the pensions. A minority are unfair to the recipients of those pensions and unfair to the local authorities that do the honourable and right thing. The problem requires prime ministerial intervention because attempts to remedy the wrong are being blocked. I hope that my right hon. Friend will undertake at least to consider the issue.

The Prime Minister: I am certainly happy to consider it, but my hon. Friend will know that discussions about the problem have been going on for a considerable time. It is for local authorities ultimately to make their own decisions, but we shall continue to keep the matter under review and under discussion.

Q5. [41397] Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam): Will the Prime Minister set aside the smoke and mirrors that he used to answer the question of my right hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) a few moments ago and explain to my constituents how he translates an early pledge to cut waiting lists in my area into a 38 per cent. increase in the waiting lists at St. Helier hospital and a forecast of a fourfold increase, within a year, in the number of people waiting for 17 months? How can that be an early pledge that has been fulfilled when so many of my constituents will be waiting far longer under Labour?

The Prime Minister: Just on the point about the length of waiting time, let me say that there are now no 18-month waiting times, and the number of over-12-month waiters is decreasing. On the numbers on waiting lists, the answer is to achieve both investment and reform in the national health service. As I said to the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) a moment ago, we have spent more money on the national health service than Liberal Democrats were asking for before the election. It will take time to fulfil our pledge, but I did not say that we would do it in the first year; I said that we would implement the pledge, and we shall. As I said to the Leader of the Opposition a few moments ago, when we implement the pledge, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be among the first on his feet to congratulate us.

Mr. Vernon Coaker (Gedling): Will the Prime Minister join me in welcoming the national child care strategy published yesterday? That document has already been warmly welcomed in my constituency. Will he also take the opportunity to encourage people to enter into the dialogue that the document recommends, so that real partnerships can exist between local people, local authorities and the Government in delivering that important policy development?

The Prime Minister: Yes. The proposals will dramatically increase the availability of child care. Indeed, with the measures already announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, they will allow thousands of people who do not have access to proper child care at present to get it. That will greatly ameliorate the position of people who are trying to juggle work and family life. In addition, we have to make sure that properly qualified people are operating in child care provision, and that is one of the reasons for the announcement that we made a couple of days ago. I am pleased that it has received such a wide welcome everywhere.

Q6. [41398] Mr. Norman Baker (Lewes): Does the Prime Minister endorse the recent Cabinet Office report into the Government Information Service, which, in paragraph 57, encourages neutral civil servants to damp down bad news? Is that why the Department of Health is spending £86,000 on a rebuttal unit? Which does the Prime Minister think my constituents in Polegate and elsewhere would prefer: more spin doctors to explain why waiting lists are going up, or more real doctors to start getting waiting lists down?

The Prime Minister: First, as I understand it, it is not a rebuttal unit. Secondly, ultimately, we have to get extra money into the national health service to get waiting lists down. We can do that if we have prudent and proper control of public finances. As I said, since the general election, we have put £2 billion more into the health service. It will take time—of course it will—to get waiting lists, and class sizes, down. However, we shall deliver those pledges, and we shall do so after having had year upon year of a Conservative Government raising waiting lists and class sizes. When we go to the country at the next general election, people will see the difference between a Labour Government who have kept their promises and a Tory Government who broke theirs.

Q7. [41399] Mr. Paul Goggins (Wythenshawe and Sale, East): Given the reluctance of some G8 leaders to make progress on the issue of debt relief, what hope does the Prime Minister hold out to the tens of thousands of people who formed the human chain last Saturday in Birmingham and, more importantly, to the tens of millions of people who live in the poorest countries of the world, that the highly indebted poor countries initiative can be made more flexible and more generous?

The Prime Minister: That was one of the things that we discussed and acted upon at the G8 summit. The international community has been aware of the problems of foreign debt for many years, and has in fact forgiven some £8 billion-worth of debt since 1995. Indeed, going back even further, the United Kingdom has forgiven some £1.2 billion-worth of debt. Under the highly indebted poor countries initiative, another £3 billion-worth of debt relief has already been pledged to six countries, with several other countries embarking on the process. The aim is to get all the countries into the process by 2000. We agreed further provisions at the G8 summit that will allow interim relief for countries that are in the process but have not yet fully completed it. As a result of those measures—although we still believe that much more still can and should be done—we shall have made significant progress in reducing debt for the poorest countries.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet): I put to the Prime Minister a question on an issue for which he has direct responsibility. The European Union has no figures on the cost in loss of jobs of the abolition of duty-free trade. The European Commission said that it would conduct an inquiry into the matter; the European Commission has not done so. The Government hold the presidency of the European Commission. Why does the Prime Minister say in a parliamentary answer only that he would simply "not oppose" such an inquiry if one were to be proposed? He is in government—why does he not do something about it?

The Prime Minister: We have had Conservative party hypocrisy on the national health service, but that one takes the biscuit. The reason why I could say only that is that, in 1991, the Government whom the hon. Gentleman supported agreed to the abolition of duty-free sales in the European Union. Therefore, unless we can get all 15 countries to reverse the position, the abolition will remain. That is why we said what we have said. There is no evidence that other countries are prepared to support reversing the position. If the hon. Gentleman is to lay the blame anywhere, he should lay it on the Government whom he supported—who, in 1991, were responsible for the policy that he is now criticising.

Q8. [41401] Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): May I gently put it to the Prime Minister that our protests over the Indian nuclear tests would carry more weight if we were not so keen on nuclear weapons ourselves? Does he recall that two previous Labour Governments—those of Lords Attlee and Callaghan—developed nuclear weapons in secret, even from their own Cabinets, never mind from the British public? Will he give an undertaking that his Labour Government will do no such thing?

The Prime Minister: The undertaking that I give will be to combine maximum openness consistent with national security.

Q9. [41402] Mr. John M. Taylor (Solihull): How is it that MI6 knew about the activities of Sandline for weeks, if not mo[illegible] as did his officials, but not the Foreign Secretary? Has he not given the impression of misleading the House last Tuesday?

The Prime Minister: No. The Foreign Secretary corrected the facts as soon as he knew of them. Of course, all of that will be looked into by the inquiry of Sir Thomas Legg. We have done a little research. From last May to this April, not a single question was tabled by the shadow Foreign Secretary or his deputy. On 12 March—that great debate at which the Opposition say we should have explained everything—not a single Tory Front Bencher even turned up. The only person who mentioned the allegations in question was the Minister of State. I think that that shows the seriousness with which we should treat the allegations that the hon. Gentleman makes.

Mr. Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East): Does the Prime Minister recognise that there are people in Northern Ireland who will be tempted to vote no on Friday, because they believe that that way would strengthen the Union? [illegible] the best way forward for the people of Northern [illegible]nd to take this historic opportunity to vote yes [illegible]d support what the majority of the people of Great Britain want, which is a yes vote on Friday?

The Prime Minister: Yes because, of course, the agreement does two things for which those in the Unionist cause have been fighting for many years. First, it entrenches the principle of consent—no change to the status of Northern Ireland without the consent of the people—and secondly, there is the Northern Ireland assembly. That is balanced by fair and equal treatment for people whatever the part of the community they come from. That is the reason why those who have been fighting for such a long period of time for those two principles should come out and vote yes on Friday.

G8 Summit

3.31 pm

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): With permission, Madam Speaker, I should like to make a statement on the G8 summit in Birmingham last weekend. Since they are relevant, I will also touch on the European Union-United States summit in London on Monday and the World Trade Organisation meeting I attended yesterday in Geneva. I have placed in the Library of the House the documents issued at those events.

I start by warmly congratulating Birmingham on how it played its part as host. The city looked magnificent and the preparations impressed all the visiting leaders, their delegations and visiting members of foreign media. I take this opportunity to make clear to the city council and the people of Birmingham our gratitude for all their efforts and for their forbearance over any disruption the summit caused.

After last year's Denver summit, I said that we hoped to make this year's summit smaller, more focused, more businesslike and less formal than some recent summits. I am pleased to report that those objectives were achieved. Indeed, the new format has proved sufficiently successful for Germany, which is to host next year's summit, to decide to follow suit. This was clearly also the first summit for the whole G8 and I was particularly delighted that President Yeltsin was able to play a full part in our discussions.

The Asian financial crisis of the past year put economic issues firmly back at the centre of the summit agenda. It is vital that we learn the lessons for the future. We must, as far as we can, prevent a repetition and at least ensure that future warning signals can be seen by all at an earlier stage. We therefore endorsed a report from G7 Finance Ministers on strengthening the global financial system. That sets out concrete proposals for improving the transparency of the international financial system and national financial data, introducing codes of good practice with publicity for those who fall short, strengthening national financial systems to cope with global capital flows and involving the private sector more closely in resolving those crises—effectively a set of international financial standards countries can sign up to as a way of rewarding good practice. We asked our Finance Ministers to seek rapid decisions in the appropriate forums and to report back to us without delay.

We expressed our support for Japan's efforts to revitalise its economy, which will be essential for Asia's economic recovery, and welcomed the launch of monetary union.

We also discussed the wider implications of the Asia crisis, emphasising that economic reform can be soundly based only where political legitimacy exists. That requires political accountability and transparency, too. In particular, we issued a message on the urgent need for political reform in Indonesia to accompany economic change. Events since have served only to confirm that.

We unanimously condemned India's nuclear tests, urged restraint on neighbouring countries and called on both India and Pakistan to adhere unconditionally to the comprehensive test ban and non-proliferation treaties. There was grave concern at the implication of India's action for international security, and agreement that the action had reduced India's standing in the world and her ability to play a central role.

We delivered clear messages on the importance of maintaining momentum in the middle east peace process and of ensuring a real dialogue in Kosovo that would lead to concrete measures to lower tension and stop violence.

We devoted considerable time to the problems of developing countries, particularly those in Africa. We committed ourselves to reach the internationally agreed targets for reducing poverty, maintaining a substantial flow of aid and untying it wherever possible to make it more efficient. We supported the World Health Organisation "roll-back malaria" initiative, to which Britain will be contributing £60 million. The aim is to cut radically by 2010 the death rate of a disease that strikes, above all, the poor of the world.

We also devoted considerable attention to the reduction of the burden of debt on the most heavily indebted poor countries. Birmingham marks a significant step forward in the pursuit of the Government's policy of setting targets for the year 2000. In particular, the G8 countries are now signed up to the Mauritius mandate target that all eligible highly indebted poor countries are at least in the debt relief process by 2000, and to granting interim relief where necessary. Particular attention will now be given to meeting the immediate needs of poor post-conflict countries, especially those in Africa. Moreover, we all agreed to forgive aid-related debt to reforming least-developed countries—a step which Britain has already taken.

We are not, however, satisfied by those steps. I pay tribute to the Jubilee 2000 campaign and its dignified breaking-the-chain demonstration in Birmingham on Saturday. The issue is vast and complex, and it cannot be solved overnight—we have to mix our realism with our idealism. For debt relief to be effective, recipient countries must be committed to policies that ensure that the benefits reach the poor. However, I am in no doubt that we must do more.

Birmingham was notable for the extent of agreement on the environment agenda, including our common determination to make the Kyoto agreement on climate change a reality through tough domestic action, developing international trading and other mechanisms and drawing in the developing countries over time.

Also on the economic side, we discussed our national action plans to promote employability and inclusion, to help the young and long-term unemployed, to encourage entrepreneurs and to make the tax and benefit system more employment friendly while promoting lifelong learning. Here, too, there is growing consensus among the G8 countries. None of us can be content while unemployment remains so high despite our relative prosperity.

We discussed the growing threat of transnational crime as borders become more open and we all become more dependent on information technology. That requires ever closer co-operation between our Governments and law enforcement agencies, including joint law enforcement action. The G8 countries have made real progress since the Lyon summit two years ago, but we agreed new steps to make our fight against crime more effective. We endorsed a 10-point action plan on high-tech crime, and an intensification of action against money laundering and financial crime. We underlined the increasing dangers of official corruption from the proceeds of crime, the need for further action against trafficking in human beings and the rising threat of the illegal firearms trade. A ministerial meeting in Moscow will pursue that further next year.

We welcomed the forthcoming United Nations General Assembly special session on drugs and confirmed our determination to pursue a comprehensive strategy to tackle all aspects of the drug problem—production, transport and consumption.

Finally, we discussed the huge challenge posed by the millennium bug and agreed on further action to ensure the right level of international awareness and preparedness. The United Kingdom is contributing £10 million to the World bank trust fund to help developing countries to tackle the problem.

Immediately afterwards, President Clinton, Jacques Santer and I met in London for the six-monthly EU-US summit. Our discussions focused on two key issues: resolving our long-standing differences over US sanctions on Iran, Libya and Cuba; and launching a new transatlantic trade initiative.

Negotiations on the serious problems of extra-territorial jurisdiction raised by the Helms-Burton and Iran-Libya sanctions Acts have been going on for more than a year.

The United States Administration are now committed to waivers for European Union companies under the two Acts, and will resist attempts by Congress to push through similar legislation in the future. At the same time, we reaffirmed our joint commitment to countering proliferation and terrorism. As a result, our companies can now invest with far greater predictability, and we have reinforced EU-US co-operation against unacceptable policies. That was a major step forward.

The agreements also paved the way for a major new EU-US trade initiative, the transatlantic economic partnership, to remove remaining barriers to trade across the Atlantic and provide more effective co-operation in developing the world trading system.

Yesterday, I was in Geneva for the 50th anniversary of the general agreement on tariffs and trade to make clear Britain's continued championing of the cause of free trade. We must continue to resist protectionism, not least in the wake of the Asian economic crisis. A major challenge that we face is to manage the movement towards free trade so that all can participate and benefit. Developing countries must be able to take full advantage of the opportunities, so I was pleased to announce some $10 million of technical assistance to help those countries to prepare.

Finally, I should mention the support that I found in both Birmingham and Geneva for the Northern Ireland agreement. The good will towards the people of Northern Ireland was remarkable and heart warming, and confirmed that stability and peace in Northern Ireland have every chance of being reinforced by a boom in investment and prosperity from right round the world.

It is important that Britain plays a strong, international role in support of sound economic and political policies throughout the world, as a champion of free trade, and in the fight against international crime. I believe that the summits contributed to those goals and that the results were good for Britain and for other countries.

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks): May I join the Prime Minister in the congratulations that he extended to the city of Birmingham and endorse what he said about Northern Ireland? It is good to know that, when we go to Belfast this afternoon, we will take with us the support of so many friends and allies. Let us hope that the people of Northern Ireland grasp the chance to turn the agreement into a lasting peace.

I welcome, too, the strong commitment to continuing trade and investment liberalisation to which Heads of Government have signed up through the World Trade Organisation. Will the Prime Minister take this opportunity to confirm the Government's support for the goal of achieving worldwide free trade by 2020?

Does the Prime Minister regret the failure of the United Kingdom presidency of the European Union, under his chairmanship, even to have Sir Leon Brittan's plan for a free trade area of Europe and America on the agenda of the EU-US summit? Can he confirm that that plan, which aimed for the abolition of industrial tariffs by 2010 and a free trade area in services, was effectively dropped; that 14 EU member states and the United States were in favour of pressing on with the plan; and that the episode shows once again that the Government's presidency of the EU has often produced little other than platitudes and press releases?

I welcome the acknowledgement in Birmingham of the need for structural reform to encourage growth and job creation in the world economy, but does the Prime Minister recognise that it is far easier to talk about the need for structural reform than it is to implement measures that will create jobs and prosperity? Does he recognise that the current low unemployment in Britain is the result not of communiqués but of labour market reforms pioneered by the previous Government, and that some of the current Government's policies threaten those reforms?

May I offer my support for the points made in the G8 communiqué about the former Yugoslavia? The future of Bosnia will be in the balance this year, and everyone in the House hopes that a stable and prosperous state can be created. I hope that the Prime Minister will share my concern that there is the potential for another disastrous ethnic conflict in Kosovo. Will he argue for the return of the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe monitoring force, to promote confidence within the province, and join us in urging President Milosevic to allow confidence-building measures to be put in place and to restore Kosovo's autonomy?

It was right that debt relief should have been high on the summit's agenda. We will support the Government if they continue to give a lead to other donors, such as the G8 countries, the World bank and the International Monetary Fund in promoting well-thought-out debt reduction programmes that offer the prospect of sustainable economic growth.

I am sure that the Prime Minister will recognise the enormous contribution of the previous Government and former Conservative Chancellors. Indeed, the G8 countries are continuing the initiative begun by the previous Government to help the most indebted countries. Why did the summit fail to convince other Governments to widen the debt reduction agenda as we had all hoped?

Will the Prime Minister note the Opposition's concern for the future of Indonesia, and our deep regret at the loss of life? Does he have any plans to review the agreements that international financial institutions have made with Indonesia? If not, will he confirm that he intends them to be implemented fully and swiftly?

Does the Prime Minister accept that the summit's response to events in India appeared confused? The G8 nations were unable to put together a united response to the nuclear tests carried out by India. Does the United Kingdom support sanctions, like the United States, or the ending of arms exports, like Canada, or the approach of the French and Russian Governments, both of whom made it clear that they are not contemplating such measures?

The G8 summit appears to have been better organised and more productive than some other conferences that the Prime Minister has chaired recently. Could that have anything to do with the fact that the Foreign Secretary was not there? Is the Prime Minister claiming the credit for that success, or did the Foreign Secretary simply fail to notice the invitation in his red box? In the interests of maintaining good relations with as many countries as possible, will the Prime Minister undertake to repeat that success at future summits?

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): The right hon. Member will not be occupying the chair.

The Prime Minister: No, I think not.

We remain committed to free trade worldwide. As the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) knows, we strongly supported Sir Leon Brittan's package, but it had to be supported unanimously, and it was not. It is not right to say that 14 countries were in favour and only one against, but it had to be supported unanimously; that is simply how it is.

We were able to agree significant measures on the transatlantic economic partnership that will have an impact on trade. The measures that we were able to agree on United States sanctions will have an important bearing on the ability of British and European companies to trade with countries against which the USA imposes sanctions. It was a successful meeting. Of course, we would have liked to go further, but consent for that simply was not there.

On growth and job creation, I simply point out that unemployment is significantly down since the Government came to office. People cannot have it both ways on this. [Interruption.] Neither of us can, on national health service waiting lists and class sizes, for example. The plain fact is that we inherited from the previous Government a position in which one in five non-pensioner families had no one of working age in work. We have significantly changed the way in which unemployment statistics are calculated, because they were not right. Most people believe that the new deal, which we have implemented in the teeth of opposition from the Conservatives, is doing a great deal to reduce unemployment and help with the problems of social exclusion.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex): It has only just started.

The Prime Minister: I must tell the hon. Gentleman that the Conservative party opposed those measures.

On Kosovo, we agree that President Milosevic must take the necessary action outlined by the contact group, and that confidence-building measures are helpful.

I am happy to pay tribute to what the previous Conservative Chancellor did about debt reduction. However, it is not correct to say that the G8 came up with nothing new. The proposal for interim relief for heavily indebted countries was new, and the proposal for interim relief for countries that get into the process by 2000 was also new. The measures agreed on post-conflict countries were also new. In addition, the measures agreed for the World Health Organisation were new. I have said already that we would have preferred to go further. Nevertheless, considerable progress was made, and was made in circumstances in which people believed we would make no progress.

Our view on Indonesia is clear. There must be political and economic reform. It is not for us to interfere in the internal politics of Indonesia, but we should reiterate our commitment to the economic reform and political transparency that would help that part of the world.

The G8 did, indeed, put out a united position on India. Countries have their own positions on sanctions, and I do not know whether the right hon. Member is arguing that we should have imposed economic sanctions on India. I do not think that that is the position.

The conference was a significant success. The reason for that was that we delivered a focused agenda with a series of concrete steps. In respect of the previous European conference, after yesterday's speech, the summit would have been rather less well organised and delivered if the right hon. Gentleman had been in charge.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): Given the number of summits that the Prime Minister has attended recently, I am tempted to ask him which he would look forward to least—another summit or another round of golf.

There is much in the G8 summit that we welcome, including the proposals on sustainable growth, jobs and transnational crime, but does the Prime Minister agree that one failure that cannot be glossed over is the failure on debt restructuring? Is it not the case that the summit did not even fulfil all five conditions in the Commonwealth Finance Ministers' meeting in Mauritius? Is it not the case that the Prime Minister himself hoped and argued for more? Will he confirm that he shares at least some of the disappointment at the outcome of the 40,000 who gathered outside in what he rightly described as a dignified and powerful demonstration? May we conclude from that that the Prime Minister and the Government will wish to go further?

It is a good thing that the G8 is signing up to Kyoto, but does the Prime Minister realise that he will have to go further? He certainly should, because what has been done is not sufficient to fulfil his manifesto commitment to achieve a 20 per cent. reduction in CO_2 by 2001.

On the question of the transatlantic economic partnership, will the Prime Minister confirm that the most-favoured nation principle will be followed, and that any bilateral agreement between Europe and the United States will subsequently be thrown open to multilateral access? Otherwise, such an agreement can act as a block to free trade and not as an encouragement.

Does the Prime Minister agree that one could not have a more eloquent statement of the current state of the Conservative party than the contrast between the welcome to monetary union given by all the world's leaders at the G8 summit and the increasingly neurotic and isolationist speeches made by the leader of the Conservative party, which do good neither to his party nor to the country?

The Prime Minister: I share some of the disappointment of Jubilee 2000 on debt restructuring. I doubt whether we will ever go far enough to meet the full concerns of any group in that respect, but we would have wished to go further. Having said that, before the summit a great deal of concern was expressed that we would be unable to get an agreement at all. Some of the comment that has been made post the G8 summit has understated significantly the amount of progress that was made. The Finance Ministers are now tasked with coming back to us and saying specifically how they intend to take that further. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was here until a moment ago, will be handling that himself. The measures that he has proposed through the Mauritius mandate and elsewhere in the past few months have been immensely helpful.

We are on course to meet our Kyoto targets. We obviously have to be careful to ensure that we pursue the right policies on energy and energy conservation. That is the reason for the Budget measures and the programmes to promote conservation.

In respect of the transatlantic partnership, yes we want to see that there is multilateral access to the bilateral EU-US relationship. However, it is important to emphasise that, on any basis, that relationship is the most important trading relationship anywhere in the world. It should not be, and, as far as we have anything to do with it, it will not be, a conspiracy to shut out other people.

I agree with what the right hon. Gentleman says about monetary union, but, fortunately, that is not a matter for me.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): The Prime Minister was perfectly right at Birmingham to seek to regain the informality of Group 8 summits that prevailed in the 1970s when it was Group 4. It will not have escaped his attention that 60 per cent. of the world's gross domestic product was represented at Birmingham. It was therefore right and fitting that time should be spent on the debt, aid and health of the third world. The Prime Minister has referred to the eligibility of nation states under the debt bracket and to the new interim measures. Can he confirm what was not in the statement—that the United Nations has a commitment to reduce third-world debt by half in the next 15 years? Building on the statement made by the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) and given my right hon. Friend's own determination, will he confirm that that is a noble goal for his Government in the days, weeks, months and years ahead?

The Prime Minister: Yes, my hon. Friend is absolutely right; we did agree to meet those aid and development targets. That is obviously an important part of our own domestic policy, quite apart from our international policy. In respect of the G8 meeting, as I said, Germany has now indicated that it will follow the same course of informality next year. There was a feeling that it was far easier to get measures agreed. Incidentally, I would highlight the measures on international crime and the fact that there will be specific concrete steps taken by all the G8 countries as a result. In the end, as much as anything else, that will prove to be one of the benefits of the G8 summit in Birmingham.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): Can the Prime Minister help the House to understand exactly why it was not possible to make as much progress on third-world debt as he had hoped to make and as the Select Committee on International Development had hoped that he would make at Birmingham?

What were the arguments adduced around the table in Birmingham against being more generous and more comprehensive, speeding up the process and selling IMF gold to provide a fund against which to write off the debt? What sort of arguments do we have to use and what does the right hon. Gentleman think that we, he and his Government should be doing to persuade those who do not agree with us—Germany, Japan and the United States—to agree to the proposals put forward, very sensibly, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and himself? If he can help the House, perhaps we will make some progress.

The Prime Minister: It is not so much helping the House that I need to do, as making the case to other countries. Their concerns are obviously about money and about whether there is sufficient reform in the indebted countries to which debt relief has been granted. Our view is that the most persuasive case for more debt relief is that it is only when those countries can escape the burden of their debt that they are able to develop economically. That is not a zero-sum game in which they gain and we lose; on the contrary, it is a game in which we can both win.

Many of those countries are struggling with huge debt repayments every year, which squeeze out the spending that they require on infrastructure and other things. We made those points and we shall continue to make them.

I have said this before, but I am sure the hon. Gentleman will forgive my repeating it: it does actually matter that we got more agreement than might otherwise have been expected. I know that it was not enough for us and for others, but it was more than most people were expecting before the G8 met.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): May I thank my right hon. Friend for bringing the summit to the city of Birmingham, on behalf of the people of that city, its council and loads of companies that helped to ensure its success? May I thank him for his kind comments and invite him to commend the activities of West Midlands police, in ensuring in an unobtrusive way the security of all those taking part? Will he find a way of thanking my constituent Nyla Yousuf, who was the lead UK delegate to the parallel young people's summit taking place at the same time, for the magnificent way in which she chaired that event and the commendable communiqué on which all the delegates agreed?

The Prime Minister: I am delighted to do that on both points—to repeat my thanks to the people of Birmingham for their tremendous welcome and to the council for the way in which it organised the summit. My hon. Friend is quite right to say that the West Midlands police were superb in organising the summit. My summit experience, which has recently been very extensive, is that their work was done in the most unobtrusive way—very calm and very well policed—which made a great difference to the overall feel of the conference.

Nyla Yousuf, whom I met when I went along to the young people's G8 summit, conducted it with extraordinary skill. If she carries on doing that for some years, I can well see her being in a position to make statements like this in future.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield): I congratulate the Prime Minister on strengthening the undoubted ties that already exist between him and President Clinton. I cannot blame him for strengthening those ties, given the comments that Viktor Klima, Chancellor of Austria and the next President of the European Union, made when he said that the Prime Minister gave a summit which demonstrated how not to conduct summits—which was not very helpful to the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister said that a veto by one country has prevented the European Union and the north Atlantic countries from enjoying free trade. Does that mean that the World Trade Organisation plan and aim for world free trade by 2020 is dead in the water?

The Prime Minister: No. Indeed, it is fair to say that more than one country objected to what Sir Leon Brittan was proposing. I did not accept those objections, but they were based on those countries' desire to do things through the WTO. However, we believed that it would have been perfectly consistent with that to have had the transatlantic trade deal as well. I do, however, stress, as I did a moment ago, that we made considerable progress with the transatlantic economic partnership—it was not as much as we wanted, but it was significant progress—and, especially because of the additional measures in relation to sanctions and extra-territoriality, we made more progress on those things at the EU-US summit than we have made for very many years.

In respect of strengthening ties with the United States, I think it is always in this country's interests to have strong relations with the US.

Mr. John Cryer (Hornchurch): Bearing in mind the Prime Minister's support for free trade, will he nevertheless accept that there are some things that we cannot allow to move freely around the world, such as white asbestos, which is an especially deadly substance? Will he look toward some type of control, perhaps extending to a ban, on the importing of white asbestos?

The Prime Minister: That is under consideration both in this country and in the European Union, although we have given an—I believe, justified—undertaking to Canada and other countries that produce white asbestos that we shall proceed on the basis of the scientific evidence. That scientific evidence exists; we are analysing it, and we shall make our views known when that analysis is complete.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex): May I thoroughly endorse the Prime Minister's words in his statement that "economic reform can be soundly based only where political legitimacy exists. That requires political accountability and transparency, too"?

Can he not see that those are precisely the criteria that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition seeks to apply to the future management of the single currency in Europe, because it will lack political legitimacy, transparency and accountability, and is therefore likely to be unstable?

The Prime Minister: I do not want to intrude on the private debate between various members of the Conservative party, but I must say that it is bizarre to claim that monetary union lacks the support of the countries joining it; it has the support of their democratically elected Governments. As far as this country is concerned, we have made it clear that it will be subject to a referendum.

It would be very, very foolish of Conservative Members to get themselves into the position of hoping that monetary union fails, because it will not be in anyone's interests if it fails. The history of the past few years is that Conservative Members have said, "It will never happen. If it happens, only a few countries will take part. If there are more countries, it will all fall apart very quickly." They have been wrong at every juncture.

The accountability lies in the procedures that have been set out in the Maastricht treaty.

Mr. Jenkin indicated dissent.

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman may shake his head, but I remind him that it was negotiated by the Prime Minister of the Conservative Government, under whom he served as a Member of Parliament.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Will the Prime Minister accept that the origins of the debt burden of the poorest countries are sky-rocketing interest rates and consistently falling prices for basic commodities and basic agricultural products? Does he further accept that this issue must be revisited urgently, to ensure, first, a massive write-off of the totally unjust and immoral debts that the poorest African countries are burdened with, and, secondly, a system of price adjustments to ensure that the poorest countries receive fair prices for the products that they produce, and that huge profits do not continue to be made in the west on the basis of cheap products from overseas?

The Prime Minister: I think that what would help the poorest countries most would be to start opening out some of the world trading system, especially in relation to agriculture. As I said at the GATT anniversary conference in Geneva yesterday, that would do a tremendous amount of good for many of those countries.

In respect of debt relief for those countries, I shall not repeat myself, but yes, we do want more debt relief to go to the heavily indebted countries. We want them all in that initiative by the year 2000. There are now provisions for interim relief. I gather that six of those countries already qualify for some £5.6 billion of relief. The creditors of the Paris club have already forgiven $8 billion. It is important that we carry on with that process. It is not moving as fast as we should like, but some progress is being made. Some of the comments that I have read in the past few days, effectively suggesting that the debt relief package has been rolled backwards as a result of the G8, are wrong. It has not been pushed forward as much as it should be, but it has been moved forward.

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park): Is the Prime Minister aware that every day 16,000 people are infected with the AIDS virus and, of the $18 billion a year that is spent on research into and treatment and prevention of that disease, only 1 per cent. is spent on developing an AIDS vaccine? Does he accept that the G8 summit went a very small way indeed in encouraging research into the AIDS vaccine, and will he give his support to all the people who say that the development of such a vaccine is the only way in which we shall conquer the world epidemic?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I agree with the hon. Lady. As she knows, we included in the communiqué a specific passage pledging ourselves to "continue our efforts to reduce the global scourge of AIDS through vaccine development, preventive programmes and appropriate therapy, and by our continued support for UNAIDS."

We also specifically welcomed the French proposal for the so-called therapeutic solidarity initiative, and other proposals for the prevention and treatment of AIDS. In addition, we have requested that our experts come back with a study on the feasibility of their implementation, plus the additional measures that we need to take to ensure that a greater amount of the research is specifically directed at the developing world. Again, that is at least something.

Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): I return my right hon. Friend to the question asked by the Chairman of the Select Committee on International Development, the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells), on the reasons why Japan and Germany specifically were identified with those who seemed to be resisting a new debt initiative. My right hon. Friend referred to their demands for reform. To what specific areas of reform are they alluding? What do they want that they cannot have at the moment?

The Prime Minister: We are all agreed in the sense that any money, whether by way of aid or debt relief—any assistance going to the developing countries, particularly the heavily indebted ones—should go under a regime which ensures that the money goes for the purposes for which it is required, and that economic reform programmes are in place that allow the best use to be made of the assistance that has been given. Some countries feel more strongly than others that not sufficient is being done in that direction, and some countries feel that there is a financial problem with the amount of aid and debt relief that can be given. But it is wrong to single out particular countries in a particular way.

It is true to say that international discussion on this issue, particularly after the Mauritius mandate, which was agreed by our Chancellor and pushed through by him, has particularly advanced the process. It is just not advancing as quickly as we should like. We shall have a chance to return to that in other international forums, and we will return to it. We have tried during this past period to push on significantly the measures proposed to aid those developing countries, and we are doing that not merely out of compassion for the developing world, but because, in the end, it is solidly in our interests to do so.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant): I congratulate the Prime Minister on his boldness in going beyond his Secretary of State in appearing to say in response to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition that he expects the new deal to reduce the number of workless households. Will he now say what sort of effect he expects?

The Prime Minister: It has been set out many times. As a result of the new deal, thousands of young people are coming off benefit and going into work. One of the worst legacies of the previous Government was the large number of long-term unemployed young people who had never worked in their lives. It requires a special programme to get them off benefit and into some form of work. We are pushing it through as much as we can. Already many thousands of youngsters are off benefit and in work, which I think is a good thing. I do not know why the hon. Gentleman opposes it.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): Further to the point made by the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells), the Chairman of the Select Committee on International Development, does my right hon. Friend agree that it is unacceptable for any country to have to spend more on the repayment of debt than on its health and education programmes? That puts into perspective the girns that we regularly hear from the Opposition on those topics in relation to our own country. When other nations at the G8 summit speak of reform in those countries, to what extent do they recognise that when people are living in such a deep state of poverty, reform is unlikely? As Bertolt Brecht famously said, a man is only human—he must eat before he can think.

The Prime Minister: That is why we want to take the process further. It is correct to say that we must make sure that the money that we put in—for example, into post-conflict countries—is going into countries that are prepared to reform. For example, in Geneva yesterday I met a Minister from the Rwandan Government, who specifically thanked us for the work that we have been doing. Work is being done, but we need to go further and do more.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I warmly welcome the Prime Minister's positive and rational support for the Jubilee 2000 campaign. There is no doubt that on-going action is necessary, and I am sure that he will get support from all parts of the House for what we seek to achieve.

Did the Prime Minister see the television news coverage of the desperate famine in south Sudan, the passive acceptance of their plight by the people of that country, and the apparent inability of the world to provide them with food help, even when there are huge surpluses in Europe alone? Will the Prime Minister use his office as President of the EU to co-ordinate a campaign to get food to the people of south Sudan as soon as possible, to prevent thousands of unnecessary deaths?

The Prime Minister: I agree totally with those sentiments, and I saw those pictures. We have already used our position as the presidency of the EU to step up significantly the amount of aid that we are giving, and, on our own account, we have pledged several million pounds more in the past few weeks.

Again, however, it is also important to achieve the necessary political change. Some of the humanitarian aid is not getting through as it should, not because the will is lacking to get the aid through, but because the aid is being prevented from getting through. It is important that we make the necessary provision to aid famine in those countries, and, at the same time, make it clear that we require a process of political reform so that the money and the aid that we are getting in go to the people who really need it. However, we will carry on looking to see what more we can do to relieve the terrible suffering of the people there.

Ms Tess Kingham (Gloucester): Our Government, under their ethical foreign policy, have taken the view that it is best to engage directly with countries such as Indonesia and China. That view is obviously not taken by the United States in relation to Cuba, which it has cast into the outer wilderness. Can my right hon. Friend tell the House whether we have made that case to the US Government? Have we asked them to take a leaf out of our book and to engage directly with the Government of Cuba, to have a productive dialogue and to bring Cuba into the world community rather than casting it aside?

The Prime Minister: Obviously, American foreign policy is a matter for the United States. We have always made it clear that we disagree with the extra-territoriality provisions in the Helms-Burton Act and other legislation. The European Union shares that position. I hope that, over time, there will be greater acceptance of Cuba into the world, and also greater acceptance by Cuba of proper democratic political reform. The two things must ultimately go together.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): In the detail of the European Union-United States communiqué there is an important and welcome reference to increased co-operation to counter chemical and biological terrorism. If we are to avoid the absurd over-reaction that we witnessed earlier in the year when the Home Secretary sensibly issued a routine warning to ports, does the Prime Minister agree that we need an improved public education programme that will tell people exactly what is going on? Is that envisaged as part of the welcome move that has been described?

The Prime Minister: I cannot answer that point in detail, so I shall write to the hon. Gentleman and tell him what specific steps we are taking. He is right to say that our general purpose is to ensure that people receive as much information as possible in a way that does not alarm them or generate scare stories that are no good for anyone.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: Order. Seven Labour Back Benchers are still standing. I hope that they will put their points briefly to the Prime Minister, who has been at the Dispatch Box for a very long time.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): When my right hon. Friend strides across the world stage, will he remember that, on the question of debt relief, it is important not to repeat the experiences of the past 18 years when the Tory Government wrote off the debts of the top four clearing banks—NatWest, Midland, Barclays and Lloyds—to the tune of £5 billion? This time, let us make sure that we use that £5 billion—if we can find the money by getting rid of the Tory spending plans—to write off the debts of under-developed countries.

The Prime Minister: I agree with those sentiments entirely.

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone): Very speedily, may I say that I listened to what the Prime Minister said about the progress that has been made in helping the heavily indebted countries? Does he agree that, if we are to achieve the target of halving the world's poverty by 2015, the G8 must adopt a much more realistic approach? Will he work continually to inject that realism?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I agree with my hon. Friend. That is why we shall continue to try to make progress on two fronts. Greater debt relief, forgiveness of debt and aid to the developing world will be matched by the institutions through which that aid is channelled putting in place the necessary economic reforms. Countries can take advantage of their often enormous natural resources only if they are freed from some of their burden of debt and pursue the right economic policies. They could be wealthy trading partners with the rest of the world if they were given the chance. The combination of debt relief and political reform offers the best way forward.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): Does my right hon. Friend think that the G8 has done everything possible to make the Government of Pakistan understand that, however justified they may feel in responding with a nuclear test and although there may be public pressure within the country to conduct such a test, it is in the best interests of Pakistan not to respond in that way? Should not the G8 send a clear message that India and Pakistan must sit around a table and resolve the problem of Kashmir? That would unlock the logjam and enable them to look at the real problems facing those two countries and that part of the world.

The Prime Minister: Of course, we want to see progress in respect of that dispute, but those countries must work it out for themselves. In respect of the possibility of Pakistan conducting nuclear tests, I hope, even at this stage, that it will refrain from doing so. If it did, it would receive enormous support and congratulations from around the world. We remember the example set by Brazil and Argentina, and I hope that Pakistan will take a leaf out of their book.

As the President of the United States said on Monday, India is an immensely important and powerful country. Its potential is virtually unlimited. I say to the Indian Government and the Indian people—they are friends of this country and we feel the great bond and tie of history between our two countries—that there are other and better ways of enhancing their international standing and security than nuclear testing.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire): As a follow-up to the previous question, may I ask the Prime Minister to elaborate further on the G8 attitude to Pakistan? What is the G8 doing to encourage Pakistan not to explode any nuclear bombs? There is a sense in which Pakistan's response is almost more important than what has taken place in India. It is often the person who is seen to retaliate who gets the red card. It would be unfortunate if Pakistan moved into that position.

The Prime Minister: I agree that our position cannot be different in respect of the two countries. We are looking, both on our own account and as President of the European Union—I know that the United States is doing the same—to find all the arguments that we can to persuade Pakistan that it does not need to follow suit with India, and that it would be better for it and world security if it did not.

Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): Will my right hon. Friend agree that the G8 should have called for political reform in Indonesia a long time ago, when Suharto was strong, rather than now, when he is weak and no longer of any use to his friends? May I ask my right hon. Friend, as leader of the European Union, whether he could not beef up the statement a bit and call for Suharto to stand down now to avoid further bloodshed and suffering in Indonesia?

The Prime Minister: We do not believe that it is for us to tell particular leaders to stand down, but we have made a strong statement in respect of political reform in Indonesia. There is no doubt that the future of Indonesia—after all, it is one of the largest countries in the world with a population of 200 million and with tremendous potential—is best secured through both economic and political reform. If that were to happen and Indonesia ended up with a more transparent financial system and a more accountable political system, its future would be extremely bright. Obviously, that is what we should be working for.

Mr. Hugh Bayley (City of York): May I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on ensuring that the communiqué made specific reference to the need for OECD countries to ratify the convention on transnational bribery? May I ask my right hon. Friend to read the United Kingdom tax inspectors' manual, which makes it clear that the fiscal regime that we inherited from the Conservatives does not make international bribery an offence in UK law, and, in many cases, makes it tax deductible? Will my right hon. Friend consider that and make the necessary changes to the law as part of our ratification process of the OECD convention?

The Prime Minister: I have to say that the Inland Revenue tax inspectors' manual has not yet found its way on to my bedtime reading list. I shall obviously try to rectify that. I do not know the answer to my hon. Friend's point offhand, but I shall certainly look into the matter and tell him.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston): The whole House will welcome the section of the communiqué on drugs trafficking. Is it likely that, as a result of that, we may see sanctions imposed on those regimes that engage directly in drugs trafficking, especially countries such as Burma that are killing our kids and systematically killing their own children and families?

The Prime Minister: We are looking at every way in which we can discourage countries from the production of drugs, especially if that has anything to do with Government encouragement. The most important thing that the G8 did was to agree a series of actions in respect of high-tech crime, international crime and money laundering in particular. It is the money laundering for the drugs trade that is its real point of vulnerability and weakness if we can attack it properly.

Vast sums—billions of dollars—move across frontiers to support the drugs trade. We have asked our Finance Ministers to come back to us with specific measures that we can take to enhance our ability to strike at money laundering. I should like to see us move eventually to a system that is accepted worldwide where we can make progress on tackling this issue. If we are to tackle the drugs problem, we need to tackle demand, which we and other countries are trying to do. We need also to attack the supply.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside): I welcome the initiative and the lead that this country has taken, particularly on debt reduction. Is my right hon. Friend able to give a commitment that this country will continue to support European and international programmes that permit the exchange of knowledge and skills between the UK, and countries and areas in the process of development or reconstruction, which would allow those countries to develop their own local and regional economies in a way that suits them, and also permit good governance to take place?

Will my right hon. Friend support that approach within the context of local Agenda 21 groups, where a variety of people in local areas work with international support to develop local economies and good governance together?

The Prime Minister: The $10 million that I announced in Geneva yesterday will be specifically for technical and other forms of assistance to allow developing countries to take advantage of a more liberal trading regime, and will be geared to ensuring that they have the best possible chance of developing precisely as my hon. Friend describes. That will certainly happen in respect of exchange programmes, which are already a big part of our education programme and which we intend to develop further.

Points of Order

4.25 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. May I take hon. Members back to Prime Minister's Question Time, when the Prime Minister appeared to tell the House that there was no rebuttal officer dealing with NHS waiting lists? I wish to point out for the record that the Secretary of State for Health gave two parliamentary answers dated 11 May to my hon. Friend the Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce). The one specifically entitled "Civil Service Rebuttal Officer" confirmed:

"The Department's communications planning unit"— which is costed at £86,000 a year—

"includes a rebuttal officer".—[Official Report, 11 May 1998; Vol. 312, c. 40.]

It goes on to describe the rebuttal officer's job. The Prime Minister may not have known that, but the record is clear.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. You and your predecessors regularly call, "Ayes to the right, Noes to the left". I therefore take it that "No" is a respectable vote in this House, whether people are right or wrong. It was regrettable today that there were those who were urging a "Yes" vote, and there was no opportunity for anyone to say no.

Madam Speaker: That is an abuse of a point of order. It is not for me to become involved in politics. The hon. Gentleman is usually a gracious Member of this House and does not normally behave in that fashion. I hope that he stands—or sits—reprimanded.

Ports of Entry (Special Status)(No. 2)

4.26 pm

Mr. Gwyn Prosser (Dover): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make provision for special status for ports of entry to the United Kingdom so far as the law affecting local government and policing is concerned; and for related purposes.

My Bill provides measures to ensure that the needs of areas of the United Kingdom that house ports of entry, be they sea ports or airports, are properly recognised. They endure special pressures in terms of additional resources for policing, social services, education, health and housing provision. Almost all our ports of entry suffer such additional burdens to a greater or lesser extent, and I am grateful to those hon. Members on both sides of the House who represent ports of entry constituencies and who either formally sponsored my Bill or gave it their support. I am sure that they will forgive me if I draw mainly on examples from my constituency and the county of Kent to illustrate the case for change.

I am privileged to represent the constituency that houses the port of Dover, the busiest ferry port in the world, which is pleased to be known as the gateway to Europe. The county of Kent and the port of Dover provide the shortest, quickest and cheapest passenger links with other parts of the European Union, and those vital transport corridors are of strategic and national importance. Last year, nearly 2 million heavy goods vehicles passed through Kent, and some 20 million passengers were handled by the port of Dover alone.

Such high concentrations of activity generate huge additional demands on the resources of police authorities, local authorities and agencies with jurisdiction over ports of entry. It is accepted that, from time to time, the appropriate authority in any part of the United Kingdom may be required to deal with extraordinary, large-scale events, but for busy ports of entry such as Dover, events that would be considered extraordinary elsewhere have become ordinary. The majority of port-related events are large scale in terms of resource demand.

Additional pressures on police include supporting the work of Customs and Excise agencies to control bootlegging and drug smuggling, dealing with the high levels of crime associated with such activities, and policing demonstrations and marches. Many ports have been picketed by animal rights protesters who object to the way in which live animals are transported and exported for food. I support the protesters, and should like that awful trade to end, but such demonstrations must be policed and the cost is high.

In recent years, ports have become the focus of every protest group that wants to publicise its point. British ports have been blockaded by British farmers protesting against the importation of meat, and French ports have been blockaded by French fishermen, dockers, farmers and truck drivers protesting about their various and numerous causes. Whichever side of the channel stoppages take place, the consequences are the same: massive, unpredictable backlogs of traffic and the need to manage that traffic. Kent police have devised plans for dealing with those recurring problems as they affect Dover, but such operations are costly.

Ports of entry have to provide support for illegal immigrants, asylum seekers and their families, which creates additional demands on local authorities. Sadly, in my constituency the presence of large groups of immigrants has given rise to social tensions in the community. Fascist groups from outside the area have sought to exploit those tensions by staging racist marches, and anti-fascist groups have confronted them. Policing such events is costly, and diverts a large number of police officers from regular duties.

Dealing with immigrants has also imposed additional pressures on ports of entry and on neighbouring areas, but the implementation of the Asylum and Immigration Act 1996 has increased them considerably by shifting responsibility for supporting asylum seekers on to local authorities. As well as meeting the requirements of the Children Act 1989 and the National Assistance Act 1948, and meeting other costs of social care, local authorities have to meet the costs of educational facilities for children and adults in such groups.

The influx of immigrants from eastern European countries into Dover and surrounding constituencies has put enormous pressures on Kent county council. Although specific grants are in place, they fall far short of covering expenditure. That is due partly to the high thresholds that have to be exceeded to warrant payment, and partly to the limits that have been set. Last year, those limits caused Kent to suffer a shortfall of more than £1 million for its support of asylum seekers and their children. That shortfall should be covered under the council's existing budget. Grants by no means cover the cost of caring for asylum seekers, so other services in Kent suffer.

Similarly, district councils in ports of entry are responsible for housing asylum seekers and for providing bed-and-breakfast accommodation. Changes made to immigration legislation in 1996 substantially increased their costs. In the last full year before the 1996 Act took effect, Dover district council's expenditure on asylum seekers for bed-and-breakfast accommodation was £1,169. The estimated cost for the current year is £47,000.

Special grants are available to certain categories of local authority to compensate for those additional costs, but, for some reason, district councils such as Dover do not qualify for such reimbursement. Local authorities with jurisdiction over ports of entry are responsible for administering and enforcing port health regulations, the cost of which is increasing. For Dover district council, that amounts to more than £60,000 a year.

There is no recognition of those disproportionately high costs in the rate support grant, and the current method of business rate collection from port authorities does not directly benefit local councils. Many other extraordinary costs fall disproportionately on police authorities and local authorities housing ports of entry.

My Bill seeks to remedy those difficulties by providing special status to authorities that house ports of entry, which will recognise their additional expenditure and provide them with appropriate support. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Gwyn Prosser, Mr. Andrew Mackinlay, Mr. Ivan Henderson, Laura Moffatt, Mr. Derek Wyatt, Ms Jackie Lawrence, Dr. Stephen Ladyman, Mr. Nick Ainger, Mr. Robert Syms, Mrs. Louise Ellman, Dr. Alan Whitehead and Mr. Norman Baker.

PORTS OF ENTRY (SPECIAL STATUS) (NO. 2)

Mr. Gwyn Prosser accordingly presented a Bill to make provision for special status for ports of entry to the United Kingdom so far as the law affecting local government and policing is concerned; and for related purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 3 July, and to be printed [Bill 192].

Orders of the Day

Human Rights Bill [Lords]

Considered in Committee.

[SIR ALAN HASELHURST in the Chair]

Clause 1

THE CONVENTION AND THE FIRST PROTOCOL

4.36 pm

Sir Nicholas Lyell (North-East Bedfordshire): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 8, leave out '12 and'.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 99, in schedule 1, page 18, line 23, at end insert—'Article 13—

EFFECTIVE REMEDIES

Everyone whose rights and freedoms as set forth in this Convention are violated shall have an effective remedy before a national authority notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by persons acting in an official capacity.'.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: The amendments are exploratory. They would insert into the Bill article 13 of the convention. The reason why we wish to explore the omission of that article from the Bill and the difference that might be made if it were inserted relates to our primary aims for this legislation, which I hope the Home Secretary will say the Government share. However, even if they do share them, we doubt whether they have achieved them yet.

We have already expressed our doubts about the wisdom of incorporation of the convention, but, if there is to be incorporation, I hope that these three points are uncontroversial. First, one of the benefits of incorporation is that British judges would have an opportunity to have input into the fashioning of convention law. Some time ago, I wrote that I believed that, whatever my other reservations, that was an advantage of incorporation.

Secondly, the fashioning of convention law and its expression in our domestic law should be the combined efforts of the judiciary and Parliament. It is for the judiciary to state where and how our existing laws, procedures or remedies are inadequate in law or incompatible with the convention, but it is then for Parliament to decide, in cases where legislation is involved—either primary or secondary—how the matter should be properly corrected. That is why we broadly support the Government's approach to judicial remedies and the power to take remedial action that is contained in clauses 8 and 10.

Thirdly, we do not want the judiciary creating a separate body of law for the United Kingdom which may go further than would the commission or court at Strasbourg. Although we sometimes grumble at the Strasbourg institutions, and there are judgments that we respectfully criticise and seek to alter, we should recognise that they are usually careful and cautious in their approach to interpreting the convention. In recent years in particular, they have given a great deal of weight to margin of appreciation, which they and our own judiciary should be careful to do, and we respect the way in which they do so.

To help achieve those three objectives, we shall concentrate later in the debate on, for example, our dislike of the fast-track procedure and on the fact that the Bill lacks any device—I use that word carefully—that would enable the Government or a public authority, if aggrieved by a ruling of our domestic courts, to cause the issue to be taken on to Strasbourg. Such a device would effectively give a right of appeal not only to the citizen, who already has such a right, but to government and public authorities, which currently lack that right. We hope to hear in due course that the Government agree with us on those aims and that approach, and that they will allow us to assist them in amending the Bill in that way.

To revert more narrowly to the amendments, I ask the Government to clarify what they see as the difference, if any, between article 13 being expressly contained in the Bill and it being left out, as it now is. I invite Ministers to listen and watch carefully, because I suspect that we are about to start dancing on the head of a pin.

When the question was asked by Lord Lester in another place, on 18 November, the Lord Chancellor, commencing his dance—if I may put it that way—first replied:

"the courts may have regard to Article 13."

Some 10 lines further on in the Official Report, in answer to my noble Friend Lord Campbell of Alloway, the Lord Chancellor said:

"to incorporate expressly Article 13 may lead to the courts fashioning remedies about which we know nothing".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 18 November 1997; Vol. 583, c. 477.]

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): My right hon. and learned Friend has been discussing the opinions of their lordships. Has he learnt anything from reading the Official Report of the other place that tells us the substance of the reasoning, if there is any reasoning, behind the Government's approach as set out by the Lord Chancellor?

Sir Nicholas Lyell: My hon. and learned Friend anticipates accurately the points that I am about to expand. The simple answer to his question is no, but let me seek, for the benefit of the Home Secretary and the Minister, to explain why, in the hope that at least here, in the light of a summer's day, we may have some elucidation from the Government.

As I said, when the question was raised in the Lords, the Lord Chancellor gave two seemingly inconsistent answers within about 15 lines of debate. He went on to rebuke, if that is not too harsh a word, Lord Ackner, a former Law Lord, for "nourishing suspicions"—a delightful expression—on the issue. However, he then purported to comfort my noble Friend Lord Kingsland, the shadow Lord Chancellor, by stating:

"I believe that the English law is rich in remedies and I cannot conceive of a case in which English law under Clause 8(1) would be unable to provide an effective remedy."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 18 November 1997; Vol. 583, c. 479.]

The House will instantly recall that Lord Lester said that he won Pepper v. Hart, but I was on the other side. Pepper v. Hart was not exactly a case that one won or lost, but one in which the House of Lords—which was straining at the leash to do so—decided that it would be illuminating to their Lordships, in their judicial capacity, and to the courts generally if they were able to examine the words of a Minister in cases of ambiguity in a Bill, to determine whether they could ascertain how to resolve that ambiguity.

It has always seemed to me ironic that their Lordships chose a case in which the junior Minister in a Labour Government—who was a highly respected Member, and subsequently a Chairman of the Treasury Select Committee—had, around midnight, been answering some 90 questions in two hours in the course of a debate on the Finance Bill, in which he had arrayed against him 14 future Cabinet Ministers and two future Chancellors. None the less, Pepper v. Hart was thought likely to be a case in which examination of the Minister's words would be helpful.

4.45 pm

The point about Pepper v. Hart is that in it, it was ruled that one may examine a Minister's comments. Lord Lester—always astute on such points—has decided for himself that, having heard the current Lord Chancellor expatiating on the meaning of clause 8(1), he could take it that judges, having read the debate in the other place, would arrive at the simple conclusion that it was Parliament's intention that the courts could have regard to Article 13 of the Convention.

For completeness, one notes—as the Lord Chancellor pointed out—that, under clause 8(4),

"In determining—

(a) whether to award damages, or the amount of an award", the Bill already provides that

"the court must take into account the principles applied by the European Court of Human Rights in relation to the award of compensation under article 41 of the Convention."

The Home Secretary will have instantly realised that, as the Bill seems to say that courts can take those points into account in awarding damages, applying another legal principle—expressio unius est exclusio alterius—presumably they are not entitled to take them into account in other circumstances. However, the Lord Chancellor did not go into that particular detail. Nevertheless, as I said, it seems to suggest that, in other respects, one does not take article 13 into account.

The Home Secretary might again be able to enlighten us on whether there is any difference between the meaning of the words "taking into account" and "having regard". I think that, by now, I have made good my point that the head of the pin on which we are dancing is not all that large.

I conclude with two simple questions. Does it make any difference whether article 13 is expressly contained in the Bill? If so, what difference does it make, and why?

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Jack Straw): I congratulate the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Sir N. Lyell) on a very elegant, well-informed and entertaining speech. However, in the course of this short debate, I hope to show that—on the omission of article 13—far from dancing on the head of a pin, Labour Members have been waltzing with ease around a very large dance floor.

Although the right hon. and learned Gentleman made some hay with some selected quotations from my right hon. Friend the Lord Chancellor in the other place, it is fair to tell him that, in the course of that debate, Lord Lester of Herne Hill withdrew his amendment, seeming to be satisfied—he did not press his amendment to a vote—by explanations offered by the Lord Chancellor.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: The Home Secretary is right to say that Lord Lester appeared to be satisfied, but that was precisely because of his interpretation of the Bill, which, as I have just explained, was that, notwithstanding that article 13 was omitted, by applying Pepper v. Hart, the courts could none the less have regard to it.

Mr. Straw: I hope to explain, fully consistently with what my learned Friend the Lord Chancellor said, why we thought that, on balance, it would be better to omit article 13 than to include it.

In response to the first three general points made by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, of course we support him. The case for incorporation, among others, is that British judges can be involved in the development of jurisprudence. I happen to think that that will be extremely helpful, both because they obviously have a better understanding of circumstances in this country than judges from other jurisdictions, and because we have a body of people in the higher judiciary with a degree of skill and professionalism that is in some ways unrivalled throughout the world. It is important that that skill should be utilised in the interpretation of a profoundly important convention and a profoundly important Bill.

Secondly, the right hon. and learned Gentleman felt that it was right that we should incorporate the convention in a way that fashioned the law through the combined efforts of the judiciary and Parliament. In opposition, when we first looked into the matter, we certainly tried to achieve that.

On the third point, we did not want to incorporate the convention in a way that challenged the supremacy of Parliament and its sovereignty. I have noticed some correspondence and articles in the newspapers suggesting that we should have gone down that route, and that, if we did not, it would be a milk-and-water version of incorporation.

When reference is made to Bills of Rights not only in the United States but in jurisdictions such as Canada, what is forgotten is that those jurisdictions have written constitutions and that there is what amounts to a superior law, which is brought into effect by the procedures for change in the constitution itself. We do not have that facility, and I do not suggest that we should. As an alternative, we have the sovereignty of Parliament, and therefore it is of profound importance that the ultimate judge of what should or should not be a right and a responsibility in the United Kingdom must be this Parliament and no other body.

In the discussions that took place among ministerial colleagues, we thought about this matter long and hard. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman does not mind me saying so, I was pleased and to some extent amused that, despite his hesitancy about the overall principle of incorporation, he is now proposing a purer form of it than some would say we have put in the Bill. We decided it was inappropriate to include article 13, for the following reasons.

First and foremost, it is the Bill that gives effect to article 13, so there was an issue of duplication. The Bill sets out clearly how the convention rights will be given further effect in our domestic law, and what remedies are to be available when a court or tribunal finds that a person has been the victim of an unlawful act. We will be discussing those clauses in more detail later, but I will briefly summarise the relevant provisions.

Clause 3 requires legislation to be read and given effect, as far as possible, in accordance with convention rights. Clause 6 makes it unlawful for a public authority to act in a way that is incompatible with a convention right. Clause 7 enables the victim of an unlawful act to rely on his or her convention rights in any legal proceedings, or to bring proceedings on convention grounds. Clause 8 provides that a court or tribunal, when it finds that a public authority has acted unlawfully, may grant the victim such relief or remedy, or make such order, within its jurisdiction as it considers just and appropriate.

Those are powerful provisions, as is acknowledged. In our judgment, they afford ample protection for individuals' rights under the convention. In particular, clause 8(1) gives the courts considerable scope for doing justice when unlawful acts have been committed. Indeed, no one has been able to suggest any respect in which the Bill is deficient in providing effective remedies to those who have been victims of an unlawful act.

The amendment—this was to some extent implicit in the right hon. and learned Gentleman's closing remarks—would add nothing to the Bill, which brings me to our second reason for opposing it. If we were to include article 13 in the Bill in addition to the remedies provided in clauses 3, 6, 7 and 8, the question would inevitably arise what the courts would make of the amendment, which, on the face of it, contains nothing new. I suggest that the amendment would either cause confusion or prompt the courts to act in ways not intended by the Bill—for example, by creating remedies beyond those available in clause 8. Whatever the outcome, the result would be undesirable.

Mr. Garnier: Will the right hon. Gentleman give one or two examples of the remedies he envisages that would go beyond those set out in clause 8?

Mr. Straw: In considering article 13, the courts could decide to grant damages in more circumstances than we had envisaged. We had to consider that matter carefully, because of the effect on the public purse. We are dealing with breaches of rights by public bodies, some of which are financed by Government—whose purse is, apparently, endless and seamless—whereas others do not have access to the full resources of Her Majesty's Government and the Bank of England printing works in my home town of Loughton in Essex. We had to think carefully about the scope of the remedies that we should provide.

Our overall judgment is that the amendment, which would incorporate article 13, would not add anything much, but might create uncertainties. We see no particular reason to accept it.

Mr. Garnier: Does not that argument fly in the face of the terms of article 13, which concerns everyone's right under the convention to an effective remedy? The right hon. Gentleman's point about the public purse and defendants or respondents to complaints who do not have such a deep pocket suggests that some people will be denied an effective remedy. If article 13 is not incorporated, an effective remedy will be denied those who are not, for example, taking action against a Government or public body with a huge purse.

Mr. Straw: We do not believe that those people will be denied an effective remedy. Indeed, as I said, very few people have suggested that the remedies we are providing will be ineffective—however, they must be balanced and proportionate. Ultimately, as the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Bedfordshire rightly said, courts will have to take account of jurisprudence laid down by the court in Strasbourg.

I accept that we are arguing a fine point, but I suspect that, if the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Bedfordshire had been pursuing the Bill in government, as easily he could have been, he would have come to the same judgment as we did—that there is little point including in a Bill additional wording whose probable effect would be not to make any difference, but whose possible effect would be to add uncertainty.

That is our judgment on a fine point, and I accept that the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Bedfordshire may consider it a moot point. No doubt I have spoken less eloquently than the Lord Chancellor and others in the Lords.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: I am most grateful to the Home Secretary, who is speaking most clearly. I entirely agree that, with regard to damages, the Bill is perfectly straightforward, and that clause 8(4) expressly states that principles applied by the European Court of Human Rights should be taken into account.

What is to be made of the Lord Chancellor's statement in which he said:

> "My response to the second part of the question posed by the noble Lord, Lord Lester, is that the courts may have regard to Article 13."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 18 November 1997; Vol. 583, c. 477.]?

Lord Lester has taken that as Pepper v. Harting—if I may create a new verb—the result that he wants, allowing the courts to do what they could not otherwise do.

5 pm

The Home Secretary, not the Lord Chancellor, is in charge of the Bill. Will he clarify whether the courts are to be able to use the Lord Chancellor's words to have regard to article 13, or whether they should simply read the Bill, which makes no such reference? Of course, I mean no disrespect to the Lord Chancellor.

Mr. Straw: Me neither. I shall certainly talk to the Lord Chancellor, but I think that he had in mind no more but no less than the fact that the courts would apply clause 2(1), which says:

"A court or tribunal determining a question which has arisen under this Act in connection with a Convention right must take into account"— not "have regard to"—

"any . . . judgment, decision, declaration or advisory opinion of the European Court of Human Rights . . . whenever made or given, so far as, in the opinion of the court or tribunal, it is relevant to the proceedings in which that question has arisen."

Of course, there is convention jurisprudence on article 13, as on other articles. Lord Lester made that point in respect of the Chahal case, which turned on article 13, and said that it would be taken into account and that regard would be had to it. That point is as much in our favour—suggesting that the specific inclusion of article 13 is unnecessary—as it is in the favour of the right hon. and learned Member for North–East Bedfordshire.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: I do not want to be tedious, but the Home Secretary will recognise that clause 2(1) concerns

"any . . . judgment, decision, declaration or advisory opinion", while my question concerns whether the courts should have regard to article 13. I think that he is saying that he does not agree that the courts should have regard to article 13, as Lord Lester would have wished.

Mr. Straw: Let me try again to answer the point. The convention has been international law for 50 years, and any tribunal will consider the bare text of any original convention by considering the way in which its application has developed—there is, indeed, a requirement to do so—so, in practice, the courts must take account of the large body of convention jurisprudence when considering remedies. Obviously, in doing so, they are bound to take judicial notice of article 13, without specifically being bound by it.

That is my judgment about the way in which the law will work. I wish future Judicial Committees of the House of Lords luck in working through these debates. One sometimes wonders about the wisdom of the Pepper v. Hart judgment in terms of the work that it has given the higher judiciary. It is a fine point, but since we saw that there was no purpose, and indeed that there were some dangers, in including article 13, we thought that it was best omitted.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross): Surely, if the Government had wished no consideration to be given to the jurisprudence that has developed on article 13, it would have been necessary to include a specific derogation from the provisions of clause 2(1). Without that derogation, it seems inevitable that how the courts have developed article 13 rights will be a matter that the court not only may consider, but ought to consider.

Mr. Straw: With respect, that is the point that I sought to make. The distance between us is small.

Mr. Garnier: If the Home Secretary agrees with the point just made by the right hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (Mr. Maclennan), why not include article 13 so that there is no doubt? Then the House of Lords Judicial Committee would not have a Pepper v. Hart problem.

Mr. Straw: We think that it would create doubt. We believe that we are adequately covering the issue of remedies in clauses 3, 6, 7 and 8. We are specifically providing remedies that are understandable in English and Scots law. In determining whether a particular remedy is to be granted in respect of any action, the courts must interpret convention rights as laid down in clause 2.

If I may labour the point, we do not believe that incorporating article 13 adds anything positive to the Bill that is not already there; that covers the point about the courts having to take judicial notice of article 13 as a basic text without being bound by it. We believe that it could create unnecessary doubt, and that is why it is not sensible to accept the amendment, which I respectfully invite the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Bedfordshire to withdraw.

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): I see the logic in the arguments of both my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Sir N. Lyell). Let me refer first to my right hon. Friend's logic by saying that the convention is about rights, but has one article that says that courts should give effective remedies. Courts usually give whatever remedies they can. As far as I know, the county court cannot provide prerogative orders—at least, it did not used to be able to; perhaps it can now and I do not know it. There are certain cases in which injunctions can be granted under statute in the county court, but prerogative orders such as certiorari or mandamus are not normally issued by county courts.

Presumably, if an issue of convention rights appeared in a county court action, an English county court would not be able to grant certiorari or mandamus, although that would be an effective remedy under article 13. I understand why my right hon. Friend says that each court will grant the remedy that that court has the right to grant, but if there is a judicial review, it is unusual for the divisional court or, in civil cases, the High Court, to award damages. It can happen, but—I have not looked at the white book over the past 24 hours—it is very rare. Yet much of the work for lawyers that the incorporation of the convention will create—if it does—will be in judicial review. The High Court might declare in a judicial review case that an act contrary to the treaty was unlawful. That might not be an effective remedy. Damages might be more effective. Today, it is generally not possible to obtain damages. It may be that the declaration of unlawfulness is sufficient.

I am as baffled as—I do not say this in a derogatory sense—the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Bedfordshire was. I have read the House of Lords debates. I, too, am baffled as to why article 13 has been left out, if it does not make any difference.

My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary muttered something about the public purse and lots of money. He said that it might cost a lot. I understand that argument, but I cannot follow its logic because, according to the notes on clauses, people cannot receive more than £15,000 from the courts in Strasbourg, if anything at all. So damages are pretty restricted. I am not sure why my right hon. Friend is worried on that front, unless damages over and above the normal remedies that would be given by a court, such as prerogative orders in the case of judicial review, could be sought as an effective remedy. In cases of trespass of land, one can obtain a judgment and penny damages. That might not be an effective remedy in some cases.

Does the provision mean that I cannot normally obtain more than a penny, but that if article 13 is incorporated, I can obtain at least up to £15,000, if that is thought to be an effective remedy? I am not sure whether the word "effective" means anything at all. I have not studied the jurisprudence of the convention or the cases. Perhaps it does.

We are told that we are not incorporating the convention into English law, but we are. If we are incorporating the convention into English law, I can well understand that if an action goes through the normal English, Welsh or Scottish courts, it is tidier to say that the court can grant only the remedy that that court can give in the generality of cases. It makes the position rather complicated perhaps, and fussy—I do not know—to enable, say, a county court to give a remedy in a case under the convention when the court cannot give the remedy normally.

Perhaps all this is a consequence of the Government's fiction. It is a fiction. We shall return to this subject later, but it is a fiction. The Government say that they are not affecting the sovereignty of Parliament; that they are not incorporating the convention; that they are not doing anything at all. It is a clever fiction. Lawyers understand fictions. We approve of fictions. We think that fictions are great things because lawyers have made a lot of money over the centuries from fictions. This is a fiction and a clever one.

I can see the logic of what my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is saying within the terms of the fiction—that parliamentary sovereignty is not affected, we are not really incorporating it and that it will all be done under English law. If we look at the interpretation provisions, we have to interpret according to the statute unless it is clearly contrary to the terms of the convention. It is very well done, and we all understand that.

All that I am asking my right hon. Friend in this rambling, short intervention is what he means when he says that he is worried about the public purse. Is he worried that all those lawyers—all those fat cats who sit every day in the judicial review courts and make a lot of money—will obtain damages against local authorities, damages for misfeasance, damages against the Home Office and other Government Departments, over and above any mere declaration that might satisfy pride but does not help the pocket of the litigant?

I do not know whether my right hon. Friend intends to speak again. If he tells me that I am talking nonsense, I shall not be happy, but I shall accept it, so perhaps he could deal with the point that I have made.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield): I listened carefully and with great interest to the comments of the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies). Although I approach the matter from a slightly different angle, I agree with him. I find a lack of logic behind the decision to exclude article 13 from the Bill. I listened carefully to what the Home Secretary had to say, and I understand the thrust of it. If it is the case, which it must be, that the courts will have to have regard to article 13, to exclude it from the text of the Bill but to infer that the courts will still have to have regard to it, must be a fertile field for argument and money for lawyers when human rights cases come to court.

I do not see how the article will cause exceptional problems if it is included in the Bill. It will be clear that where no domestic remedy may exist in damages, one will have to be created. That is something that the common law has been rather adept at doing for a long time.

5.15 pm

I am bound to say that when I was first contemplating how best to incorporate the European convention, it struck me that one way was simply to say that it was part of our common law, full stop, and leave it to the judiciary to formulate the remedies. That is what is being done—the Home Secretary may agree—with article 13. It is being left up in the air for the judiciary to make a formulation in so far as one may be required. It is in fact going to be part of our common law, but in a furtive way, as the right hon. Member for Llanelli said.

I find a lack of logic. It is perhaps an exercise in semantics, because the article will be included anyway when the time comes. However, when something is left out, we can rely on the fact that lawyers in court will latch on to it and formulate an argument that damages cannot be awarded. I can foresee a circumstance wherein the domestic remedy cannot be found in damages. Some court or other will say that it cannot award them. Then there will be the problem of going to appeal and possibly ending up in Strasbourg, when it is abundantly clear in the convention that an effective remedy of damages must be found. I question why article 13 is not included. I accept that at the end of the day it will be included by one means or another, but as we are trying to draft sensible legislation, I must raise a question mark.

I invite the Home Secretary not to give us an answer today but to go away and think about whether it would not be better to include the article in the Bill. Later we shall be discussing other areas in which we have tinkered around with the wording of the convention, some of which cause me far more disquiet, but I find it difficult to understand the logic behind excluding article 13.

Mr. Garnier: I wish briefly to pose a question or two to the Home Secretary. I could not agree more with what my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) just said. I hope that the Home Secretary will allow us another opportunity to revisit this subject. We do not want to overdo the dancing on a pin, be it a stately saraband or a rock and roll, depending on which side of the argument one happens to be on.

The Home Secretary gave us two reasons for not incorporating article 13 in the Bill. First, he said that it would be duplication. Secondly, he said that it would create confusion and perhaps additional remedies that were not intended. I draw his attention to the terms of article 13:

"Everyone whose rights and freedoms as set forth in this Convention are violated shall have an effective remedy before a national authority notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by persons acting in an official capacity."

The right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) asked about the jurisprudence on the word "effective" and we could sit here all night discussing what "effective" means, but I should like to bring the Home Secretary home—if I may use that expression—to clause 8(4), which deals with the way in which a court should determine whether to award damages. It states that, in doing so,

"the court must take into account the principles applied by the European Court of Human Rights in relation to the award of compensation under Article 41".

One can revolve around that for ever, but marry it up with the words "effective remedy" and envisage a case in which a citizen wishes to recover damages from a Government institution—in this country, the Crown.

I am sure that I shall be corrected if I am wrong, but as I understand the common law of England it is not possible to get exemplary damages against the Crown; one can get exemplary damages against a chief officer of police or in other circumstances, but one is not entitled to exemplary damages against the Crown. Article 13, whether or not it appears in the Bill, suggests that we should all be entitled to an effective remedy, but if that remedy involves an application for exemplary or punitive damages against the Crown to compensate, the complainant in such cases will be denied. It may be that I am completely wrong on that point, but I should be most grateful if the Home Secretary could either remove my confusion or, as my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield said, allow us to return to the issue on another occasion.

Mr. Straw: Let me answer—I hope to their satisfaction, but perhaps not—the points that right hon. and hon. Members have raised. My right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) asked what the problem is and raised the issue of uncertainty. It was that uncertainty that concerned us when we sat down and came to a finely balanced judgment as to whether article 13 should or should not be omitted.

I should say that I am recommending that the Committee should not accept the amendment. I shall reflect on the arguments that have been advanced, because the point is needle fine—everybody is agreed on the objective; the question is merely one of how to achieve that objective. We have come to one judgment, but I would not for a moment suggest that that is because we on the Treasury Bench are possessed of better judgment on such matters than other right hon. and hon. Members, who have far greater experience of the law than I have.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli asked whether damages would ever be available. In paragraph 2.6 of the White Paper, we said:

"In some cases, the right course may be for the decision of the public authority in the particular case to be quashed. In other cases, the only appropriate remedy may be an award of damages."

The White Paper went on to make the point that the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) made, which is that in considering an award of damages on conventional grounds, the courts are to take account of the principles applied, not so much by the convention, but by the European Court of Human Rights. In that way, people will be able to receive compensation from a domestic court equivalent to that which they would have received in Strasbourg. My right hon. Friend will know from the explanatory and financial memorandum to the Bill, on page iii, that the awards at Strasbourg

"tend to range from £5,000 to £15,000 and are not made simply because the Court finds a violation of the Convention."

Mr. Denzil Davies: I understand that, but it was my right hon. Friend who, quite properly, muttered about the public purse. What has the public purse got to do with the incorporation of article 13 if all those damages can be issued anyway? My impression is that he was saying that the Government were worried that, if they put article 13 in the Bill, it would cost far more money. My question is, how?

Mr. Straw: We might have been overworrying, but we did worry about the matter. My right hon. Friend was a Treasury Minister, so he will know that there is always concern about the financial effects of Bills, and quite right too. It is far more difficult to predict the financial effect of this Bill than of almost any other Bill coming before the House, because we are charting new waters and do not know exactly how it will develop. Our concern was to ensure that the courts applied themselves to the jurisprudence of the convention and that they did not, for example, develop awards of damages that exceeded the convention. It was for that reason that we took the view that the best way of applying article 13 in the context of incorporating the convention was to spell out in specific clauses how those remedies should be made available. Therefore, we take from article 13 that and then set out in the Bill what those effective remedies should be and how they can be accessed.

"Everyone whose rights and freedoms . . . are violated shall have an effective remedy"

The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) is to some extent right to say that the argument is about semantics and that it is probable that, at the end of the day, we shall have been arguing about a distinction without a difference. On balance, we came to the view that it was better and created more certainty to omit the precise text of article 13 from the Bill, but to apply it in the ways set out, not only in the clauses that provide for remedies, but through the force of clause 2. As I said, it is a finely balanced judgment.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: I am most grateful to the Home Secretary for giving way, because it gives me the opportunity to put to him the key point that is in my mind when deciding whether to withdraw the amendment.

I seek clarity in legislation. The Home Secretary invites me to withdraw the amendment that would insert article 13 into the Bill and I am minded to withdraw it, but I do not think that Parliament or the country should be left with article 13 having been kept out of the Bill—quite expressly, because the Committee has discussed it and I have withdrawn the amendment—but, at some later date, it being said to be effectively within the Bill because of things that Ministers said in the course of the debate. If the right hon. Gentleman can give me the assurance that we are legislating by black-letter law on the face on the Bill and not by what one can cull from the pages of Hansard, I shall feel much happier about withdrawing the amendment.

Mr. Straw: As far as I am concerned, we are indeed legislating by black-letter law on the face of the Bill.

[Mr. Straw]

We could have a separate debate about the wisdom of the decision in Pepper v. Hart: I know why the Judicial Committee made that decision and, to some extent, there is common sense in seeking to tease out the meaning of words where they are ambiguous, but I have always taken the view that what Parliament passes is not what Ministers say, but what is on the face of a Bill. That is of profound importance to the manner in which we make legislation.

I invite the right hon. and learned Gentleman to withdraw his amendment, but I shall certainly reflect on what he and others have said. At the very least, I shall write to all the right hon. and hon. Members who have spoken, following my reflections.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: I am most grateful to the Home Secretary. On the basis of what he has said, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Hull, North): I beg to move amendment No. 111, in page 1, line 9, at end insert

'and—

(c) Articles One and Two of Protocol Number 6,'.

The Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 112, in schedule 1, schedule 1, page 19, line 23, at end insert—'PROTOCOL No. 6—

ARTICLE 1

THE DEATH PENALTY SHALL BE ABOLISHED

ARTICLE 2

A State may make provision in its law for the death penalty in respect of acts committed in time of war or of imminent threat of war; such penalty shall be applied only in the instances laid down in the law and in accordance with its provisions. The State shall communicate to the Secretary General of the Council of Europe the relevant provisions of that law.'.

Mr. McNamara: The amendment would insert in the Bill the sixth protocol of the European convention on human rights and, in particular, its first two articles. Article 1 of the sixth protocol states:

"The death penalty shall be abolished. No one shall be condemned to such penalty or executed."

Article 2 of the sixth protocol states:

"A State may make provision in its law for the death penalty in respect of acts committed in time of war or of imminent threat of war; such penalty shall applied only in the instances laid down in the law and in accordance with its provisions. The State shall communicate to the Secretary General of the Council of Europe the relevant provisions of that law."

The Committee knows that, as a House, we abolished the death penalty for a trial period in 1965. That was made permanent in 1969 for this island and in 1973 for Northern Ireland.

There remained on the statute book two crimes which carried the death penalty: treason and piracy. However, as a result of an amendment, tabled in another place by Lord Archer of Sandwell, to clause 33 of the Crime and Disorder Bill, those crimes were removed from the statute book. That clause has passed through the Committee of the House of Commons and, although challenged, remains. By free vote of the House, we have taken a matter which everyone has regarded as a matter of conscience—the death penalty—out of our normal civil law.

5.30 pm

There are two international conventions dealing with capital punishment. The first of those is the one to which I have referred—the sixth protocol of the convention on human rights of the Council of Europe. The other is the second optional protocol to the international covenant on civil and political rights, which also provides for abolition of the death penalty, while allowing states wishing to do so to retain the death penalty in wartime—although I have been told, in reply to a parliamentary question, that the Ministry of Defence is now considering the whole matter of military penalties.

The sixth protocol has been ratified by 28 European states and signed by four others. It has been signed by all the members of the European Union except the United Kingdom, and has been ratified by 12 member states. The second optional protocol of the ICCPR has been ratified by 32 states and signed by four others.

I find the present position of Her Majesty's Government difficult to understand. I should have thought that, now that those matters have been removed from the statute book, Her Majesty's Government would have rushed to sign the sixth protocol—or at least, as it is a matter of conscience, encouraged hon. Members to act in that regard.

When Estonia, the most recent country in the Council of Europe to ratify the sixth protocol, did so in March 1998, the United Kingdom presidency issued a declaration welcoming the recent decision. It said:

"The EU welcomes the recent decision of the Estonian Parliament to ratify protocol number six of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights, thereby abolishing the death penalty. This is a significant step forward on the eve of the opening of Estonia's accession negotiations to join the EU. It reinforces Estonians' commitment to the promotion of human rights".

Last month, the United Kingdom co-sponsored, with 63 other states, the resolution at the United Nations Commission on Human Rights. It called on all states parties to the ICCPR that have not already done so to consider acceding to, or ratifying, the second optional protocol, and called on all states that still maintained the death penalty to establish a moratorium on executions with a view to completely abolishing the death penalty. That was an advance, because in 1997 the UK Government had abstained on a similar resolution.

The problem is, how can the Government welcome other countries ratifying the sixth protocol but not ratify it themselves, and how can the Government urge other countries to ratify the second optional protocol to the ICCPR but not ratify it themselves?

Following last year's general election, our new Government reviewed the United Kingdom's position on the death penalty, in preparation for the summit of the Council of Europe at Strasbourg in October 1997. As a result of that review, the Government supported the final declaration, which called for universal abolition of the death penalty. In a written answer to me on 19 January, the Prime Minister said:

"The Government have supported international calls for the abolition of the death penalty because Parliament has consistently voted against re-introduction of capital punishment for murder."—[Official Report, 19 January 1998; Vol. 304, c. 401.]

In a letter to David Bull, director of Amnesty International UK, dated 28 November, my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary said:

"Our new stance will make a real difference in allowing us to make demarches on the death penalty to other countries, either alone or with our EU partners".

However, he went on:

"The Government continues to believe that the issue of whether the death penalty should be reintroduced for murder is a matter for Parliament on a free vote and has no plans to change that approach. We have no plans, therefore, to accede to the 6th Protocol to the ECHR, or the 2nd Optional Protocol to the ICCPR."

On that basis, given this opportunity, we would expect to have a free vote. Perhaps when the Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. O'Brien), replies to the debate—or now—he will tell the Committee that the Government do not intend to put in any Whips against this amendment.

Mr. Grieve: I am much obliged to the hon. Gentleman for giving way, because I have been trying to follow his argument. At the outset he said, properly, that the issue of capital punishment is one for conscience and a free vote, and at any time it chooses the House can debate that issue as it relates to individual instances—whether it be treason or piracy or whether the death penalty should apply in wartime—but would not the effect of what he proposes be to fetter the ability of Parliament to express its conscience?

If we accept the protocol as the hon. Gentleman seeks to admit it, it would no longer be open to Parliament to debate that issue without, effectively, throwing out the whole European convention, lock, stock and barrel, or at least changing it. Acceptance of the protocol would introduce an extra hurdle, which fetters Parliament's ability to express its conscience on a matter which, I am sure that he will agree, is of widespread public importance, and often discussed.

Mr. McNamara: I shall come to that point later.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): I have asked the Whips, and I understand that this is a free vote.

Mr. McNamara: Has my hon. Friend been told that there will be no Government Whips on the Doors or taking the count?

Mr. Mullin: I have been told that this is a free vote.

Mr. McNamara: I am grateful for that. The impression that one always had about a free vote was that the Government did not put in Whips. Perhaps the Minister will rise and tell us that the Government will not put in Whips.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Mike O'Brien): In due course.

Mr. McNamara: In due course he will rise and tell me that they are not putting in Whips. I am afraid that I did not catch my hon. Friend's last comment from a sedentary position; would he care to repeat it? No; he would not like to do so.

Responding to a similar amendment moved by Lord Archer of Sandwell in another place, the Minister, Lord Williams of Mostyn, said:

"The Government's view has been that the issue of the death penalty . . . is a matter of judgment and conscience to be decided by Members of Parliament as they see fit. I believe that all political parties have taken a view on that particular aspect which is different from other human civil rights. Therefore, if we ratified Protocol 6, we could not reintroduce the death penalty for murder, short of renouncing the convention."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 18 November 1997; Vol. 583, c. 504-05.]

That is splendid. I suppose that every conscience will flick over just like that, to change its position.

That is particularly interesting on the basis of the point made by the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) about the constitutional principle. Paragraph 4.13 of the excellent White Paper, "Rights Brought Home: The Human Rights Bill", states:

"The view taken so far is that the issue is not one of basic constitutional principle but is a matter of judgement and conscience to be decided by Members of Parliament as they see fit."

Suddenly, out of the air, a strange constitutional principle that one Parliament cannot bind another is produced. That is what we all accept, except that we also say that we are not bound by what went before and can change it if we will.

The hon. Gentleman said that that goes in favour of future Parliaments, but that is not the case. A future Parliament can, if it wishes, change precisely what we are seeking to do today, and that will have ramifications. It can be debated in the House. That can be applied to any international agreement that we have made. It applies directly to the EU and other matters that we have conceded. We could vote tomorrow—I am sure my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) would want us to do so—to take back many of the powers that we have given the Commission, such as the powers that we have surrendered with regard to majority voting. We could pass that legislation tomorrow. We can, if we wish, bring back the European Communities Act 1972. It would have profound and difficult ramifications and the hon. Gentleman is entering deep waters, but his argument does not stand up.

Mr. Grieve: Surely that is precisely the point. As is generally well known, I favour incorporation of the convention. However, the hon. Gentleman may agree that he is making life complicated for himself quite unnecessarily. He may agree that the subject commands much emotion and diverse views, but he is seeking by the amendment to entrench the matter in a way that will fetter Parliament when there is no necessity to do so.

Mr. McNamara: With the greatest respect, we are not fettering Parliament. We are saying that this is a decision of this Parliament. We are not saying that a future Parliament cannot change it. It will do that in the knowledge of the necessary consequences of what it does.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): I have been following closely the logic of the hon. Gentleman's argument, bizarre though it seems to me. If the hon. Gentleman is confident that a future Parliament would not seek to reinstate the death penalty, of what precisely in the present arrangement is he afraid? If, on the other hand, he fears that a future Parliament might seek to re-establish the death penalty, is not his effort today designed to prevent a future House of Commons from doing just that? Therefore, is not my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) right when he says that the hon. Gentleman is seeking to fetter and circumscribe the sovereign omnicompetence of the House of Commons?

Mr. McNamara: In the House, sovereignty has long since slipped away on many issues. One must recognise that. Whether one is happy about it or not, it has happened on a range of issues. I shall not bore the Committee with examples. I do not object to what has happened in that regard—it is not a problem for me—but why can all the other members of the EU happily sign protocol 6 without finding the argument advanced by the hon. Member for Beaconsfield and others particularly onerous?

To me as an abolitionist, and I should have though to other abolitionists, what the hon. Gentleman says is a powerful argument for incorporating the protocol. Bearing in mind those crimes that were subject to capital punishment before 1965, and all those miscarriages of justice of which we have had a calendar in the past two decades, it would be just as well if we were fettered in that way.

Mr. Bercow: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

5.45 pm

Mr. McNamara: No, I shall not do so for a moment, because we have exhausted that part of the argument.

I come finally to a matter that caused the amendment to be signed not only by me but by those of my hon. Friends who are part of the British delegation to the Council of Europe, as well as by other of my hon. Friends. Just before Christmas, a country that is a member of the Council of Europe was responsible for a series of secret executions. The families of those executed were not informed of either the date or the place of the executions until considerably later.

In January, the Council of Europe was concerned with ratifying the credentials of the members of that country's Parliament who had signed and accepted the Council of Europe's charter and convention. The British delegation was strong in its demand to know how people who had flouted undertakings that they had given to the Council of Europe could remain within a parliamentary assembly. We were well supported by representatives from all parties in this House and from other Parliaments on the issue. That country was forced to change its attitude, to stop its executions and to give undertakings from which its people would benefit.

However, in making the argument that we had not murdered or executed anyone for nearly 50 years—perhaps a little less than that—we were continually told that we had not even signed protocol 6. At that time, the death penalty for treason and piracy remained on the statute book. We shall not always be in that position.

The Government's position is inconsistent and contradictory. We welcome other countries' ratification of death penalty protocols and we urge them to do so, we call for the universal abolition of the death penalty, but we refuse to accede to the death penalty protocol itself. We do that so that Parliament can reintroduce the death penalty. That is the nature of the argument.

Therefore, in the interests of our international standing and consistency, I urge the Committee to take on board what the Home Secretary said in the White Paper—that this is a matter of conscience to be decided by Members of Parliament as they see fit. I reiterate the point that I made earlier: that the view taken so far is that this issue is not a matter of basic constitutional principle.

Mr. Maclennan: I have much sympathy with the arguments that have just been deployed by the hon. Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara). I take issue with the view that the death penalty is not a constitutional issue. If the Government deploy that argument against the amendment tonight, their argument will be flawed. In the Bill of Rights of the United States, there are provisions that have been variously interpreted by the Supreme Court of the United States as both allowing and not allowing capital punishment, but that they are constitutional issues is not in doubt.

It is inconsistent with that argument that in the Bill we are incorporating article 3 of the European convention, which proscribes cruel and unusual punishment. Many people would take the view that capital punishment was clearly proscribed by that article. Capital punishment as conducted in several countries would unquestionably be ruled out by article 3.

Protocol 6 is a belt and braces measure, which we should adopt and support as a nation to put beyond doubt our abhorrence of capital punishment. It is particularly appropriate to do so at a time when the United Kingdom is seeking to exert its moral authority to bring about political reform, and using other countries' attitude to capital punishment as a litmus test of whether reform is sufficiently under way to merit new relationships with them.

I have great sympathy with the objectives of those who support the amendment, but I have some doubt about whether it is appropriate as a means of ratifying the protocol. I would have preferred the Executive to announce their intention to ratify the protocol and, as a consequence of that decision, to include it in the Bill. I agree with the hon. Member for Hull, North. To say that it is simply a matter of judgment and conscience to be decided by Members of Parliament as they see fit is to misunderstand the concerns of constitutional law and is inconsistent with our acceptance of article 3 of the European convention.

Mr. Grieve: I listened with great care to the hon. Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara), and I appreciate the sincerity of his desire not only for capital punishment to be abolished for all offences—in practice, it is not in operation in the United Kingdom—but for us to sign up to the international obligation under protocol 6, which hitherto no Government have done.

No Government have done so because the matter remains one of intense public debate in this country. It is a matter of conscience for Members of Parliament. As we all know from going out into our constituencies, it is also a matter on which the public may have substantially different views from the majority in the House. That has been consistently shown by every opinion poll taken on the subject over many years.

My complaint about the manner in which the amendment is being introduced goes not to the right of the House to legislate on the issue, but to the fact that

I—although not necessarily all members of my party—have been a proponent of incorporation, based on our obligations under the European convention as it now stands, to which we have signed up.

If the consequence of the amendment is that the scope of the convention is altered without the opportunity for adequate public debate, I fear that we shall forfeit the regard of the public in respect of this proposal. Because I am in favour of the proposal and have made no secret of it, that particularly disappoints me.

There is ample scope for those who share the hon. Gentleman's view to raise an Adjournment debate and to lobby Ministers to sign up to protocol 6. That should be the subject of legitimate public debate, because it has a knock-on effect on the ability of the House to review the position, as it has traditionally done, once every Parliament. I fear that, if we start to go down that road when there is no necessity to do so, the public will ask what Parliament has done.

Mr. McNamara: On the matter of lobbying, on Second Reading of the Crime and Disorder Bill, I intervened and asked my hon. Friend the Minister of State about that. He replied:

"As my hon. Friend is well aware, that is covered by the Human Rights Bill rather than this Bill."—[Official Report, 8 April 1998; Vol. 310, c. 451.]

As urged by my hon. Friend, I have raised the matter now.

Mr. Grieve: I find the logic of that statement rather difficult to follow. Of course it is possible for us to extend the abolition of the death penalty for murder to every category that remains on the statute book, and once every Parliament we can review the matter and have a vote, and there will be public debate in the country at large on the matter. We can ratify the protocol, and there will be public debate on that.

I return to the point that to do that through an amendment, which is unexpected as it did not arise from public debate, would be remarkable and undesirable. Far from encouraging acceptance of the principle of incorporation, it will tend towards the opposite effect. I am not surprised, therefore, that Ministers may have had some anxiety and doubts on the subject. The question of the death penalty, the morality of it and the issue of conscience are all legitimate matters for debate. Although we have never ratified protocol 6, we have never breached it because there has been no need to do so. In peacetime, that would be extremely unusual.

If we accept the amendment, we are usurping the right of the citizens of this country to pronounce on the issue, and we are doing so for no good reason. It will vitiate the effect of the Bill, which is in other ways so desirable. I understand why the amendment was tabled, but I ask the hon. Member for Hull, North to reconsider, and I ask all hon. Members to consider carefully whether, even if they support the intention behind the amendment, this is the proper way to achieve it.

Fiona Mactaggart (Slough): I find the two arguments against the amendment extremely disappointing. The second, articulated by the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve), is that the amendment is unfair because we did not know that it was coming up. I remind the hon. Gentleman that I raised the matter on Second Reading. I argued that we should sign the protocol as part of the incorporation of the European convention. My hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) intervened to ask me whether I was suggesting that we should sign the protocol, and I confirmed that. If those who think that we should not do so are now claiming that this is an ambush, they have not been doing their job properly.

Mr. Grieve: I am not suggesting that it is an ambush on me, or on others of us who may object to incorporation. This has consistently been a subject of legitimate public debate for many years. The proposal will make continuing public debate and the possible review of previous decisions made by Parliament extremely difficult without serious knock-on effects. We shall not be lightly forgiven by the public if we go down that road.

Fiona Mactaggart: The hon. Gentleman has joined the two arguments. The second argument relates to the ambush and the first asks what is the important part of the British constitution. Is it the right of the House to determine this issue once every Parliament or is it re-fashioning the constitution—on the basis of which the Labour party was elected—to reconstitute the constitutional settlement in the United Kingdom? Many people believed that we would not do that, but we have demonstrated our determination to re-fashion the constitution of the United Kingdom vigorously during this Parliament.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest): Does the hon. Lady seriously suggest that it is not the prerogative of the United Kingdom Parliament to decide the criminal law and criminal penalties for this country?

Fiona Mactaggart: I am suggesting that we should re-fashion the constitution to base it on the concept of human rights. If we do that by incorporating the European convention on human rights into United Kingdom law, we shall be saying that the people's fundamental human rights are more important than the right of Parliament to debate those issues.

Mr. Bercow: I must say, in all candour, that if the hon. Lady thinks that the constituents of Slough sent her to Parliament because they were hoping for a re-fashioning of the constitutional settlement, she is deluding herself. Is she so persuaded not only of the rectitude of her case, but of the public support for it, that, in her address during the election campaign, she told her potential constituents that she would vote permanently to deny the House of Commons the entitlement to re-establish the death penalty if it wished to do so?

Fiona Mactaggart: Like that of the hon. Gentleman, my election address was relatively brief. I did not inform the good voters of Slough of everything that the Government would do. However, in my speeches and in my conversations with the voters of Slough, I made absolutely clear my commitment to the incorporation of the European convention on human rights and to a human rights-based constitution. The hon. Gentleman may ask any voter in my constituency about the degree to which I did that. I am not ambushing my constituents: I made it clear that I believed that centring the constitution on the human rights of the people was an important change in the governance of the United Kingdom.

In international human rights law, the most fundamental human right is the right to life. The first right referred to in article 2 of the convention is the right to life, which can be derogated in certain circumstances—through the death penalty, for example. The third article in the convention refers to the right to freedom from inhuman and degrading treatment.

If we believe in protecting the rights of the citizen and in using international human rights instruments to do that, we have a responsibility to protect the citizen from judicial murder. We have an opportunity today to sign a protocol that entrenches the abolition of the death penalty in peacetime, and I believe that the time has come to do that. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North for giving us the opportunity to become a public part of the international community of states that have rejected the death penalty because they respect the human rights of their citizens.

Mr. Garnier: I shall not detain the Committee for long. "Shocked" is perhaps too grand a word to use to describe my reaction to the speech by the hon. Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart). It is interesting to note that the hon. Lady referred to "re-fashioning" the constitution and to "entrenching" the abolition of the death penalty in peacetime. I candidly admit that I voted not to reintroduce the death penalty every time I had a chance to do so in the last Parliament. When I was selected in 1989-90 to contest the seat of Harborough on behalf of the Conservatives in the 1992 election, I told my constituency association that I opposed the death penalty for murder. Nothing that I have heard or learnt in the intervening period—until today—has persuaded me that it should be reintroduced into our civil criminal courts for murder convictions.

As I said on Second Reading not so long ago, while I oppose the death penalty in run-of-the-mill murder cases, I am not convinced that we should abandon the state's right to impose the death penalty in time of war. Some people may claim that my approach is contradictory, but I believe that special circumstances apply during a state of emergency and during times of war.

Fiona Mactaggart: Under the sixth protocol, there is a requirement to abolish the death penalty only during time of peace and not during time of war.

Mr. Garnier: The hon. Lady is perfectly right. However, article 2—which she will find on page 15 of the Bill—states:

"Everyone's right to life shall be protected by law. No one shall be deprived of his life intentionally save in the execution of a sentence of a court following his conviction of a crime for which this penalty is provided by law."

The convention makes the death penalty available for murder convictions or other offences during time of peace. Therefore, there are inconsistencies in the convention with which the hon. Lady must come to terms, as will I.

It is not necessarily the fault of the hon. Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) that his amendment is inconsistent. The reason for that can be found in articles 1 and 2 of the sixth protocol. As the hon. Lady pointed out correctly, article 1 states:

"The death penalty shall be abolished. No one shall be condemned to such penalty or executed."

That seems fairly definite—we could not claim that it is ambiguous. However, article 2 of the sixth protocol says:

"A State may make provision in its law for the death penalty in respect of acts committed in time of war".

We must read that article in conjunction with the article to which I referred previously to appreciate my point about internal inconsistencies within the convention.

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North): I hesitate to intervene, as I entered the Chamber only recently. However, I understand that article 2 refers to extra-judicial killings and thus should not be interpreted in the way in which the hon. and learned Gentleman has done.

Mr. Garnier: I am not so sure that I understand the concept of the lawful extra-judicial killing, but perhaps the hon. Gentleman may explain it to me later if he catches your eye, Mr. Lord. If he thinks that extra-judicial killing means killing in the heat of war, he is very much mistaken, because that is not what the articles are about.

The hon. Member for Hull, North is premature in moving this amendment. For reasons of his own—he is a well-known advocate of the cause that he advanced today—he is getting ahead of another piece of legislation, the Crime and Disorder Bill. That legislation will give every hon. Member a chance to exercise his or her conscience and vote one way or the other on the question of abolishing the death penalty. I believe that the provisions in that Bill go far beyond what the hon. Gentleman seeks to introduce into law today through his amendment.

I shall be in a degree of difficulty over the Crime and Disorder Bill, which seeks to abolish the death penalty for military crimes or crimes against the state during the course of war, which I would disapprove of, while I wholly approve of the non-return of the death penalty for murder.

Mr. McNamara: Article 13 does not affect legislation for the armed forces. It affects only specific legislation that is contained within the article.

Mr. Garnier: I am sorry, but I did not hear the first part of the hon. Gentleman's intervention. The simple point is that there will be an opportunity for Members to exercise their conscience on the question of the death penalty shortly. The hon. Gentleman said as much in a response to an intervention from, I think, my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow). The hon. Gentleman is attempting to stymie or snooker the Committee into reaching a conclusion today on a decision that it will have the opportunity fully to debate in due course.

This evening, we do not have very much longer to discuss the mammoth subject before us. I applaud the hon. Member for Hull, North for raising the subject, but I think that he has chosen the wrong day and the wrong time.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham): I am listening to my hon. and learned Friend's argument with care. Let us say that the House of Commons decides on a subsequent occasion to approve the motion that the death penalty in its entirety should be abolished. Is my hon. and learned Friend saying that at that point, and because of that vote, it would be right to ratify the sixth protocol, or is he saying that this matter should always be left at large so that the House of Commons could at some stage reintroduce the death penalty if it so chose?

Mr. Garnier: Probably the best way at this stage in which to answer my right hon. and learned Friend's question is to invite him to read clause 1(4), which allows the Secretary of State to amend the list of protocols contained in the Bill. I have no doubt that if the House of Commons decides in future to accept the Government's proposals as set out in the Crime and Disorder Bill, the Under–Secretary of State and the Home Secretary will want to examine clause 1(4) to see what they should do about it. I am not suggesting that we should get ahead of ourselves. When we have an opportunity to debate the military or wartime death penalty, we should allow that debate to proceed in an orderly way, rather than dealing with the issue in a short debate this afternoon.

The hon. Members for Slough and for Hull, North candidly admitted that they wanted to prevent further discussion. They want to ensure that the matter is dealt with here and now, subject to the procedures of the House of Commons and of another place in reviewing what we have done. As I have said, I disagree with them. Their attempt, though no doubt well intended, is wrong and should not be acceded to.

I am interested in the Government's proposals for whipping Members such as the hon. Members for Slough and for Hull, North. No doubt we shall hear about them in a moment. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will do precisely as he wants. Why should he not? He was elected to this place to make up his own mind on the various matters that come before us. The hon. Lady is newer to this place, and she may be receiving advice shortly on her pager.

I have no doubt that this is an amendment that should not be accepted by the Committee, irrespective of the sincerity of the hon. Member for Hull, North and that of his hon. Friends who have put their names to it.

Mr. Gareth Thomas (Clwyd, West): I support the amendment because it is morally right. It enhances our international prestige as a country and removes the inconsistencies that were so graphically illustrated by my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara). I congratulate him on instigating such an important debate on a vital issue.

I direct the attention of the Committee, and particularly that of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, to clauses 19(1) and 10(2). I am interested to hear the ministerial response in explaining the effect of these two provisions. As I understand it, the argument advanced against the amendment is that it would tie the hands of future Parliaments in having a substantive debate on the issue of abolition. As has been said, that is an issue of great concern. However, public opinion can change. It could demand that a measure be introduced into the House of Commons to reinstate the death penalty.

Under clause 19(1)(b), it seems that, even if a Minister comes to the House of Commons to present a Bill reinstating the death penalty, there will be discretion. Even if it is determined that there is incompatibility between that Bill and the Bill that is before us, the Minister will have a residual discretion to go ahead. Clause 19(1)(b) provides that, in the event of incompatibility, the Secretary of State may say that, although he is unable to make a statement of compatibility, the Government nevertheless wish the House of Commons to proceed with the Bill.

I am saying that the drafting of the Bill does not preclude a substantive debate on that issue. Clause 10(2) deals with the remedial procedure in the event of a court declaring that an Act is incompatible with convention rights. It imports in terms the word "appropriate". There is an element of discretion in the hands of the Government to allow a substantive debate on the substantive issue. The point made ably by Opposition Members is, in my view, answered if their real concern is to protect the sovereignty of Parliament. I shall be most interested to hear the ministerial response to that.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead): I was interested in this matter as I approached consideration of the Bill in Committee. I listened with interest to the hon. Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara), especially because his views on the issue were contrary to those of the Government, which had been expressed in another place and set out in the White Paper. I was disappointed in the hon. Gentleman's speech because, although he was speaking with considerable sincerity about a cause that he believed in with some passion, I found it difficult to follow the logic of his arguments. I sympathise with the hon. Gentleman to the extent that it appears that it was suggested that he should bring the matter forward in this debate by the Minister. However, I found that some of his answers to interventions from my right hon. and hon. Friends did not tie up with his earlier comments.

Mr. McNamara: May I assure the hon. Lady that, irrespective of whether my hon. Friend the Minister had made the suggestion—the way in which he spoke suggested that he was not exactly encouraging me to bring the matter forward—I tabled the amendments because they had been well aired in the other place as well as on Second Reading.

Mrs. May: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that, clarification, although he indicated earlier that it had been suggested that the matter should be brought forward this evening.

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend has hit the nail on the head with uncanny precision. Is not an example of the inconsistency of the contribution of the hon. Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) his belief that he and his hon. Friends should have the right to exercise their consciences to vote for the amendment, and thereby permanently prevent the return of the death penalty, while simultaneously seeking to deny the right of a future House of Commons to exercise its conscience in a direction with which the hon. Gentleman happens to disagree?

Mrs. May: As ever, my hon. Friend has, with his usual perspicacity—[Interruption.] I think that hon. Members know the word that I was looking for, which is entirely appropriate when describing my hon. Friend. He hit the nail on the head in picking out a particularly illogical comment made by the hon. Member for Hull, North. In response to an earlier intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve), he said that he did not want to fetter Parliament and that this issue was not about fettering Parliament. As my hon. Friend pointed out, he went on to make it absolutely clear that he intended to fetter Parliament, and he was supported by the hon. Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart), who made it clear that she wanted to entrench this provision and thereby fetter Parliaments of the future.

Mr. David Lock (Wyre Forest): I apologise for interrupting the flow of praise to the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow). It is nice to hear him praised occasionally; I am sure that he appreciated it.

If the hon. Lady wants seriously to argue that future Parliaments will have no opportunity to intervene, I shall be interested to hear how she answers the detailed and wholly accurate point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, West (Mr. Thomas), who explained precisely why that was not the case. I look forward to hearing her explain why he is wrong.

Mrs. May: I was making a point about the illogical comments of the hon. Member for Hull, North. He and Ministers said that they intended and hoped to fetter future Parliaments on the issue of the death penalty. I refer the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Mr. Lock) to the fact that the Minister in the House of Lords, Lord Williams of Mostyn, said that it was not simply a theoretical question of whether future Parliaments would be able to consider this issue and take a decision, but that,

"if we ratified Protocol 6, we could not reintroduce the death penalty for murder, short of renouncing the convention".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 18 November 1997; Vol. 583, c. 504-5.]

That is my concern.

I am also concerned that this afternoon's debate is not about the death penalty. Although it is entirely right and proper that the Committee should have such a debate—as it happens, my views on the death penalty are similar to those expressed by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier)—I believe that the House of Commons has the right to decide, when hon. Members wish, whether the death penalty should be reintroduced or whether it is appropriate to have it within our legislation for circumstances that still exist. We shall have a proper debate on the death penalty when we discuss the Crime and Disorder Bill. However, that is not what this afternoon's debate is supposed to be about.

I am worried about what will happen. A future debate in terms of this amendment would not simply be about whether the death penalty was right; it would be about the wider issue of the convention. Any decision taken would not simply be a decision on the death penalty. I agree with the Government in their "Rights Brought Home" paper that this is a matter of judgment and conscience, to be decided by individual Members of Parliament as they see fit, and that it should not be regarded as part of the broader issue of whether the convention as a whole is correct. That is precisely why it is important to retain the right to bring the issue of the death penalty before the House of Commons. Future Parliaments must not be fettered in that respect, which is why I shall not support the amendment.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): I add my congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) on introducing the amendment. I had not intended to speak until I heard a Conservative Member argue that there was no point in supporting the amendment on the ground that it was of no practical relevance because no executions had taken place in this country for some decades.

Let me respond by saying that we should not be so insular. The issue has practical relevance in other countries. Many of us are regularly contacted by Amnesty International asking us to take up the case of someone in danger of being executed, and it would certainly help us to have more moral authority in such questions if we were to sign the protocol. It would show that we rejected any possibility of going back to exercising the death penalty in peacetime.

I have not read the debate in the other place, and the acoustics in the Chamber made it hard to hear tonight exactly what the Opposition's reasoning was. What I seemed to pick up was that they thought that the proposal was all right in principle, but not yet. If that is the case, I should like to hear more from the Government about their reasoning because I think that the amendment should be supported, if possible tonight.

Mr. Hogg: The arguments are more finely balanced than some of my right hon. Friends have suggested. However, my conclusion is that we should not sign up to the protocol, and I am therefore against the amendment.

The narrow question is whether it is right permanently to exclude this House's ability effectively to reinstate the death penalty. I can think of no foreseeable circumstances in which I would support the restoration of the death penalty and I have voted against it on many an occasion. That, however, is not conclusive of the issue, because we must ask ourselves whether we should exclude from the powers of the House the ability to take such a decision.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) said, the noble Lord Williams of Mostyn in the other place said—I believe correctly—that, if we signed up to protocol 6, the House could not reinstate the death penalty without derogating from the convention. Therefore, if we accept the amendment, the House will no longer have the ability to reinstate the death penalty. Although I shall always oppose such a measure, it would not be right to exclude it from the range of powers available to the House.

Mr. Maclennan: I am surprised to hear the right hon. and learned Gentleman throw his weight behind the view that the signing of the protocol would permanently exclude the possibility of the House returning to the issue. He was a member of a Government who derogated from provisions of the convention to deal with the position, as they saw it, in Northern Ireland. By his argument, that matter might have been considered to be beyond the consideration of this House—it was not.

Mr. Hogg: I have considered, and I accept, the advice given in the other place by the noble Lord Williams of Mostyn on this matter, which received a great deal of support in that place. Even if he were not right, if we sign up to the protocol we shall exclude the House from the ability to reintroduce the death penalty. Therefore, either because of a finding of law or because of the reality, the House could not do that. Although I can think of no circumstances in which I would wish the House to do that, it is wrong in principle to preclude it from doing so.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Inverclyde): May I offer my compliments to my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) for introducing the amendment? I also offer my compliments to the right hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (Mr. Maclennan) for his intervention a minute ago, when he reminded the Committee of what this Government have done in the past—

Mr. McNamara: That Government.

Dr. Godman: Yes. That lot when they were in office—those whom I now facetiously call the English rural party. The right hon. Gentleman was right to point out what they did on the question of Northern Ireland.

I say to hon. Members and to my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart) that, throughout my time as a Member of Parliament, my constituents have known where I stand: four square against the death penalty. I have conveyed that perspective to them at public meetings and through the columns of that august journal, the Greenock Telegraph.

When the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) talked about military executions, a shiver ran down my back, because I oppose military executions and the imposition of the death sentence on soldiers and others by courts martial. I gained experience of courts martial, albeit it many years ago in my mis-spent youth, because I was in the Royal Military Police. Although the cases that I was involved in were not serious, I have said in the House over and over again, especially during the passage of the Armed Services Bill, which is a quinquennial event, that I have no trust in our system of courts martial.

6.30 pm

When the hon. and learned Gentleman talked about military executions, I decided to speak, if only for a few minutes. I am totally opposed to the death penalty. The hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) will accuse me of illogicality for supporting my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North, but when he puts his amendment to the vote, I shall be in the Lobby with him because of what is, I hope, my principled opposition to the death penalty.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) will know, an old friend of mine in Aberdeen, Councillor Robert Middleton, witnessed one of the last executions in Scotland. That experience was recounted to me one evening in his house, and it strengthened my determination to fight the death penalty when I was elected to the House.

Although I have complimented the right hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross, I was not taken by his observation vis-à-vis the constitution and this issue. In my view, it has to be determined by Members of Parliament after rigorous examination of their consciences. That is what I have done. My constituents know where I stand, and I shall vote with my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North. I shall give way to the hon. and learned Member for Harborough, who will have to be brief.

Mr. Garnier: I shall endeavour to be brief, because this is an intervention.

I yield to no man in my admiration for the huge service that the hon. Gentleman gave to his country as a member of the RMP. I heard all about it in a bus, when we were in Bosnia monitoring the elections. He told me, day in, day out, about his experiences in the RMP, which was very kind.

I think that the hon. Gentleman has misunderstood me. He referred to the expression "military executions"; if he considered it within the context of my few remarks, but in the entirety of them, he would understand that I was talking about offences against the state committed in time of war. If I used an unfortunate shorthand, I apologise for giving the wrong impression. I was talking about the right of the state to do what I would disapprove of in other circumstances—that is, in ordinary cases of murder: to resort to the death penalty, in time of war.

Dr. Godman rose—

Mr. McNamara: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Dr. Godman: May I first answer the intervention of the hon. and learned Member for Harborough? My hon. Friend is too eager.

I recall swapping accounts of military exploits with the hon. and learned Gentleman when we were in the hot spot of Brcko. We were, if I remember correctly, protected by seven members of the Special Air Service. The hon. and learned Gentleman—he was too modest to admit it in his intervention—reminded me several times that, while I was a non-commissioned officer, being Labour, he enjoyed the Queen's commission, as have a lot of Conservative Members. Most of them are ex-Guards officers.

In relation to Northern Ireland and the remarkable excellence of the infantry regiments that we send on United Nations peacekeeping missions, I am pleased—thrilled, in fact—that they are Members of Parliament and no longer serving with the armed forces.

Mr. McNamara: I am sorry to interrupt my hon. Friend, but the hon. and learned Member for Harborough obviously has not read the amendment, which mentions "Articles One and Two". Article 2 specifically provides a derogation for a state to have the death penalty in time of war. Therefore, the hon. and learned Gentleman's argument falls.

Dr. Godman: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention, but, even in times of war, I would question the sentence of death by courts martial as they are currently constituted, especially where officers were dealing with the lives of NCOs and other lower ranks.

I shall support my hon. Friend when he puts his amendment to the vote, and it is right and proper that hon. Members support it. We are putting remarkable, radical and wide-ranging constitutional change through the House. The amendment is part of that, and I hope that Labour Members will support our hon. Friend.

Mrs. Laing: The hon. Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (Dr. Godman) spoke passionately about his principles and beliefs, which are against the death penalty. I do not disagree with him about them, but he has missed the point of the amendment. If it is passed, his principles and beliefs, like those of every hon. Member, will be irrelevant, because there will not be another discussion of the merits or otherwise of the death penalty in the House, which is the correct forum for such a debate.

I agree with the hon. Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart) and others who spoke passionately about the fundamental human right—the right to life. The hon. Lady and the hon. Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) were correct in that, but the problem is their suggestion that the Parliament of the United Kingdom is not sufficiently responsible to protect that fundamental human right. That ridiculous suggestion is the basis of the hon. Lady's argument.

Mr. Gareth Thomas: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Laing: For the sake of time, I cannot; I am sorry.

It was suggested by the hon. Member for Clwyd, West (Mr. Thomas) that accepting the amendment would enhance our international prestige. The opposite will happen. The international prestige of this country would be diminished, as would the prestige of Parliament, by the suggestion that the House is not competent and has to be told by other institutions how to legislate on such a fundamental matter as the administration of justice and the death penalty.

I vehemently oppose the death penalty and vehemently defend the right to life, but I also defend the right of Parliament to make the criminal law of this country and the right of hon. Members properly to debate the death penalty, at any time that we want to do so.

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Let me make it clear that, as far as the Government are concerned, this is a free vote. I shall express the personal view of myself and of the Home Secretary, but no Government Whip has been asked by us to act as a Teller. This is a matter of conscience for hon. Members.

The Government's position was set out clearly in the White Paper:

> "The view taken so far is that the issue is not one of basic constitutional principle but is a matter of judgement and conscience to be decided by Members of Parliament as they see fit. For these reasons, we do not propose to ratify Protocol 6 at present."

The amendments would add the two substantive articles of protocol 6, involving the abolition of the death penalty, except for acts committed in time of war or imminent threat of war, to the convention rights. The right hon. and learned Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) said that the argument was finely balanced, and I agree. The issue is not just whether we agree with the death penalty. The tendency is often to discuss these issues emotively because, obviously, hon. Members feel strongly about them, but there is a need to examine the proposal with great consideration.

Before introducing the Bill, Ministers conducted a review of the United Kingdom's position on the three protocols to the convention that contain substantive rights that we had not ratified. Those are protocols 4, 6 and 7. We explained in the White Paper "Rights Brought Home: The Human Rights Bill" that we intended to sign and to ratify protocol 7 once an opportunity arose to remove some inconsistencies between our domestic law and the protocol's provisions. However, we judged that we should not ratify protocols 4 or 6 at this time or to include them in the Bill.

In the past three decades, the House has repeatedly opposed the death penalty. Indeed, in the previous substantial debate in the previous Parliament, I spoke strongly against it. Neither the Home Secretary nor I believe that the House will restore it, but we also take the view that this is not the time to block the rights of Members of Parliament in all conscience to debate and to vote on restoring it.

My personal view and that of the Home Secretary is that Parliament should be free to decide on death penalty matters on a free vote, and that protocol 6 would make a free vote difficult. Ratification of the protocol, from which no derogation or reservation is permitted, would interfere with the ability of a United Kingdom Parliament to consider the issue in future, short of effectively denouncing the convention.

Our constituents widely engage in the debate about the death penalty. Should Parliament prevent itself from debating issues that the public debate? That would be the effect if we embraced protocol 6. We would restrict and put a block on our ability to debate the issue. Assuming that the convention would remain law, if we embraced protocol 6, we would remove the decision on the death penalty from Members of Parliament for all time, and place it in the realm of international law.

The death penalty is a sensitive and difficult issue. This is not the time, nor is this the Bill, to implement the amendment. The issue is not about supporting or opposing the death penalty, but about the procedure for doing so: is a new procedural hurdle to be placed in the way of those hon. Members who wish to bring this matter before the House?

Mr. Maclennan: In the light of the Minister's helpful indication that the Government do not propose to put on a Whip tonight, can he say how the Government would view the passing of the amendment? Would they take it as an instruction of the House and proceed, notwithstanding the view that he has expressed on behalf of himself and the Home Secretary, to ratify the protocol?

Mr. O'Brien: The answer to that is yes. May I make it clear, if the right hon. Gentleman is in any doubt, that, on this issue, we are not putting in Whips, but that, on other issues tonight, we may decide to do so.

These are important issues, so let me take this argument a little further; it is important that hon. Members understand them.

I accept that it would be possible for the death penalty to be reintroduced by a future vote of Parliament, but only by way of an amendment to what would then be the Human Rights Act, if Parliament wills it. However, it would be contrary to the principles of the Bill and of the convention.

The Bill's purpose is to give further effect in domestic law to those rights that the United Kingdom has an obligation under the convention to secure to individuals in its jurisdiction. The inclusion of articles 1 and 2 of protocol 6 within the Bill's definition of the convention rights would grant rights in this country that we are not, at present, internationally bound to secure. It appears to be an academic point, and I do not want to go into angels dancing on pinheads, but it is an important part of the Government's view that the Bill is about giving access to rights, rather than creating new areas of law.

Mr. Grieve: I have listened carefully to what the hon. Gentleman has said, and I agree with every word. Is it not true that the Government would sign up to such a protocol only after widespread public consultation and that one feature of the way in which we are approaching the matter tonight is that such public consultation, which is an essential part of the process of government, as the Prime Minister has often said, has been bypassed?

Mr. O'Brien: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says and I can see why he might take that view, but the issue is raised in the White Paper and, in a sense, there was consultation on its provisions. This has been on the House's agenda, and hon. Members have been free to discuss it. It is an important issue.

Mr. Gareth Thomas: I appreciate the sensitive way in which my hon. Friend is handling an obviously sensitive issue, but may I seek some guidance from him on the interpretation that he puts on the point that I raised earlier concerning the interpretation of clauses 19 and 10, in the light of the view that there is residual discretion on Parliament to have a substantive debate on reinstatement?

Mr. O'Brien: Parliament could certainly debate that issue, but let us be clear: if we agree to the amendment, we will have a hurdle, a block on making a decision to restore the death penalty. Hon. Members will have to decide whether they wish at this stage to put that hurdle or block in the way of the House.

As the Committee will be aware, amendments to the Crime and Disorder Bill were agreed in Committee last week and in another place in March. They abolish the death penalty for all but certain military offences. I hope that we will succeed in removing from the statute book the last vestiges of the death penalty for civilian offences of treason and piracy as a result of that Bill, so the Government's view on the issue is clear, but Ministers with responsibility for defence are considering issues relating to the Army and the Navy. This is not—I express a personal view on behalf of the Home Secretary and myself—the time to prejudge their deliberations. If that Bill were enacted with those amendments in place, it would not affect our position on whether articles 1 and 2 of protocol 6 should be added to the convention rights that are set out in the Human Rights Bill.

Some concerns have been expressed that, if we do not ratify protocol 6, the UK will be unable to campaign effectively against the use of the death penalty in other countries. We do not see that as a serious difficulty. We are able to support international calls for the abolition of the death penalty because Parliament has repeatedly voted against capital punishment. In the current Parliament, any motion to reintroduce capital punishment is likely to be defeated by a large majority.

On 11 October 1997, at the summit of the Council of Europe, the Prime Minister signed the Council of Europe declaration calling for the universal abolition of the death penalty. That demonstrates that we are able to take a positive stand on this issue and encourage others to do so, but it does not require the inclusion of article 6.

The issue before us in the amendment is precise; it is not whether we oppose the death penalty—I oppose the death penalty—but whether, on an issue on which all parties give a free vote, the Committee should restrict the ability of the current minority of Members of Parliament who support the death penalty to put that matter of conscience before the House on a vote that could change the law. Parliament will not be best served at this time if it accepts the amendment.

I repeat—this is a free vote, as all hon. Members are aware. The Home Secretary and I have expressed our advice, but each Member can exercise his or her own conscience on this matter.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere): This has been an interesting debate, and we have heard excellent speeches by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier), my hon. Friends the Members for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) and for Maidenhead (Mrs. May), and my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg). I also pay tribute to the way in which the hon. Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) moved the amendment. He did so with sincerity and some skill. I respect his passionately held views against the death penalty, and I appreciate that he wishes to take every opportunity to press that case.

The hon. Gentleman was right to start by giving a recent history of the death penalty. He was correct to say that it was abolished as a sentence for murder on a free vote of the House in 1965. As he said, the matter was considered more recently when treason and piracy—the remaining offences, apart from armed forces offences, for which the death penalty remains a sentence—were discussed in the Standing Committee on the Crime and Disorder Bill. There was a free vote in the Committee on those matters. If the issues of treason and piracy are raised again when the Bill returns to the Floor of the House, we apprehend that there will again be a free vote.

It is right and appropriate that these matters should be decided, now and in the future, by the individual judgments and conscience of Members of the House on a free vote. The Minister was not giving away inside information that would bankrupt anyone in the bookmaking profession when he said that it was unlikely in the present Parliament that there would be a majority in favour of the return of the death penalty. That is true, given the present composition of the House.

We agree that a free vote should not be constrained by a decision to ratify articles 1 and 2 of the sixth protocol to the European convention. We appreciate that the article of the protocol that would not permit a derogation has not been included in the amendment; that point was made by the right hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (Mr. Maclennan) and by the hon. Member for Hull, North, but that does not make their arguments entirely convincing. The amendment would, as my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield said, fetter the vote of the House in future. Hon. Members should be able to decide the matter on a free vote without having to consider the implications concerning the European convention.

As the Committee will know, we have a long tradition, whichever party is in government, of honouring our obligations under the European convention on human rights, and it would be a shame to create the possibility that we would come into conflict with the convention, even though it would appear unlikely that, as presently constituted, the House would vote in favour of the return of the death penalty.

The Minister is right to say that this is a question of procedure and not, in this instance, of conscience. We should maintain the position that these matters should be decided on a free vote of the House.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): I welcome the announcement by my hon. Friend the Minister that there will be a free vote on the issue and that the Government will accept the decision of that vote and, if the amendment is made, ratify protocol 6 of the European convention on human rights. I express my appreciation to my hon. Friend. However, I do not accept his advice to reject the amendment. I shall support my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) and ask all hon. Members to join us in the Lobby to vote for the amendment, and I shall explain why.

My hon. Friend the Minister made it clear that he was expressing a personal position. I not only express my personal position—for which, like many of my hon. Friends, I have had to suffer consequences at the ballot box—but, as the leader of our delegation to the Council of Europe Assembly, elected by my colleagues in the delegation, I urge the Committee to support the amendment. In doing so, I speak for most of the delegation, certainly for all its members on this side of the Committee and also for some on the Opposition Benches.

For once, I agree with the right hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (Mr. Maclennan) when he says that the amendment should not be necessary. I expected the Government to ratify protocol 6 of the convention on the basis of clause 33 of the Crime and Disorder Bill, which removes from the statute book the last two offences for which the death penalty is still prescribed. On Second Reading, we were told by the Minister of State, Home Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael), that if we wanted the Government to ratify protocol 6, we must attempt to achieve that in the Human Rights Bill. That is why my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North has taken the initiative, with the support of many members of the delegation, in tabling the amendment.

The Government cannot have it both ways. They cannot tell us that they do not have the authority to ratify protocol 6, and that it could not be done, as we thought it could, in the context of the Crime and Disorder Bill, but that it could be done in this Bill, and then ask us not to vote for the amendment. That is inconsistent. I am not surprised that the Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. O'Brien), has been asked to reply to the debate, because my hon. Friend the Minister of State gave us contradictory advice. He said, in the presence of the Home Secretary, that we should attempt to ratify the protocol in this Bill.

I must tell the Deputy Chief Whip, my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Mudie), that this is an important issue, which will be noted in the rest of Europe. The amendment is not for all time. We are not, as Conservative Members said, trying to fetter the House of Commons in the future. Their argument would apply to the whole convention that is being introduced into our law by the Bill. On that basis, they could argue that the House would not be able to vote for torture—we shall not do so. We shall not vote for slavery or servitude or forced or compulsory labour. We shall not vote against the right to a fair trial. We shall not vote against prohibition against discrimination. The amendment would place the death penalty in the same category.

Mr. Grieve: I have two points. I accept what the hon. Gentleman says as he runs through the various articles of the convention. However, when the protocol was introduced in 1983—I think I am right in saying, but I am willing to stand corrected, that my father was then the chairman of the human rights committee of the Council of Europe—it was clearly stated that it was an evolutionary measure which could be introduced when the time was right. The hon. Gentleman said that the matter cost him votes, and I am sure that he will agree that this is a matter of intense public debate, on which our views and those of the public do not tally. Is that not a good reason why we should be wary of entrenching this position, whereas all the other articles that he listed are widely accepted, with no dissent?

Mr. Davis: That intervention has only delayed the completion of my speech, because I was about to deal with that point. If we pass the amendment, it will not stop our successors voting for a restoration of the death penalty if that is what they want, but it would mean that if they did so, they would be tearing up the European convention on human rights. That is true. Lord Williams of Mostyn made that point in the other place on behalf of the Government.

With great respect, I tell the Under-Secretary that, from my experience—regardless of whether we sign protocol 6; even if we do not sign it—if at some time in the future the House votes for restoration of the death penalty, the United Kingdom will be expected to withdraw from the Council of Europe—[HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Oh, yes. My colleagues from the delegation will agree that, internationally, feeling on the issue is so strong that we would risk being suspended from membership of the Council of Europe—[Interruption.] Yes, that is my view. I am entitled to my view, which is based on some experience of the Council of Europe, and I was one of those who criticised Ukraine for not fulfilling its obligations.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) said, even now, our Government are applauding Estonia's decision to ratify protocol 6. However, only last week, another Baltic country voted to retain the death penalty. In its Parliament, one of the strongest arguments was essentially, "Why should we abolish the death penalty when the United Kingdom has not yet signed protocol 6?" Its proponents of the death penalty shelter behind that fact—wrongly, but they do. That is an example of the international effect of our not signing the protocol. We are constantly being told that we are telling our colleagues in other parts of Europe to do as we say, not do as we do.

Human rights are at the centre of our foreign policy. Protocol 6 has tremendous symbolic importance. If we vote against the amendment, it will be impossible for many people in Europe to understand the House. It will also be very difficult for many people in this country to understand us.

Mr. McNamara: I shall not detain the Committee for very long, but will merely do two things. First, I apologise to the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. O'Brien). I had some very evil thoughts about him, which, in time, I shall duly confess. I am very pleased, indeed, that the Government are not putting in Whips. I hope that all my hon. Friends have heard that—they can vote on the matter with a clear conscience.

Secondly, I should like to make some important points—reiterating ones made by two of my hon. Friends, first by my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, West (Mr. Thomas). The first one is that, if we want to, under the terms of the Bill, we can raise the issue again. The possibility is there.

The second point is that our country's reputation on the matter is at stake. I did not mention Ukraine as being the country that was under the cosh on the issue; my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) did. However—as my colleagues in the delegation will agree—the fact that we have not signed was a very powerful argument against those of us who raised the issue.

The third point is that, if we do not ratify protocol 6, people will continue to hide behind our actions.

Mr. Maclennan: Official Opposition spokesmen have asked the Committee to understand the basis of the Government's view. As it has been accepted—even by a number of Opposition Members—that we are considering a matter of individual conscience, is it not extraordinary that the official Opposition are not treating the matter as one of conscience? Are the official Opposition not distorting the opinion of the Committee, on a matter that even they have said should be decided as a matter of conscience?

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The Committee proceeded to a Division—

Mr. Grieve (seated and covered): On a point of order, Mr. Martin. Despite the fact that this was described as a free vote, the Government Whips outside the Chamber are directing Labour Members into one Lobby—the contrary Lobby to that which the Home Secretary has entered—and telling them that this is a free vote on hanging, which it is not.

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. [Interruption.] It would be nice if I could reply to that point of order, which is not a matter for the Chair.

The Committee having divided: Ayes 294, Noes 136.

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. James Cran and
Mr. Oliver Heald.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Mr. Hogg: On a point of order, Mr. Martin. In view of the affirmative vote that has just taken place, would it not be right for the Government to make a statement as soon as possible as to the intention of Ministers with regard to the sixth protocol and whether they intend to come back to the House with an Order in Council to give effect to what has just happened?

The First Deputy Chairman: That is not a matter for the Chair.

Mr. Straw: Further to that point of order, Mr. Martin. The right hon. and learned Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) anticipates what I was about to say when I move the next amendment. We shall do so.

I beg to move amendment No. 137A, in page 1, line 12, leave out from beginning to 'any'.

The First Deputy Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 117, in clause 2, clause 2, page 2, line 21, at end insert—

'( ) A Court or tribunal determining a question which has arisen under this Act in connection with a Convention right must give primacy so far as it is possible to do so to the freedom of the Christian and other principal religious traditions represented in the United Kingdom to manifest religion or belief, in worship, teaching, practice or observance under Article 9.'.

Government amendment No. 137.

No. 8, in page 2, line 26, leave out 'Great Britain' and insert 'the United Kingdom'.

No. 46, in clause 3, clause 3, page 2, line 37, after 'legislation', insert

'save for the Church of Scotland Act 1921'.

No. 100, in clause 6, clause 6, page 4, line 21, at end insert

'or a person listed in Schedule (Persons excluded from section 6).'

Government amendments Nos. 41, 138 and 44.

No. 55, in clause 7, clause 7, page 5, line 21, leave out 'Great Britain' and insert 'United Kingdom'.

No. 56, in page 5, line 22, at end insert—

'(8A) Any refusal by a minister, official or other person acting on behalf of a christian or other principal religious tradition represented in the United Kingdom to administer a marriage contrary to his religious doctrine or convictions shall not be unlawful under this Act.

(8B) Any refusal by a minister, official or other person acting on behalf of a christian or other principal religious tradition represented in the United Kingdom to admit a person to holy orders or to invest a person with ministerial functions in a religious tradition contrary to his religious doctrines or convictions shall not be unlawful under this Act.

(8C) Any refusal by a minister, official or other person acting on behalf of a christian or other principal religious tradition represented in the United Kingdom to administer sacrament to a person or to allow a person to take part in an act of religious observance contrary to his religious doctrines or convictions shall not be unlawful under this Act.

(8D) Any refusal by a minister, official or other person acting on behalf of a christian or other principal religious tradition represented in the United Kingdom to permit men and women to worship together or otherwise than in accordance with the doctrines or practices of his religious tradition shall not be unlawful under this Act.'.

No. 113, in page 5, line 24, leave out—

'(a) a church school;

No. 114, in page 5, line 26, after 'association' insert

'in which the religious education is provided in accordance with the faith and practices of the religious foundation,'.

No. 115, in page 5, line 27, leave out from 'for' to 'whose' in line 28 and insert 'appointment as members of the teaching staff persons'.

No. 116, in page 5, line 30, leave out from 'person' to 'whose' in line 31 and insert

'who is a member of the teaching staff'.

No. 40, in page 5, line 32, at end insert—

'(9A) In relation to—

(a) a Church school; or

(b) a school or college with a religious foundation or trust deed or, as the case may be, memorandum or articles of association, nothing in this Act shall be used to affect the ability of the church or religious body concerned to appoint as a governor a person whose beliefs and manner of life are appropriate to the basic ethos of the school, and nothing in this Act shall be used to affect the ability of the governors of the said school or college to introduce an admissions policy which gives priority to children from families whose beliefs are appropriate to the basic ethos of the school.'.

No. 57, in page 5, line 35, after 'deputy chief executive', insert ', finance director'.

No. 90, in clause 21, clause 21, page 13, leave out lines 13 and 14.

Government new clause 9—Freedom of thought, conscience and religion.

New clause 12—Effect of determinations on religious rights—

'.—(1) If a court's determination of any question arising under this Act might affect the exercise by—

(a) a religious organisation (itself or its members collectively); or

(b) a charity with a religious foundation (itself or its members collectively) of the Convention right to the freedom of thought, conscience and religion, it must have particular regard to the importance of that right.

(2) In this section, "court" includes a tribunal.'.

New schedule 1—'PERSONS EXCLUDED FROM SECTION 6—

1. Any priest, minister or other official of any church, religious denomination, mosque, synagogue or temple

2. Any person exercising functions under the authority of or on behalf of the membership of a church, religious denomination, mosque, synagogue or temple

3. Any person exercising functions in connection with the ecclesiastical courts of the Church of England.'.

Mr. Straw: First, I assure the right hon. and learned Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) that, as the Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. O'Brien), said, we accept the will of the House on protocol 6. We shall consider the manner in which it should properly be implemented, and report to the House.

All the amendments are concerned with the impact of the Bill on the Churches and other bodies with a religious character. Many of them relate to those amendments made to the Bill in another place on Third Reading, which inserted a number of protections for such bodies. Those provisions are in part of clause 1(2), in clause 2(4) to (7), in clause 6(5) and (6) and in clause 7(8) to (10).

[Mr. Straw]

The issues were extensively debated in another place, and a number of hon. Members on both sides of the House of Commons commented on them on Second Reading in February. I said then that I would listen carefully to representatives of the Churches before I reached a conclusion on whether to advise the Committee to go along with the amendments made in another place. Since then, my noble Friend Lord Williams of Mostyn and I have had a number of meetings with representatives of the Churches and with a number of hon. Members—we have listened carefully to their concerns.

Before I speak on the amendments, it may be helpful if I say how the Government think that the Bill will operate in relation to the Churches. Much of what the Churches do is, in the legal context and in the context of the European convention on human rights, essentially private in nature, and would not be affected by the Bill even as originally drafted. For example, the regulation of divine worship, the administration of the sacrament, admission to Church membership or to the priesthood and decisions of parochial church councils about the running of the parish church are, in our judgment, all private matters.

In such matters, Churches will not be public authorities; the requirement to comply with convention rights will not bite on them. We do not believe that, for example, the Church of England, the Church of Scotland or the Roman Catholic Church, as bodies, would be public authorities under the Bill. I was asked to clarify that by many people, not least the Cardinal Archbishop.

On the occasions when Churches stand in place of the state, convention rights are relevant to what they do. The two most obvious examples relate to marriages and to the provision of education in Church schools. In both areas, the Churches are engaged, through the actions of the minister or of the governing body of a school, in an activity which is also carried out by the state, and which, if the Churches were not engaged in it, would be carried out directly by the state.

We think it right in principle—there was no real argument about it on Second Reading—that people should be able to raise convention points in respect of the actions of the Churches in those areas on the same basis as they will be able to in respect of the actions of other public authorities, however rarely such occasions may arise.

If that were not the case, the situation could arise, for example, in which teachers in most schools were required to comply with convention rights, but teachers in Church schools, which are wholly or mainly funded by the local education authorities, were not. Abuses of convention rights in one school would be amenable to correction in the domestic courts, whereas abuses in another school could be dealt with only at Strasbourg.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Faversham and Mid-Kent): The Church has the power to marry in a way that the state recognises, but the choice to get married in a church is entirely voluntary. Does that not alter the case?

Mr. Straw: The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point. There was a time when one could get married only in church but, these days, marriage is a matter of civil law—it is the exercise of a public right. The Churches are standing in the stead of the state in arranging the ceremony of marriage, which is recognised not only in canon law, but in civil law. In that instance, the Church is performing a function not only for itself, but for civil society.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): In the context of education in Northern Ireland, Church schools—which are primarily under the management of Roman Catholic authorities—are not subject to equal rights and fair employment legislation in the appointment of teachers. Is the Home Secretary saying that, under the Bill, those Church schools will be subject to the convention? Moreover, although I understand that, in society, marriage may now be a civil matter, is the Home Secretary saying that an officiating minister of whatever denomination will have no right of conscience if he believes that a person has come to him for what are, in the Church's view, improper reasons?

Mr. Straw: On the second point, I say entirely the reverse. Of course a minister has a right of conscience—his duty to marry people is, first and foremost, a matter relating to the Church to which he belongs. If he conducts a marriage ceremony, that has an effect not only in canonical law, but in civil law. At that point, as I explained, the minister is exercising powers in the stead of the state.

If the hon. Gentleman will bear with me, I shall explain how we propose in the School Standards and Framework Bill, rather than in this Bill, fully to satisfy the anxieties that have been expressed in the House of Commons and in another place about the right of Church schools of whatever denomination to ensure that those they appoint are those who accept the faith.

Concern was expressed that the Bill would require ministers of religion to do things that were contrary to their doctrine or belief, such as to conduct marriages between same-sex couples or divorced persons. We have never believed that the consequences of applying the Bill to Church representatives in those matters in their capacity as public authorities would be as adverse as has been predicted. Even without the amendments made in another place and the further proposals that are before the Committee today, the Bill provides two kinds of protection against such an occurrence—I make this point to emphasise that we were not careless of the issue before it was raised in the other place.

The first protection is that, under clause 2, the domestic courts will be required to have regard to the jurisprudence of convention institutions. Strasbourg case law is clearly to the effect that, under article 12 of the convention, the right to marry does not extend to persons of the same biological sex. Moreover, article 12 does not include the right to marry according to a particular ceremony of one's choice. The availability of a civil marriage is sufficient to meet the requirements of the article.

The second protection is that the courts will be required to give priority to domestic primary legislation over the convention rights in the event of a conflict that cannot be reconciled by judicial interpretation. Domestic primary legislation specifically provides that same-sex marriages are void, and although Church of England priests have a statutory duty to conduct marriages—the Church of England is, by law, the established Church—they are specifically granted a discretion to refuse to marry divorced persons.

Miss Ann Widdecombe (Maidstone and The Weald): The Home Secretary has described a situation in which primary law would have precedence over the convention. If primary law says that same-sex marriages are void, as it does at the moment, that takes priority. However, if primary law were to be changed and same-sex marriages were to become valid, where would that leave Churches in the interpretation of the convention?

Mr. Straw: We are talking about the application of the convention. In the domestic jurisdiction of Parliament, it would be open to the House of Commons, if it wanted, to say that same-sex marriages could apply. The right hon. Lady is asking me to speculate whether that would be outwith the convention.

Miss Widdecombe: My question is straightforward: if our civil law were to say at any stage that same-sex marriages were valid, and the teaching of the Church remained that they were not, where would that leave the Church?

7.30 pm

Mr. Straw: I think that I understand the right hon. Lady's point. It would be open to Parliament to say that civil marriages could apply to same-sex couples, but that would palpably not apply to Churches.

There is a parallel with divorced couples. Since we allow divorce, we have to allow divorced people to remarry—well, we do not have to, but we do, and some of us have taken advantage of the facility and have been married more than once; in my experience, it saves living over the brush, as they say in Blackburn—but that applies to civil registrars and does not in any way affect the right of the Church of England to refuse to marry divorced people. The right of any Church, which we intend to strengthen, to refuse to marry divorced people remains protected by the convention.

Sir Brian Mawhinney (North-West Cambridgeshire): The fundamental problem is the Government's unwillingness to define what constitutes a public authority. I do not want to be aggressive or offensive, but in a sense it does not matter what the Home Secretary says he believes or does not believe, because he has already said that the courts will decide. Given what he is asking the Committee to believe regarding his intention, the simplest way of dealing with the matter would be to write into the Bill the prohibitions to which he referred, to take away any ambiguity and provide clarity. Will he explain to the Committee why he refuses to do that?

Mr. Straw: If the right hon. Gentleman will bear with me, I am seeking to explain why I do not find the amendments made in another place acceptable. I have sent him a detailed letter and had conversations with him, explaining that I am setting out an alternative that strengthens the law and goes a long way towards meeting the Churches' concerns, as the Cardinal Archbishop and the Archbishop of Canterbury have made clear, and as Baroness Young, who tabled those amendments, was generous enough to say in an article in The Daily Telegraph.

The right hon. Gentleman utters a truism when he says that it is for the courts to decide the interpretation of the Bill. That is true in any case: we pass the words, but it is for the courts to interpret them. The words may be perfectly clear, but sometimes the courts interpret them differently: that is a matter of fact.

Mr. Garnier: Pepper v. Hart.

Mr. Straw: Indeed: the doctrine of that judgment is one of the aids that are available to the courts and allows them to look behind the words and consider Parliament's intention in so far as it has been expressed with clarity by the Minister concerned. We debated the definition of public authorities at great length, and it is our judgment that clause 6 provides a clear and robust definition.

There will be occasions—it is the nature of British society—on which various institutions that are private in terms of their legal personality carry out public functions. That includes the Churches in the narrow circumstances that I have described. I would suggest that it also includes the Jockey Club.

Other countries have public bodies to regulate racing; in this country, we do it in a different way. That is how we have always done it, and I know of no proposals to change the system. The Jockey Club is a curious body; it is entirely private, but exercises public functions in some respects, and to those extents, but to no other, it would be regarded as falling within clause 6.

Miss Widdecombe: The Home Secretary said that, under Pepper v. Hart, a Minister's explanations, if spoken with sufficient clarity, could be taken into account in interpreting the law. Will he now speak with exceeding clarity and assure the House categorically that it is the Government's intention—not what they believe, but their intention—that nothing in the convention, or in any incorporation of it into any part of our law whatever, will attenuate the Churches' right to doctrinal purity in matters of discharging public and private functions, and in employment?

Mr. Straw: I hope that the right hon. Lady will bear with me as I explain—

Miss Widdecombe: Ha!

Mr. Straw: I was about to give the right hon. Lady an absolutely affirmative answer, and it would have been easy to do so, but she spoiled her question by talking about private and public functions, and any functions. [HON. MEMBERS: "Employment."] I am dealing with employment. Where the Churches are employing teachers, they are exercising a public function under statute passed by the House. That goes back to the Board of Education in the 1830s, when Parliament started to use the Churches as agents of state education.

Miss Widdecombe rose—

Mr. Straw: I have given way to the right hon. Lady three times. If she will bear with me, I hope to explain the position—in the main, if not wholly, to her satisfaction.

We recognise that Church concerns remain, notwithstanding the care we took in framing the Bill to satisfy ourselves that it did not affect the private functions of the Churches. There are concerns about religious doctrines and practices having to give way to convention rights and about staffing issues in Church schools.

The provisions that were inserted in the Bill on Third Reading in another place represent an attempt to reassure the Churches about its impact. I understand their intention, but they give rise to considerable difficulties. They raise the prospect of some actions being protected by the provisions that certainly ought to be amenable to correction on human rights grounds. As a result—this is the conundrum that those amendments pose—the acts in question might themselves be found in Strasbourg to have violated the convention, but would be incapable of correction by means of a better and domestic remedy.

The amendments made in another place carry a risk of violating the convention in their own right. It really would be an oddity if the Bill incorporating the convention on human rights was itself outwith that convention. That is particularly relevant to the amended clause 2, which accords one convention right, article 9, automatic priority over all others, whatever the circumstances.

There are other difficulties: both the amended clause 2 and clause 7 would discriminate between principal religious traditions and others, which would be unfair to minority religions, and would drag the courts into considering doctrinal issues.

The amended clause 6, which is aimed at the Church of Scotland, would also be likely to produce legal uncertainty in relation to the courts of the Church of England. The amended clause 7 deals with matters more properly addressed in the School Standards and Framework Bill. We have concluded that the provisions cannot properly remain in the Bill, and that is why Government amendments Nos. 137A, 138, 137, 41 and 44 were tabled to remove them.

Although we cannot accept the amendments made in the House of Lords, we think that we can meet Church concerns by other routes, without violating the convention or compromising the integrity of the Bill.

One point among many that impressed me in my discussions with Church representatives was that almost everyone who visited me and Lord Williams of Mostyn said that they accepted the principle of the convention. Many said that they wished the Bill to be incorporated. That is the formal position of the Church of England and the Roman Catholic Church. It is also the stated position of the Church of Scotland; my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland will go into more detail.

Among other matters, the Churches were seriously concerned that, whatever protection there was in the merits of the Bill, the incorporation of the convention might encourage vexatious litigation against them. I accept that. It may encourage vexatious litigation against the Government. We will have to meet that in the initial stages, and we intend to do so.

The Government at least have paid lawyers. It is part of our job in introducing such a Bill; we can hardly complain. It is plain that congregations do not put their money on the plate on a Sunday principally to ensure that lawyers are paid to fund unnecessary actions against them. For that reason and others, I thought that we should go as far as we possibly could to make it clear in the Bill that the Churches were to have protection consistent with the convention.

Mr. Hogg: If the right hon. Gentleman finds this question difficult to answer now, I will understand if he wants to answer it later. He has made it plain that nothing in the Bill compels the Church to marry, for example, divorced couples; or, if our primary legislation permitted it, persons of the same sex. As he fairly said, in those circumstances a civil marriage is available, which is sufficient for the convention.

Assuming that the right hon. Gentleman means exactly what he says—I am sure he does—I am not clear why he wants to remove clause 7(8), which provides protection for the Church in the context of marriage, and which would be removed by Government amendment No. 44. It is a big amendment that takes quite a lot else out as well, but I think that clause 7(8) does no more than enshrine the protection that he says the Churches have, under his understanding of the law.

Mr. Straw: Having had notice of that question, I shall seek later to provide the right hon. and learned Gentleman with details of why we found clause 7(8) unacceptable. We considered this carefully. I do not expect all hon. Members to accept everything we have done, but we believe that new clause 9 deals with the anxieties raised by the Churches, without getting us into the impossible situation of risking having parts of what will become the Act that are outwith the convention.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): In proposing the deletion of parts of clause 6, the right hon. Gentleman explained that what relates to the courts of the Church of Scotland could cause uncertainty with regard to the courts of the Church of England. It seems odd to clear that uncertainty up by possibly creating one for the courts of the Church of Scotland. Is he satisfied that the exclusive jurisdiction of the Church of Scotland in matters spiritual under the Church of Scotland Act 1921 remains unaffected by the sum total of deletions and additions?

Mr. Straw: Having been pupilled to a lawyer expert in English ecclesiastical law, I know that a little knowledge is a dangerous thing. I do not profess any expertise in the law relating to the Church of Scotland, but my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland is here. He is a Scots lawyer, and I defer to him on this, as I do on almost everything. If the hon. and learned Gentleman will wait, he will have all explained by my right hon. Friend.

The purpose of new clause 9, which stands in my name and—just mine, as it turns out. [Laughter.] One develops an autopilot from 17 years on the Opposition Front Bench. The new clauses that I moved, with little hope of getting them through, always stood in my name and those of several colleagues. I see that, because I am "Mr. Secretary Straw", I am the only person who adorns the new clause.

New clause 9 would come into play in any case in which a court's determination of any question arising out of the Bill might affect the exercise by a religious organisation of the convention right of freedom of thought, conscience and religion. In such a case, it provides for the court to have particular regard—not just to have regard, going back to the earlier debate, but to have particular regard—to the importance of that right. Its purpose is not to exempt Churches and other religious organisations from the scope of the Bill—they have not sought that—any more than from that of the convention. It is to reassure them against the Bill being used to intrude upon genuinely religious beliefs or practices based on their beliefs. I emphasise the word "practices", as well as "beliefs".

There is ample reassurance available on this point from convention jurisprudence. Apart from stating the importance of the courts having due regard to article 9, new clause 9 is designed to bring out the point that article 9 rights attach not only to individuals but to the Churches. The idea that convention rights typically attach only to individuals and not the Churches caused considerable anxiety. I understood that, and that is why the new clause has been phrased so that the Churches have its protection as well as individuals.

There is convention jurisprudence to the effect that a Church body or other association with religious objectives is capable of possessing and exercising the rights in article 9 as a representative of its members. The new clause will emphasise that point to our courts. The intention is to focus the courts' attention in any proceedings on the view generally held by the Church in question, and on its interest in protecting the integrity of the common faith of its members against attack, whether by outsiders or by individual dissidents. That is a significant protection.

The Committee will note that the new clause refers to the exercise of the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion by a "religious organisation", but leaves that expression undefined. Some hon. Members may wonder why we describe Churches in that way. The answer is partly that no definition is readily available, at home or in Strasbourg.

We considered the issue with great care, and took the advice of parliamentary counsel. I have already referred to the difficulty arising from this point in the amendments made in another place in discriminating between some religions and others. We are seeking to reflect precisely the Strasbourg case law. The convention institutions have not offered a definition, but we are confident that the term "religious organisation" is recognisable in terms of the convention.

Mrs. May: I share the concerns expressed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) and others about the Bill's impact on Churches. Will the Home Secretary reflect on the definition of religious organisations, and consider whether, by drawing that definition so widely, he risks including within it organisations and sects that would claim to have a religious aspect but whose activities most hon. Members would not regard as worthy of their support? I ask him to think carefully on that.

Mr. Straw: We have thought about that. The hon. Lady raises an important point about drafting. If I may, I will answer her when I or my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland winds up.

The key concept that we are talking about is organisations with religious objectives. It may be helpful if I comment at this point on new clause 12. That is very similar to, and is clearly built upon, Government new clause 9, but it inserts a reference to charities with religious foundations as well as what we have called "religious organisations". The intention is no doubt to achieve the same effect in relation to religious charities as in relation to Churches themselves. Although we recognise the intention of new clause 12, I propose that it is both unnecessary and unwise.

One of the advantages of Government new clause 9 is that it is flexible enough to cover cases involving religious charities where Church issues form a backdrop to the case. I say this because it applies to a court's determination of any question arising under the Human Rights Bill that might affect the exercise by a religious organisation of the rights guaranteed by article 9. It is therefore not tied to circumstances in which a religious organisation is directly involved, as a body, in the court proceedings.

If a case is brought against a charity, and the charity can show that what it is doing is to maintain and practise the religious beliefs which it shares with its parent Church, we consider that new clause 9 would come into play so as to ensure that due consideration was given to those beliefs.

The difficulty with a specific reference to religious charities, as new clause 12 would provide, is, first, that the article 9 rights attach more naturally to Churches themselves, at least in the first instance, than to other bodies. The benefit to charities and so on is indirect.

Secondly, however—this is one of the ways in which innocently phrased amendments can sometimes have the reverse effect of that intended—by drawing attention to religious charities in this way, new clause 12 might have the undesirable effect of excluding from the scope of new clause 9 other organisations supported by a Church, such as governing bodies of Church schools, or adoption agencies.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury): Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Straw: In a moment, if the hon. Gentleman will allow me.

The Government new clause will not provide absolute protection for Churches or other religious organisations as against any claim that might possibly be made against them.

Mr. Clappison: That is true.

Mr. Straw: Of course. We could not possibly do that without violating the convention or undermining the objects of the Bill. There has never been any dubiety about that, but the new clause will send a clear signal to the courts that they must pay due regard to the rights guaranteed by article 9, including, where relevant, the right of a Church to act in accordance with religious belief.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Straw: No. I promised to give way to the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson).

Mr. Laurence Robertson: I am trying to follow the Home Secretary's line of thought, but I am finding it a touch inconsistent. A few moments ago, he said that it was important to define which religious bodies would benefit. A religious charity, being governed so strictly by the charities legislation, would have a close definition. Will the right hon. Gentleman accept from someone who worked for a religious charity before entering the House that a great deal of good work is carried out by such charities that may not be strictly religious, but which makes it vital that those charities are able to employ people of religious thought?

Mr. Straw: Nothing in the Bill applies to any organisation unless the organisation is a public body—charities are not of themselves public bodies—so what the hon. Gentleman describes would be outwith the Bill in any event. Provided the employment practices of a charity came within the general law—nothing to do with the convention—the Bill would have no effect.

The hon. Gentleman will also be aware that a charity may have a religious objective, but also may have other objectives that are not religious. We believe that we deal with the anxiety that has been raised in the manner that I have described.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross) rose—

Mr. Leigh rose—

Mr. Straw: I will give way to the right hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (Mr. Maclennan), and then to the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh); then I shall make some progress.

Mr. Maclennan: For the avoidance of doubt, I want to ask the Home Secretary about the wording of new clause 9, which I welcome, but which clearly refers in its own language to the provisions of article 9. I assume that he does not seek to give a priori priority to article 9 over other provisions of the convention that are equally applicable, and would also have to be considered by the court if issues touched by the new clause were raised.

Mr. Straw: The difficulty with the amendments that are now contained in the Bill is that they give absolute precedence to article 9 over all other convention rights. It is our judgment, and I do not think that there is a great deal of argument about it, that that would put the Bill outwith the convention. New clause 9 seeks to do exactly what it says. The language is straightforward. It gives particular regard to the importance of convention 9 rights, but it applies, as I have explained, to the exercise of those rights by a religious organisation or its members collectively. That is an important protection in addition to the Churches as bodies.

Mr. Leigh: The Home Secretary has referred in some detail to new clause 12, which I tabled. He claimed that, although the hon. Member who tabled new clause 12 might have done so innocently, it would have the opposite effect to what he intended. I assure him that I did table it innocently, and that I did not intend it to have the opposite effect to what I intended. He claimed that it would have the opposite effect because, if charities were singled out, people might well have an excuse to attack other organisations. If that is true, why is he singling out schools in his own amendment?

My legal advice is that the exceptions to human rights legislation are interpreted very narrowly by the courts. Only organisations of which the primary purpose is the advancement of religion will be classed as religious organisations, so charities might well be pursued under the convention.

Mr. Straw: The reason why we have "singled out" schools is that local authority schools or those funded by local authorities are public bodies. I come back to the wisdom of the definition of a public authority contained in clause 6, which is designed to ensure that the convention applies only to public authorities or bodies performing the functions of a public authority, and in that capacity alone. Charities per se are not public bodies.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): On that very point, what about adoption agencies, to which the right hon. Gentleman referred earlier, and children's homes?

Mr. Straw: That is exactly the point that I was making. An adoption agency may not be a charity. Some are, and some are not. But an adoption agency may be supported by a Church. Of course I accept that the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) did not set out to draft an amendment that was perverse. However, having spent 18 years on the Opposition Benches, I can say that, however much wisdom one has in drafting amendments, occasionally one cannot compete with the wisdom of parliamentary counsel. I do not claim that wisdom, but at least I have the benefit of his advice. An adoption agency may not be a charity. The ironic and perverse effect of new clause 12 might be inadvertently to exclude an adoption agency supported by a Church if it was not a charity. We believe that our new clause would include the protection that we are providing.

May I make progress, and deal with Church schools? I have given way considerably, as hon. Members will recognise. We have considered carefully how we can respond to concerns about staffing issues in Church schools in the context of the School Standards and Framework Bill. We have tabled an amendment to that Bill to provide, in relation to voluntary aided schools, that regard may be had, in connection with the termination of the employment of any teacher at the school, to any conduct on his part which is incompatible with the precepts, or with the upholding of the tenets, of the religion or religious denomination in question.

We are also preparing an amendment to provide, in relation to foundation or voluntary controlled schools with a religious character, that, in appointing a head teacher at such a school, regard may be had to his ability and fitness to preserve and develop the religious character of the school. Those amendments are designed to produce the same effect as amendments to the School Standards and Framework Bill already tabled by the Bishop of Ripon.

We have accordingly made every effort to try to meet Church concerns within the framework of the United Kingdom's convention obligations. Hon. Members on both sides of the Committee will understand that, because of the diverse nature of representations made by the Churches, and because of their own diverse nature, we were not in a position where we were negotiating with the Churches—frankly, that would have been impossible—but we did try to take on board their concerns.

I should like to thank the Churches and Baroness Young for what they have said about the amendments. In The Daily Telegraph of 19 May, Baroness Young is reported as saying that these changes "will give assurance to people of all denominations that, should there be litigation under this Bill, the courts must pay particular regard to the special position of churches and religious schools."

She is entirely right to say that.

8 pm

The Cardinal Archbishop of the Roman Catholic Church, Basil Hume, wrote to me to say, first, that he wanted to make it clear that he was in favour of the Bill, which seeks to incorporate the convention into United Kingdom law. He then spelled out the anxieties that had arisen, and said that he was grateful to me and to my officials for the way in which we had listened and responded to those concerns. He went on:

"I am delighted that the Government has agreed to move an amendment to the School Standards and Framework Bill. This wholly meets the Catholic Church's concerns about its right to employ in voluntary aided church schools teachers who believe in and act out the Christian, and in our case Catholic, faith in their lives."

I also welcome the fact that the Government has moved an amendment to the Human Rights Bill in order to meet the more general anxiety we have expressed. I recognise the difficulty of framing an amendment in a way which is consistent with the Convention. I have sought the best legal advice and my initial assessment is that the amendment in the form tabled by the Government may be the best that can reasonably be achieved to reinforce the protection given by the Convention to the churches and other faiths under Article 9."

For the sake of completeness, I should tell the hon. Member for Gainsborough that the Cardinal Archbishop also writes:

"I have some hesitations, however, especially over the phrase 'religious organisation' as it is undefined and could be ambiguous."

I hope that I have clarified that point. He continues:

"I very much hope that, in introducing the amendment in the House, you will make clear exactly what its intended effect is. It would also be helpful if you would publicly confirm that for the purposes of this Bill the Catholic Church is not a 'public authority' except when, as you put in your letter, the church is standing 'in place of the state'."

I confirmed that earlier, and I confirm it again.

I also received a letter from the Archbishop of Canterbury, head of the Anglican Church, who says:

"The proposed new clause does not provide the firm guarantee of the Churches' continued doctrinal independence which we have sought, and you will appreciate that not all Church members will therefore be satisfied with it.

Nonetheless, I am grateful both for the new clause and for the proposed amendments to both the Human Rights Bill and the School Standards and Framework Bill which, together with the assurances given by the Lord Chancellor in the House of Lords and the other amendments already made in response to the concerns of the churches, I believe constitute a significant improvement.

For the present may I repeat my gratitude for the efforts you have made in response to the concerns expressed to you by myself and other Church leaders."

Having put those points on the record, let me deal briefly with the other amendments in the group. As we shall be inviting the Committee to remove the provisions inserted by another place, we naturally cannot accept amendments that would amend those provisions. Accordingly, we cannot accept amendment No. 8 to clause 2, or amendments Nos. 55, 57, 113, 114, 115 and 116 to clause 7.

Nor can we accept amendments that would extend the principle on which the provisions inserted by another place were based. For that reason, we cannot accept amendment No. 40, which is concerned with appointments to governing bodies and admissions policies at Church schools. If there is any problem in those areas in connection with the convention rights—I am not aware of any reason why there should be—the right place to deal with it is in specific legislation on education rather than in the Human Rights Bill.

We cannot accept amendment No. 56, which builds on clause 7(8), by providing that nothing in the Bill makes it unlawful for persons acting on behalf of a Christian or other principal religious tradition represented in the United Kingdom to refuse to carry out certain acts, such as administer the sacrament, if they are contrary to their religious doctrines or convictions. As I have explained, we do not believe that the Bill would require Churches to act against their conscience for one moment, and new clause 9 will reinforce that.

The remaining amendments in the group take a different approach to the issue of the impact of the Bill on Churches and other religious organisations. For reasons that I have explained and I which hope the Committee will accept, we find those amendments unacceptable.

Amendment No. 100 would operate on clause 6(3) so as to provide that a 'public authority' does not include the persons listed in what would be new schedule 1. Those are priests, ministers and other officials of a Church, religious denomination, mosque, synagogue or temple; persons exercising functions under the authority or on behalf of their membership; and persons exercising functions in connection with the ecclesiastical courts of the Church of England—with which, for a brief period in my career, I was all too familiar.

Mr. Hogg: I do not want to take the Home Secretary out of his sequence, because I realise how tiresome that can be, but is he going to tell us why, in Government amendment No. 44, he is seeking to remove from the Bill the provisions set out in clause 7(8) and (9)? I understand that he accepts those provisions in principle, but he is none the less removing them from the Bill. Is that for drafting reasons, or because of some other consideration which I have not yet fathomed?

Mr. Straw: I am grateful to the right hon. and learned Gentleman for that intervention, and I shall deal with clause 7(8) I shall come back to him if he is not satisfied with my answer on that or on clause 7(9).

The reason that we seek to remove clause 7(8) is that, in our judgment, the way in which it is drafted discriminates between principal religious traditions and others, which is unfair to minority religions. It would draw the courts into consideration of doctrinal matters, which is the last thing anyone wants.

We also believe that it is in the wrong place: specific concerns about the conduct of marriages are properly addressed in marriage legislation, not in a Bill of general application such as the one before the Committee. When an equivalent point was raised about the position of Church schools, I advised the Bishop of Ripon that the best place to address that was in amendments to the School Standards and Framework Bill. We then facilitated the tabling of amendments, and we have ended up with better legislation than was originally intended.

Amendment No. 90 removes references to Measures of the Church Assembly and Measures of the General Synod of the Church of England from the definition of primary legislation in clause 21. The effect would be to leave the courts with no indication of whether those were to be treated as primary or subordinate legislation for the purposes of the Bill. The courts need to know that, because it affects what they will be able to do if such Measures are considered to be incompatible with convention rights.

The Measures are to be treated as primary legislation, because, under the Church of England Assembly (Powers) Act 1919, with which right hon. and hon. Members will be instantly familiar, Measures have the force and effect of an Act of Parliament once they receive Royal Assent. The Church by law established, of which I am an active member, is in a different position from any other Church, and, as long as it is established, there are things that go with that territory which cannot be avoided.

We amended the Bill in another place to ensure that such Measures, if declared incompatible by the courts, could not be amended by the Government under the remedial order procedure. The response we had from the Church of England at that time demonstrated its satisfaction on that point, and I am not aware of any remaining concern about the application of the Bill to Church Measures.

I have spoken at some length, but the impact of the Bill on the Churches is an extremely important issue, and I wanted to explain fully the conclusions we had reached. I said on Second Reading that I recognised the concerns that had been expressed, and that I would listen to what was said. Not only have I listened, but I have sought to act, and to go as far as we believe we can within the convention to meet those concerns.

I commend amendments Nos. 41, 44, 137, 137A and 138 and new clause 9 to the Committee. I hope that, in light of the explanations that I have offered, Hon. Members who tabled the other amendments in the group will seek leave to withdraw them.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: I start by declaring an interest. I am a Christian, and have been in continuous Church membership for about 40 years. Happily, that does not make me even remotely unique in the House or on either side of the House, but it does mean that I approach this subject with a bias. I approach it with a bias in determining that the Bill should not impinge or intrude on the beliefs and practices of Churches and religious organisations in a way that would be incompatible with their historic traditions and formularies.

I am grateful to the Home Secretary for the courtesy that he has shown to myself and others. On Second Reading, we urged him to consult, and he did so. He and I have had many conversations, so I place on the record my appreciation of that fact, and my certainty that he was right to consult.

His approach contrasts sharply with the line that the Lord Chancellor took in another place, where he told the Lords that it never occurred to anyone in the Government that the Churches would have any particular difficulty in playing their proper part in the enforcement of human rights in Britain. That was either an expression of considerable arrogance on his part, reflecting a lack of knowledge of Church practice and belief, or an indication of an unwillingness to contemplate that genuine concerns might be raised by the Bill, which the Government would need to address. By his words, he sucked the Home Secretary into that arrogant view, but I want to make it clear that that has not been my perception of the Home Secretary in his dealings on the matter.

The imputation that the Churches were trying to wriggle out of their human rights responsibilities is indefensible. A press release issued by the communications unit of the General Synod of the Church of England on 9 March, which covers the meeting that took place between the Home Secretary and representatives of the Church of England, the free Churches and the Roman Catholic Church, says:

"All the churches made clear their warm welcome for the main thrust of the Bill, which enables the rights enshrined in the European Convention on Human Rights to be directly enforced in the UK courts.

In the view of the churches, however, a problem may arise for them because the Government has chosen in clause 6 of the Bill to give a wide definition of 'public authority' which will include the churches. No other European country has done this and the churches are advised that this could be a source of real difficulty, in particular because it would allow the UK courts into uncharted areas where there are no precedents in Strasbourg."

I shall return to that point.

There is no suggestion, therefore, that the Churches do not wish to support the general thrust of the Bill, and it is unacceptable to try to suggest—as the Lord Chancellor did—that the fact that they have legitimate concerns, which have blossomed since he made those ill-advised comments, means that they oppose the Bill generally.

I could take much of the Committee's time—I am sure that it would be put to good use, although I hope that I would not incur your ire if I did so, Mr. Martin—repeating many reflections of the unease and concern of the Church. The Catholic Times of 15 March and 12 April; The Church of England Newspaper of 9 April; a letter to The Times from leading members of the General Synod of the Church of England, supported by at least 50 other Synod members, of 5 February 1998; and very many other articles and letters reflect such concern. As we debate this issue tonight, we are discussing not something in the margin of the religious life and activity of this nation, but a subject of general concern.

8.15 pm

I believe that the Bishop of Ripon—whom the Home Secretary mentioned—was the first to bring out the vexatious litigation point to which the Home Secretary referred. He said:

"We are aware that there are hostile, anti-religious groups which would be only too glad of an opportunity to test in the courts the actions of religious bodies and people acting in accordance with their beliefs and convictions.

The Church of England, and I suppose other Churches, have already had considerable experience of litigation which they have resisted, but it is costly in terms of money and energy. It is likely that there will be groups which will be only too happy to take Churches to the British courts to prove a point. It will be costly for those who have to resist such actions."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 5 February 1998; Vol. 585, c. 774.]

Therefore, tonight we are discussing not only belief and practice, but the more mundane but equally important issues of vexatious litigation, cost and a permanent sense of Churches and religious bodies under pressure to conform to standards, belief patterns and moral judgments which, historically and theologically, they do not accept or believe.

When, on 15 May, the Home Secretary wrote me a letter, which he has already mentioned, he said—I am not trying to create a wrong impression by reading only a short extract; I am merely trying to save time—

"Most of the things that churches do are, in the legal context and in the context of the European Convention on Human Rights, essentially private in nature, and would not be affected by the Bill. Where the churches stand in place of the State, however, we think it is right in principle that people should be able to raise Convention points in respect of their actions on the same basis as they will be able to do in respect of the actions of other 'public authorities'—however rarely the occasion may arise."

The Home Secretary defined Churches in that paragraph as standing

"in place of the State".

He used that definition at the start of his speech. If that is the definition, his speech has—with one proviso, to which I shall come later—a logical coherence. The problem is that that is not how the Bill defines those issues. As the Lord Chancellor pointed out, the Bill defines public authorities in the context of their functions—not standing but in the context of the activities that they undertake and the power that they discharge.

"in place of the State",

That appears to me an important point. I return to the intervention that I made on the Home Secretary. At the heart of our problem with the Bill—I shall expand on this shortly—is the Government's unwillingness to translate their own beliefs into unambiguous language, so that everyone understands exactly where they stand.

The right hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (Mr. Maclennan) put his finger right on the spot. When asked about new clause 9, the Home Secretary was caught in a cleft stick or, to change the metaphor, between a rock and hard place. He had used new clause 9 to persuade the cardinal and the archbishop that that is the sort of thing that they want from the Government.

The right hon. Gentleman pointed out that new clause 9 simply reflects article 9 and cannot be given the interpretation of particular regard that the cardinal and archbishop would wish to give them the certainty that they have been seeking for some months, because to do that would go against the grain of the Bill. The Home Secretary was at least honest and open in responding to that good intervention.

We have an understanding that Churches and religious organisations, as well as matters of belief and practice, are involved in education. The Home Secretary made it clear that the education aspects will be dealt with in another piece of legislation, so it would be appropriate to leave them for another Committee to deal with rather than deal with them tonight. However, I mention them if only to recognise the importance that we attach to them.

The Churches and religious organisations provide homes for people, caring services and charitable functions, and most people—but apparently not new Labour—would recognise that those are not necessarily, or by definition, state functions. Registering a marriage is a state function, but marrying people in the eyes of God is not. We are left wondering why the Home Secretary believes that a secular court should be charged with deciding what constitutes a public or private authority function, and whether in law, and in Strasbourg law, there is any difference between the two.

I keep using the word "function" because it is the only defining modus operandi that the Lord Chancellor used, to which the Home Secretary has not added in his contribution this evening, and because, despite all our probings, the Government will not define a public authority. It is unusual for Governments to bring forward legislation, particularly legislation of major significance, and leave undefined one of its central issues.

The Home Secretary accused me of issuing a truism. I plead guilty. The right hon. Gentleman is a lawyer and I am not. I am just a humble scientist. [HON. MEMBERS: "Ah."] That evokes the usual patronising response from lawyers. However, I understand that, while the courts interpret what we say, it is usually hugely to the courts' advantage if we say what we mean before we ask the courts to interpret it. The charge against the Government in this regard is that they will not say what they mean. They are, in effect, washing their hands of the issue, so that the courts can take any opprobrium that might flow from the legislation. I agree that plenty of opprobrium will flow from the amendment.

The White Paper made constant references to the position of public authorities, citing central and local government and others exercising similar executive powers, among which were the police, immigration officers, prisons, courts, tribunals and privatised utilities that exercise public functions, and to the need for the exercise of those powers in a way that was compatible with the convention.

Interestingly, in the White Paper, the examples of such public authorities did not include Churches, religious organisations or religious charities. The underlying legislative intention was, as stated, in no way related to such bodies. The Bill was not intended to encroach on the religious freedom that Churches have hitherto enjoyed, yet, because of the obscurity of the definition of a public authority in clause 6(3), which includes "any person certain of whose functions are functions of a public nature", but not when a particular act of that person is, by its nature, private, it is now recognised that such bodies may be caught by the Bill for certain of their activities. The Lord Chancellor said that Churches, hospices, schools and charities that work with the homeless may all exercise public functions.

The European convention was intended to protect the individual against the state. Clause 6 makes it possible for Churches and religious organisations to be deemed part of the state—a public authority—when they carry out public functions. But I am advised that what the Home Secretary told us was simply not the case; that there is no jurisprudence from the Strasbourg court on public authorities claiming an article 9 defence. Therefore, I should be grateful if the Secretary of State for Scotland addresses that specific point when he replies.

[Sir Brian Mawhinney]

The Secretary of State for Scotland clearly was not listening, so I shall repeat that. I have been advised that there is no jurisprudence from the Strasbourg court on public authorities claiming an article 9 defence.

Mr. Straw: We were listening. We were looking perplexed because we did not follow the point, but we were listening. It was because we were listening that we could not follow the point. What I was trying to work out with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland was how article 9 is directly relevant to the definition of a public authority. One must first decide whether the convention rights attach to a body by deciding whether it is a public authority. If it is a public authority as defined, all the convention rights as circumscribed by the Bill will apply. If it is not a public authority, they will not. I am sorry, but I am not following the right hon. Gentleman's point.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: The Home Secretary made it clear that Churches or religious organisations had no need to worry about being a public authority, because they could have protection in terms of Strasbourg jurisprudence and the primacy of UK law.

I have been advised that that is not the case in terms of an article 9 defence for public authorities in the context of Strasbourg jurisprudence. Because there is a difference of opinion and advice between us, I was asking the Secretary of State for Scotland to address that point when he replies.

Mr. Leigh: It is important that we deal with the Home Secretary's intervention, because he may have misunderstood what his officials have told him. The Home Office has repeatedly made it clear in recent weeks that it is precisely the right to freedom in article 9 that would protect the Churches. The Home Secretary is now trying to wriggle away from that. I do not see what point he is trying to make.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, and I am encouraged that my argument was understood by him, if not by the Home Secretary. I look forward to hearing what the Secretary of State for Scotland says in his response.

Rev. Martin Smyth: The right hon. Gentleman referred to Strasbourg jurisprudence and decisions. The court in Strasbourg heard a case taken by an atheist against the Salvation Army in Holland, on the ground that the Salvation Army had discriminated against him because he was not a Christian. Has the right hon. Gentleman any knowledge of the case, and does he know the outcome? The court's decision would provide guidance.

8.30 pm

Sir Brian Mawhinney: My hon. Friend is right. After I deal with the philosophical problem, I shall discuss various practical examples. The system of belief and practice that underlies the issue is of fundamental importance—my hon. Friend, as a Presbyterian minister, would certainly accept that—but the practical application is also important. I shall shortly come to the point that he makes.

When the Secretary of State for Scotland sums up, will he comment on the acceptance by the European Commission of Human Rights in the recent case of Thomas Tyler, when the commission considered that of the Church of England

"the applicant's functions as a priest"

"are more in the nature of public service than they are of private professional practice."?

That is a stunning statement by the European Commission. The Home Secretary spent a considerable part of his speech telling us that there was a clear distinction between the public and the private, with respect to the Church and the discharge of its functions. He said that virtually everything that the Church did was private and would therefore not be covered by the Bill, and that only a little bit of what the Church did was public, when it was standing in place of the state. Yet the European Commission said exactly the opposite in that recent case—I believe that it was in 1994—when it stated that the priest's functions are "more in the nature of public service".

We need to hear from the Secretary of State for Scotland how the Government reconcile the European Commission view with what the Home Secretary has just told the Committee.

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Donald Dewar) rose—

Sir Brian Mawhinney: Let me make progress. We shall return to the matter.

When, on Second Reading, we asked the Government to look again at the issue, they had four options for change. They could have excluded Churches and religious organisations entirely. That was the strongest option, and the Government rejected it. They could have given Churches an absolute defence. That was the next strongest option, but they rejected it. They could have introduced legislation that catered for specific cases, but they rejected that option. They could have issued broad principles to guide the Church when religious liberties are involved. That was the weakest of the four options, and, interestingly, the one that the Government chose. We want to know why.

The junior Home Office Minister in another place declared that Baroness Young's amendment, which the Government now want to delete, could be incompatible with the convention. The Home Secretary made the same point this evening. How would it be incompatible in this country, yet it is not incompatible in Germany?

The German constitution is hierarchically superior to the European convention on human rights and includes a general guarantee of freedom of religion. The main religious denominations in Germany have public law status, which allows them, among other things, to raise taxes. They also have entrenched religious freedoms. All that is possible in a country that subscribes to the convention, but the Home Secretary tells us that it is impossible in this country, which equally subscribes to the convention.

I shall make one final attempt to persuade the Home Secretary to change his mind on the matter and to deal head on with the Opposition's concerns. Freedom of religion necessarily raises greater issues than other freedoms, because the granting of such freedom, if it is to mean anything at all, means allowing liberty to a group of people to arrange their structures and organise their activities in accordance with their deeply held beliefs. Such a group cannot operate in freedom if it is bound to include those who do not share its beliefs or conform to its standards of behaviour. Moreover, the nature of the beliefs held will usually affect every aspect of life, including the exercise of functions of a public nature.

Major religious groupings, and in particular Christian Churches or organisations in the UK, have not been limited to private activities. Historically, they have met vital public needs as part of their mission, and they consider themselves bound to continue to do so. Many Christian organisations meet social needs today which, in the absence of those organisations, the Government would feel bound to meet by other means.

Although many such activities have historically benefited non-adherents to the Christian faith as much as adherents, freedom of religion necessarily involves distinguishing between those who are adherents and those who are not, for the purpose of engaging those who work for the body in question, and in some circumstances to identify the beneficiaries, as some bodies may wish to benefit the adherents exclusively, or at least in priority to non-adherents—for example, religious schools.

There is an inevitable conflict between the freedom of the individual, set out in articles 8 to 12, and as elaborated by article 14 and its prohibition of any discrimination in the enjoyment of such individual rights on the ground of religion, and the freedom of others in a group to manifest their religion or beliefs in practice and observance, in accordance with article 9.

That conflict must be resolved in favour of the group, if there is to be freedom of religion. A group of believers must be free to include only those who share the same beliefs and standards of behaviour, and therefore of necessity to exclude those who do not, whether or not that is labelled discriminatory.

Historically, the secular courts have not interfered with such matters, because they involve issues on which those courts are not competent to adjudicate. Ecclesiastical courts exercise jurisdiction for the established Churches, while other historic Christian denominations or non-Christian religions have been permitted to regulate themselves according to their own patterns of belief and behaviour.

That position should be maintained, in the absence of a breach of the criminal law. Secular courts, especially in an increasingly secular society, should not attempt to judge spiritual issues, nor seek to impose a value system that compels those who, for example, hold a Christian world view to treat others who do not as if they did, and in particular to accept them into their organisation, whether as leaders or employees in any capacity or for any purpose. The courts should not treat the beliefs and standards of a person as irrelevant when dealing with an organisation whose particular beliefs and standards are essential to its existence, whether or not that organisation is fulfilling a role that the Government might otherwise perform.

That seems to me to be an eminently deep and important illustration of the problem that lies at the heart of the Bill. I ask the Home Secretary once more to consider the implications of my remarks before he presses the amendment, which, in the present circumstances, the Committee will approve—for that is the nature of this place—and opens a Pandora's box in the process. I am grateful to the barristers Messrs Cooke and Wales—who have written about this subject not only to me but to other hon. Members—for their insights and their erudition, upon which I have drawn heavily.

I come now to the more practical aspects of the legislation. People are concerned about the implications of the Bill. They are worried about the issue of gay marriages. They are concerned that Churches or religious organisations may be sued if, for example, the Anglicans refuse to have a woman as a bishop, the Muslims refuse to have a woman as an imam, the synagogue refuses to have a woman as an orthodox rabbi, or the Catholic Church refuses to have a woman as an ordained priest. They are not simple issues. I shall give some examples of possible litigation under the Bill.

Let us take the example of a Church school where the headmaster is required to be a practising member of the denomination. The headmaster leaves his wife for another woman who is a teacher at the school. He admits that, and is asked to leave. He then sues for unfair dismissal citing discrimination, article 14, on the ground of his private life, article 8, as part of his claim. He also claims religious discrimination, article 9, as he believes that it is not against his religion to behave in that way.

Mr. Grieve: I am following my right hon. Friend's argument closely, but I confess that I find the breach of article 9 difficult to understand. While I recognise that there is a potential conflict with articles 14 and 8, I cannot follow his argument regarding article 9. How can he argue that the headmaster's own religious beliefs were discriminated against in that example?

Sir Brian Mawhinney: As I made clear in my example, the man might believe that his behaviour was not incompatible with his religion, even though the school judged that it was.

Let me give another example. An atheist applies for a teaching job in a theological institute. His application is refused, so he sues the institute authorities on the ground of religious discrimination. I can inform the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) that that illustration is based on the facts of a case involving the Salvation Army Institute that is currently before the Dutch courts. I do not know the outcome of the case, but the hon. Gentleman referred to it earlier by way of intervention.

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): My intelligence is that the case has been settled in favour of the Salvation Army, but at very considerable expense.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend.

Let me give another example. What about the sale of pornography on Church-owned premises? Suppose the Church Commissioners own a shopping centre and they incorporate into their leases terms forbidding the sale of pornography on the premises. A newspaper vendor breaches those terms, and the commissioners seek a court order forcing the vendor to vacate the premises. In his defence, the vendor cites his right to freedom of conscience and belief, article 9, and to freedom of expression, article 10, and the right not to be discriminated against for his opinions, article 14.

Let us take the example of a Muslim community centre that receives its funding from the local authority. The building is used for Muslim community events, religious services and religious instruction. A humanist group seeks to hire a room to conduct a public meeting but is refused. The group sues claiming discrimination, article 14, on freedom of conscience grounds, article 9, and its right to freedom of expression, article 10, and freedom of assembly, article 11.

Let us take another example of a Christian hospice that is committed to caring for the terminally ill and is completely opposed to euthanasia. It receives grant aid from the local authority. A pro-euthanasia group seeks to advertise its work and make a presentation to the hospice. The hospice refuses and the pro-euthanasia group sues, claiming breach of the right to freedom of conscience and belief, article 9.

Then there is adoption. Let us say that a religious-based adoption agency refuses to recommend a placement with a homosexual person. The agency is sued on the grounds that it is breaching articles 8 and 14. Many such examples could be cited, all of them flowing from the Bill, which the Home Secretary assures us will not have the consequences for belief and practice that manifestly it will.

8.45 pm

The Government have introduced new clause 9. As I said, it simply reflects article 9. In effect, it says to the courts, "When you are considering these issues of the European convention, you have to consider article 9. You have to give particular regard to it." However, as the right hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross said, it is not necessary to give it the overwhelming priority that the Home Secretary is seeking to achieve by way of persuasion, but which is not in the Bill.

Our amendments Nos. 8, 100, 40, 90, 46, and 55 to 57 are all designed to strengthen the protective shield to Churches and religious organisations and their religiously related activities. Those amendments were put into the Bill in another place, and the Government wish them all to be removed. We do not support Government amendment No. 137A for the reasons that I have given, but the Government do.

I do not accuse the Government of mendacity or deliberately seeking to mislead. I merely accuse them of producing legislation that they then seek to persuade people to believe in on the ground that it meets their legitimate concerns when legally it does no such thing.

On 13 May, a number of leaders of Christian Churches and organisations, including the National Club, the chief executive of Tearfund, Shaftesbury Housing Group, the Evangelical Alliance, the Shaftesbury Society, the Church Pastoral-Aid Society, the Institute of Contemporary Christianity and a number of well-known churches in London wrote a letter to the Prime Minister. They sent him a copy of the document from which I have extensively quoted. They wrote:

"We write to express our continuing concern about the probable impact of the Human Rights Bill upon the communities that we represent. We enclose a paper prepared for us by Leading Counsel which explains clearly how the Bill could well curb religious freedom and lead to costly litigation for churches and charities."

It continues:

"The enclosed letter from the Home Office is typical of the arguments which have been used by many M.Ps to try to reassure us. But the letter fails to address the central issue, namely that if the Bill extends the scope of the Convention's application to churches and charities as public authorities, it may create situations where actions of those organisations in accordance with their historic Christian beliefs conflict with the Convention rights of other individuals. This conflict of rights would have to be settled by the courts at great expense. It would be quite wrong for the churches to have to bear this cost, let alone the risk of a secular Court deciding that Christian organisations are prohibited from acting in accordance with historic Christian doctrines and morals in the context of what may be held to be 'functions of a public nature' which they may perform. Christian churches and charities apply in their functions the Christian values which are essential to their very existence. It should be a matter of concern to the public and the Government to ensure that their actions, taken on the basis of historic Christian beliefs, are not held up to lengthy and costly scrutiny in the secular courts—to the detriment of the public good for which those organisations strive.

It is not our purpose to question the Government's intentions (indeed, we support the aim of the Bill) but rather to highlight the effect of the Bill on the churches and charities we represent."

Mr. Dewar: It might clarify what I shall say at the end of the debate if the right hon. Gentleman could explain to me the extension to which he is referring. The convention on human rights has been relevant to the Churches in this country since it was ratified here in 1953. The only change is the forum in which a case can be taken—that is, it can be taken directly in the domestic courts rather than in Strasbourg. The whole gravamen of the right hon. Gentleman's case appears to be that there has been some sort of new threat or extension. I genuinely do not know what difference there has been, other than the point about the forum. It seems to me that the threat—if there is one—has existed since 1953 and that it will not essentially change as a result of this legislation. Can he explain why I am wrong?

Sir Brian Mawhinney: That is clearly the Government's view—[Laughter.] It is clearly neither our view nor that of the Churches and religious organisations, because this legislation will open up opportunities for litigation and movement into areas of belief and practice.

If the Secretary of State for Scotland thinks that there is no problem with belief and practice, why does he not amend new clause 9, for example, to refer to freedom of thought, conscience, and religious practice and belief, as well as religion? The right hon. Gentleman has an easy remedy: if he thinks that we are wrong and that what he says is right, he can copper-bottom what he says by amending the provision, to remove the opportunity for Opposition Members or anyone else to make mischief, as he would see it, around the legislation. The fact that he will not do that—the Home Secretary has already told me that he will not—is precisely the cause of the concern that is being expressed.

Mr. Leigh: A direct answer can be given to the Secretary of State for Scotland. He claims that the convention has been around for many years, but the Bill does not simply incorporate the convention into UK law; it creates a new Bill of Rights, and judges will be able to go further than Strasbourg judges. Strasbourg judges are, by their very nature, conservative in social matters, and they normally use the "margin of appreciation" to exclude such cases. UK judges could go much further than Strasbourg judges have gone in the past 30 years. That is the Churches' concern and the answer to the Secretary of State.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. That is encapsulated in the point that I have already made two or three times, so I shall not elaborate again. The Secretary of State for Scotland could assist the Committee by defining public authority and tabling amendments that remove any anxiety that might exist.

The letter to which I referred has not been answered by the Prime Minister, the Home Secretary or the Lord Chancellor, to whom it was copied, but it contemporarily reflects the continuing legal, moral, Christian and spiritual concerns about this legislation in general, and the amendment in particular. For that reason, when we reach the end of the debate, we shall wish to divide on the Government amendment.

Mr. McNamara: I listened with interest to the right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney). I confess that, if I felt that there was any risk of the terrible events that he suggested occurring as a result of this legislation, I would be running around my hon. Friends whipping them into the Lobby in support of his amendment. However, I do not agree that there is such a risk. To those who doubt that statement, may I say that I have a history—not only tonight but on other occasions—of whipping hon. Friends into Lobbies to vote against my party, so it is not an idle assertion. I take no pride in having had to do that, but it shows that Back Benchers are sometimes right and sometimes wrong about Governments.

I am concerned that the right hon. Gentleman's language might whip up fears among many people—fears about matters that are not in the Bill. When we forced him to give way to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, he did not explain why, suddenly, those fears have appeared when we have been bound to the convention, and cases have been going to Strasbourg for all that time. Such matters have hardly been raised in that particular way.

New clause 9, which has been tabled by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, deals with those fears. It states:

"If a court's determination of any question arising under this Act might affect the exercise by a religious organisation (itself or its members collectively)"— which presumably is the public profession of their worship and ritual—

"of the Convention right of freedom of thought, conscience and religion, it must have particular regard to the importance of that right."

There will not be regard, but "particular regard". That provision is in the new clause and my right hon. Friend has stated his interpretation of a public organisation.

We should consider what is a public organisation and what is a sacrament. The right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire and other Conservative Members have got on to murky ground. Is the sacrament of matrimony two people agreeing to live together for life? Common theology is that that constitutes it. Two people making such a decision would live in a perfect state of grace—not necessarily over the brush—and in a proper way, from a Christian view of the nature of marriage.

The Church wants to protect the parties, so it says, "That is right, but the Church will be the witness of that function." The state says, "We have a duty in civil society to regulate people's relationships so that we have a degree of order. Therefore, if the Church exercises a public function—if it carries out something necessary for civil society—we shall lay down rules about a man and a woman, about forms and about witnesses." That is a civil society matter. The Church protects its position by holding a ceremony—generally, but not necessarily, in front of an ordained priest. For a Christian, however, the sacrament is when the two parties decide that they want to live together as man and wife.

For the life of me, I cannot think that anyone would litigate on any of those three causes, except to say that the form of the marriage was not valid in the eyes of the state, which would have a duty to intervene. The question whether a marriage was proper in the eyes of the Church would be for the Church to decide; it would not alter the position with regard to the state.

All sorts of problems are being built up, but they do not exist in practice. Churches carry out public functions, and the state has the right to examine the way in which they are carried out. Churches receive money for hospices, orphanages, reform hostels and schools. The state has a perfect right to ask whether taxpayers' money is being spent properly.

No one belonging to any Church organisation has any right to run away and start saying, "You can't interfere with my religious practice by telling me how I have to spend money that you, on behalf of the taxpayer, have contributed to my public function at that particular time." I do not think that any hon. Member would argue against the state's right in those circumstances. If that is true, why are we worried about the Secretary of State's new clause? There is no need whatever to do so.

What has fascinated me about this debate is the way in which problems have been raised in relation to education, which the Government had said they would deal with. Because they defeated the case of the right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire, he said that he would refer to education matters on another occasion or in another way—except, of course, that, when the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) was making her case, and the right hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Mrs. Bottomley), the former Secretary of State for National Heritage and Secretary of State for Health was jumping up and saying, "Are you going to have atheists appointed as head masters of Catholic junior primary schools?" or whatever it was, a special amendment was tabled in the House of Lords, which said that there should be control over the appointment of head teachers, deputy heads and senior appointments.

I read that, and I thought, "This is rubbish." Those people should be worried not about what the head teacher or deputy head are telling the kids, but about what a class teacher or specialist are telling a group of children, of whatever age, in class. In fact, the amendment that was passed in the upper House weakened the whole position that the Churches have had since 1902. It was a rubbish amendment, and that is why I felt it necessary to table my amendment—just in case the Secretary of State had a brainstorm and felt, for one reason or another, that he might accept it. I wanted to make the point that it affected every teaching appointment.

What did the Secretary of State do? He met the cardinal archbishop and his representatives, and the Archbishop of Canterbury and his representatives. He came to the new clause 9 and then dealt with the amendment that had been tabled by Baroness Blackstone in another place, which meets all the points that have been raised by the right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire. He gave the example of someone who has an adulterous affair or has a divorce and gets remarried.

Let us take a position, for example, in a Catholic school. Baroness Blackstone's amendment to clause 59 of the School Standards and Framework Bill states:

"If the school is a voluntary aided school—

(a) preference may be given, in connection with the appointment, remuneration or promotion of teachers at the school, to persons—

(i) whose religious opinions are in accordance with the tenets of the religion or religious denomination specified in relation to the school under section 66(4), or

(ii) who attend religious worship in accordance with those tenets, or

(iii) who give, or are willing to give, religious education at the school in accordance with those tenets".

That is the first appointment. That is great, but, in the example that we have been given, the head teacher has transgressed, so the clause goes on:

"(b) regard may be had, in connection with the termination of the employment of any teacher at the school, to any conduct on his part which is incompatible with the precepts, or with the upholding of the tenets, of the religion or religious denomination so specified."

That is the strongest declaration ever in the history of the state for the preservation of the position of religious schools. It could not be stronger or better. Many of the remarks of the right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire can be dealt with in a similar way.

Mr. Brazier: I have been listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman. I believe that he is right about the amendment on schools. Many Conservative Members are trying to point out that such safeguards should be extended to other religious organisations, particularly those that have even greater control over children, such as adoption agencies and orphanages, which the hon. Gentleman has mentioned.

Mr. McNamara: Let us go back to new clause 9, which says that particular regard must be given to "the exercise by a religious organisation (itself or its members collectively) of the Convention right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion".

We could produce a shopping list of who should be covered by that, but we would be bound to miss some. One of the amendments mentions charities, but many adoption agencies are not charities. Much of the work that will be protected by the new clause is not formally registered, because many such organisations are informal associations. Bodies such as the St. Vincent de Paul society and the Church of England men's fellowship would be protected by the new clause.

Those are important issues, going to the root of what many of us believe about our society and how we run our lives. I ask hon. Members not to be carried away by right-wing religious fundamentalists who do not want to see what is going on.

Mr. Brazier: That is unworthy.

Mr. McNamara: I have seen such people in operation. Some material that has come to me was misleading about the nature of the what the Government have said, and did not demonstrate a proper examination of new clause 9 and the amendments tabled in the other place, perhaps because of a lack of time. Some of the accusations that have been made are not justifiable, given the facts and the history of the exercise of the convention.

Mr. Grieve: I have listened carefully to the hon. Gentleman on this difficult issue. He suggests that new clause 9 should be sufficient to define how the courts should approach a potential conflict in the convention. Is he satisfied that the wording of the new clause is sufficient? It emphasises only the first part of the sentence in article 9, rather than going through, not to the end—because some of it would not translate properly—but to the section towards the end that deals with the manifestation of religion and belief in worship, teaching, practice and observance.

Mr. McNamara: The amendment tabled by Baroness Blackstone deals with teaching. New clause 9 covers observance and practice. Therefore, I come back to where I plan to finish—to assure my hon. Friend the Minister that I shall not be pressing my amendments, on the basic principle that I have already today had one good bite at the cherry, and I should not push my luck too far.

I also tell my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary that I was very interested to hear that he will be explaining to the Committee what the Government will do on amendment No. 111, which was passed. I look forward to hearing the statement on an early occasion, and can think of no better way of marking the convention's 50th anniversary than for us to sign that protocol.

Mr. Maclennan: This has been an extremely interesting debate. I start from a position that is almost 180 deg removed from that expressed by the hon. Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara), as I did not come to consideration of the Bill with any anxiety that Churches would be threatened by it. Far from holding such a view, I believe that the Churches' position will be greatly strengthened by passage of the Bill. For the first time in our domestic law, specific protection will be given to them by a statute passed by the British Parliament, explicitly and in terms invoking the protections of religious freedom.

The entire jurisprudence of the European Commission, of the European Court of Human Rights and of countries that had comparable domestic legislation, such as the Netherlands and the Federal Republic of Germany, has shown how those protections had been interpreted over 50 years, in a manner that leaned heavily towards protecting the institutional interests of Churches wherever those interests were called into question.

There is a long list of examples of attempts to claim that a fundamental right and freedom has been violated by a Church organisation. In Germany, for example, a doctor in a Roman Catholic Church hospital was dismissed because he believed in euthanasia, but his case failed in the courts. Similarly, doctors in hospitals run by the Roman Catholic Church have been dismissed because they favoured abortion in some circumstances. Many such examples have put beyond doubt in my mind how those matters were viewed by the courts in countries that for many years had been subscribing to the European convention on human rights and giving effect to its provisions in their domestic law.

I confess to having been quite astonished by some of the initial expressions of concern about the Bill by members of different Churches. Although it should be said that a variety of views have been expressed even within the Church of England on the weight to be given to those concerns, the concerns have nevertheless carried sufficient weight to inspire their Lordships substantially to amend the Bill—in ways that I thought were profoundly damaging to its coherence and integrity. Were the Bill to be passed in that form, the amendments would create great uncertainty in interpreting the Bill, not least in its definition of religion—which may itself be regarded as discriminatory by those who sought the Bill's subsequent protection, and who are perhaps not members of what would be categorised as one of the principal religions.

I believe that the Home Secretary has taken very seriously those concerns, consulted very widely and given us a very fair account of the outcome of the consultations. As he rightly said, he was not engaged in a negotiation, but he showed himself to be sensitive to the concerns of the Churches and has bent over backwards to accommodate those anxieties by producing new clause 9.

9.15 pm

We can certainly live with the new clause, and my right hon. Friends and I will support it, although in all honesty we doubt its absolute necessity. It is a belt and braces operation. If it makes the minds of those who think that they will be adversely affected any easier, I am perfectly happy that it should be accepted, although it will have a rather limited effect.

The position of the Church of Scotland is in some respects different and unique, for it is invoking a constitutional principle concerning the effect as it perceives it of the Church of Scotland Act 1921. I do not propose to develop the arguments. I hope that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) will be successful in catching your eye, Sir Alan, to do so. I have been in dialogue with the Church and understand its concern, although I do not entirely share it. The Bill in its present form does not touch upon the exercise of the spiritual jurisdiction of the Church of Scotland, which I believe is what the 1921 Act is concerned with.

I welcome the fact that the Government have adopted and made their own a number of the amendments that I originally tabled. Article 9 of the convention guarantees the freedom of thought, conscience and religion and, most importantly, includes the right to manifest one's religion—a right that can be exercised in community with others, in public and within the circle of those who share the same faith. It includes the right to try to convince others, for example, through teaching. That point was made clear in the Kokkinakis v. Greece judgment in 1993.

The protection given by article 9 extends to acts that are linked with an individual's religious beliefs or attitudes, and protects aspects of the practice of the religion or belief—for example, acts of worship or devotion.

Article 14 of the convention provides that all convention rights and freedoms are to be enjoyed without discrimination on the grounds, inter alia, of religion. So even the convention contains a belt and braces provision.

The adjustments to clause 2 in the other place were unnecessary. If enacted, they would risk confusion over whether religion was to be elevated above all other fundamental rights, which would depart from the scheme of the convention and be out of line with international standards.

Government amendment No. 41 would ensure that such courts and tribunals must have regard to fundamental rights. There is no need for the amendment, which was moved successfully in another place by Lord Mackay of Drumadoon, because a Church, rather than merely individuals, is also capable of exercising the rights contained in article 9.

According to the decisions of the court in Strasbourg, the rights of a Church are inseparable from the rights of its members. Even as a respondent party to a challenge under the Bill, religious bodies would, in all likelihood, be entitled to rely on article 9. That goes some way to meeting the concerns of the right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) about the Church as a public authority.

The Church of Scotland has claimed that the unamended Bill would disturb the constitutional settlement of 1921, but I do not believe that the spiritual courts of the Church of Scotland are public authorities. I am persuaded by the words of the Lord Advocate that, for the purpose of the Bill, they are not courts—their decisions could not be challenged using the convention rights. The constitutional position of the Church of Scotland, as I understand it, will be unaffected by the Bill, as the Bill has no authority in the spiritual matters on which the Church of Scotland's courts adjudicate. If he is successful in catching your eye, Sir Alan, my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland will want to look more closely and carefully at those issues, which are giving rise to continuing concern in Scotland.

A number of hon. Members, particularly Opposition Members, have spoken about marriage. Article 12 of the convention confers a right to marry, but it does not confer a right to marry in the Church of one's choice—or, for that matter, the temple, synagogue or mosque of one's choice. The conduct of a marriage ceremony by a priest or other religious person is, I believe, protected by article 9.

The fact that the link between the religious beliefs of a Church and its members is intimate and recognisable was upheld in the court in the case of Chappel v. United Kingdom. If, for example, a Church refused to marry a couple because one member of that couple was not a Christian, it would not have violated the couple's right to marry, as they would be entitled to a civil marriage. That applies to the traditional right to marriage between persons of the opposite biological sex, but it does not apply to same-sex couples. Even if Parliament were to recognise unions of people of the same sex, the Churches would not have to recognise such unions, as that would infringe the collective rights of the Church under article 9.

It follows—if my reading of the cases is right—that nothing in the convention can be used to compel a person to conduct a marriage ceremony contrary to his religious beliefs, so I believe that the amendment tabled in another place by Lady Young was unnecessary—I am glad that that is now her view also.

Clause 7(9) and (10) deals with employment rights. No one can use the convention to claim a right to work for a particular religious or other body. In so far as those bodies are carrying out public functions—and are therefore public authorities—they would be in same position as the civil service, and no one has a right to a job with the civil service under the convention. The relevant case is Glasenapp and Kosiek v. Germany, which was decided in 1986. Consequently, no one could claim the right to work for a charity or a particular religious body, such as a Church or Church association.

The Lord Chancellor stressed in debates in the other place that there is no right of employment under the convention, so a Church or a charity could not infringe the convention by refusing to employ someone. In cases where a requirement of the job in some way limits the ability or right of the individual to exercise his religion or belief, his right to freedom of belief under article 9 is protected by his ability to leave his job—a number of cases have been decided in that way. The Government amendments to the School Standards and Framework Bill in another place have satisfied even the most fearful among us on that point.

The Government have bent over backwards to meet the concerns, and I think that they have done so successfully in respect of the Church of England, the Roman Catholic Church, the Free Church and the Methodists, although a debate remains in relation to Scotland. We shall listen with great interest to what the Secretary of State for Scotland has to say on the matter, and decide whether it is necessary to return to that issue on Report.

Mr. Leigh: My new clause 12 and amendment No. 117 are designed to address the problems created for religious bodies by the legislation. The religious bodies with which I have had discussions are not seeking any new rights: they want merely to preserve their traditional religious freedoms. They do not want interference from secular courts and they are fearful that, unless the Bill is amended as I propose, those freedoms will be eroded. The Government will claim that that is a mistaken perception, but it is strongly held, and I know that the Government and the Home Secretary take such worries extremely seriously.

One's personal views on whether it is wise to incorporate the convention are irrelevant to this debate. Serious problems are caused by the ways in which the convention is incorporated into United Kingdom law by the Bill.

Following huge pressure from the Churches and a huge amount of interest in the religious press, the Home Secretary tabled new clause 9. My legal advice is that, despite his best efforts—and I know that he is sincere in his desire to protect the Churches—the new clause does not go far enough, and that is why I tabled amendment No. 117 and new clause 12. I hope to tease out of the Government a response to these points.

Amendment No. 117 would require a court, in any conflict of rights, to give primacy to the article 9 right to religious freedom. New clause 12 is designed to correct new clause 9's failure adequately to protect religious charities. This relatively new area of concern has not hitherto received adequate attention, and must now be addressed.

I believe that the Home Secretary has acted wisely and correctly to protect the employment policies of Church schools, and I give him credit for that, but the Government need to listen to the genuine concerns about religious charities and, even if they reject amendment No. 117 and new clause 12, they should at least give cogent reasons and promise to bring in similar provisions in a future employment or charities Bill.

What are the problems created by the Bill? Let us consider the important matter of what the convention was intended to do. It was intended to bind Governments. It was designed to address the human rights records of Governments during the second world war, because Governments have the power to coerce. The convention's framers, after the second world war, did not in their wildest dreams imagine that it would or could ever be used against Churches. In the difficult days after the second world war, the framers of the convention would never have wanted it to be used to sue a local parish church, a Church school or a religious charity. That is the danger that we face.

Religious bodies are in a uniquely vulnerable position because they get involved in services to the community. In that sense, they are public bodies. They get involved in such services because of their faith, and they are compelled to carry them out in accordance with their faith; they have no latitude.

In incorporating the convention, I believe that the Government have gone wider and deeper than they ever needed to go: wider, because their definition of public authority in clause 6 includes bodies whose actions have never come to the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg; and deeper, because the UK courts would be involved in religious and social policy issues when they should not be involved in such issues. In fairness to Strasbourg—I wish to be fair to it; that is my reputation in the House—it has wisely tended to leave these matters alone. That is the answer to the intervention of the Secretary of State for Scotland on my right hon. Friend the shadow Home Secretary. Strasbourg has wisely left them alone because of the margin of appreciation. It rightly believes that such matters are best left to individual states.

9.30 pm

Most importantly, the Bill bites deeper than the convention, because it does not only incorporate the convention. The Secretary of State for Scotland did not reply to me; he thought that he was making a clever point against my right hon. Friend the shadow Home Secretary. The Secretary of State was making the point that the convention has been around for 20 or 30 years, but that there have been no cases on these matters. That argument would be true if the Bill only incorporated the convention, but the gravamen of our case is that this is a new Bill of Rights, based on the convention. United Kingdom judges can, and I believe will, go much further than the convention.

Unlike with the judges in Strasbourg, no principle of the margin of appreciation operates in UK courts. The judges in Strasbourg are fairly conservative in matters of social policy and religious freedom, but their judgments will not be binding on UK courts under clause 2. UK judges will have only to take account of the conservative Strasbourg judges. That is the answer to the intervention by the Secretary of State and an important point that should be answered in the Minister's reply.

Mr. Grieve: I appreciate my hon. Friend's points, which are valid and form one of the problems facing the Committee in considering the matter, but does not the Home Secretary's new clause 9 introduce the precise parameters of the margin of appreciation that our national courts will be called on to consider?

Mr. Leigh: No. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for introducing that point in his wise and learned way. Judges will only have to "have regard" to these matters. Having regarded religious freedoms, they can for good reason overturn them. That is the simple answer. I shall return to that in more detail because it is the kernel of the debate.

Mr. Gareth Thomas: Amendment No. 117 requires the courts to give primacy to article 9 over the other articles. Is that its intention? If that is the case, does the hon. Gentleman accept that the vast majority of hon. Members would consider it extraordinarily bizarre to give primacy to article 9, on freedom of conscience, over such articles as article 2, on the right to life, and article 3, on the prohibition of torture? Surely the hon. Gentleman concedes that the Government's solution of giving due consideration to freedom of conscience and religion is by far the most sensible way forward.

Mr. Leigh: If the hon. Gentleman is dissatisfied with my new clause 12, he can always suggest a better one. New schedule 1, tabled by my right hon. Friend the shadow Home Secretary is very satisfactory. The point that we are making is that merely giving the powers to give due consideration to religious freedoms is not enough because, having considered them, judges can then overturn them.

I have not had the benefit of the advice of parliamentary draftsmen. I shall not be so arrogant as to pretend that my new clause has all the merits, but I hope that it focuses the attention of the Committee on the issue and the problem that the Home Secretary's amendment has not dealt with. That is all that an Opposition Member can do. It is vital.

The House of Lords, with all the learned opinion available to it, considered the issues carefully when Baroness Young tabled her amendment. The issues were extensively debated by Law Lords and others, and those who have practical experience in the Churches. Those amendments, agreed to by a cross-party coalition in the other place, are now being overturned by the Government.

Mr. Brazier: It is surely irrelevant to raise, for example, the issue of torture in the context of the Churches. The answer is given by the early part of my hon. Friend's speech, in which he said that we had a clear, concrete and well-drafted solution to the problem of the schools, and that we were looking for something similar for the religious charities.

Mr. Leigh: My hon. Friend makes the point. If the Government are dissatisfied, as they are perfectly entitled to be, with our amendments and new clause, a simple solution is open to them. The amendment that I have tabled uses exactly the same words as the Government have used in their amendment, but simply extends them from schools to charities.

I was aware that interventions such as that made by the hon. Member for Clwyd, West (Mr. Thomas) would be made—that it would be said that we were not capable of drafting proper amendments, and all the rest of it. I therefore used the Government's very words. Of course, the amendment that I have tabled to extend to charities the rights given by the Government to schools will be dismissed in the wash of events at 10.30 pm or whenever we vote. I doubt that an adequate explanation will be given of why my amendment is defective. I do not think that it is defective; it is certainly not defective in its wording.

When the House of Lords accepted Lady Young's amendments, it gave an absolute defence, or a fairly strong defence, to those sued for acting according to their core beliefs. They were sensible amendments. I see no reason why the Government could not allow those amendments to stand, but they have decided not to.

What are the defects of the Home Secretary's amendment? Since November last year, the Churches have been arguing that their schools will be subject to litigation; religious charities have made the same point. The Lord Chancellor initially, with his customary tact and political feel, was arrogantly dismissive of the concerns of the Churches. Of course, the far more astute Home Secretary has realised, perhaps rather late in the day, that it is not wise for any Government to take on the cardinal archbishop and the Archbishop of Canterbury when they decide to act in collusion. I give credit to him for that. He has tabled new clause 9, which contains the phrase "particular regard".

May I share with the Committee existing case law, which holds that the obligation to "have regard" is a weak one? It does not mean that the court has to comply with or give precedence to the matter to which they have regard. To have "particular regard" is no doubt stronger, but it still means that that regard can be overturned by the judge.

No doubt it would help the court to have its attention drawn to the importance of the right to freedom of religion. I do not deny that the Home Secretary's amendment would ensure that judges had to pay attention to the right to religious freedom, but it would be an easy matter for a judge—[Interruption.] I hope that that clap of thunder does not mean that my words are displeasing the Almighty. It would be easy for a judge—I assure the Committee that judges do it all the time—to assert in his summing up of the case that he had had "particular regard" to that right and so obeyed the provisions of the Home Secretary's new clause 9, but that he had, for good reasons known only to him and on which we could not speculate, decided to override that right. In doing so, he would have done all that the new clause requires, therefore it provides no defence at all.

[Mr. Leigh]

Given all that, it is obvious that some primacy—I say this to the hon. Member for Clwyd, West—must be given to religious liberties, and that is the purpose of my amendment. It would not only call the attention of the court to the importance of the freedom of religion, but require it to give that freedom primacy as far as it is possible to do so. Only an amendment such as that would begin to protect religious freedom, which is a freedom that Parliament does and should care more deeply about than any other.

It has been suggested that I am scaremongering and that none of what I describe will happen, but I do not share that belief. There are determined anti-religious groups and individuals with an axe to grind who are well funded, and no one should underestimate just how well funded they are. I understand that, in initially ignoring these concerns, the Lord Chancellor had sterling support from such bodies as the National Secular Society, the British Humanist Association and the leader writers of the Gay Times.

If anybody thinks that I am scaremongering, look at what has happened in the United States, where the American Civil Liberties Union first succeeded in banning prayer from schools in 1963. More worryingly, when Congress changed its mind and voted to give schools in America the power to have prayers, the ACLU used legislation similar to this Bill to take Congress to the Supreme Court, which overturned the decision of Congress and banned—almost made a criminal offence of—praying in American state schools.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): The hon. Gentleman cites an example of the enforcement of a constitution that requires the separation of Church and state. Can he show me anything in the European convention that requires the separation of Church and state? If he can, it would cause considerable difficulty in Germany, Sweden and several other countries.

Mr. Leigh: I shall come to Germany, Austria and other countries in a moment. I may be open to correction by the right hon. Gentleman, who is far more learned and knowledgeable in matters European than I am, but the fact is that such a case has been brought in Holland, which is a member of the European Union and is subject to the European Court. The case has been quoted by my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) and by the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth).

I accept the point made by the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) and concede that our case is not on all fours with that of America, but that example shows how determined and well funded anti-religious groups are, and how they are capable of achieving their aims. I am a barrister, and I understand how determined litigants can be, and how ingenious lawyers can be in finding new ways in which to use the law.

If the Committee does not believe me, let me point out that the Churches, or large groups within the Churches, believe that, despite the Home Secretary's new clause, judges some time in the future will use the legislation to attack Churches. They believe that there will be a ratchet effect and that plaintiffs will be persistent. That will not happen tomorrow, but the Bill will last 30, 40 or 50 years, and the Churches fear that there will be a gradual ratchet effect in case law. Hon. Members may dismiss those fears as unfounded, but they would be unwise to do so.

Mr. Gardiner: I have listened carefully to the hon. Gentleman's argument that, in his view, the use of new clause 9 to force the courts to have "particular regard" to the importance of that right is not a sufficient safeguard against possible future excesses. If that is the case, will he explain why he has used the same formulation of words in his new clause 12?

9.45 pm

Mr. Leigh: The hon. Gentleman seems not to understand that I have tabled two amendments: amendment No. 117, which is designed to give primacy to religious freedom, and new clause 12—which replicates the wording used by the Government—which is designed to extend to religious charities the protection given to schools.

I shall now discuss article 9 of the European convention on human rights. According to the Home Secretary, it is supposed to provide great comfort to the Churches; I believe that he misunderstood the issue. I hesitate to say that, as he has been given so much advice, but he seemed to do so, judging by an intervention that he made on my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Cambridgeshire.

In recent weeks, the Home Office has used the argument, with those who advised me and have advised Baroness Young in the other place, that the case law from Strasbourg offers much comfort to religious bodies. Only 45 cases have cited article 9, and only five have made it to the full court. If only five made it to the full court, that is not a huge amount of jurisprudence to place one's faith in. Few of those cases involved a collective use of the right by a body, and none involved a public authority claiming it as a defence.

I see the Secretary of State for Scotland consulting Home Office officials so he may be able to give us an answer on this point, in which case I should be interested to hear it. If the Home Office is now basing its defence on article 9, why has no case in Strasbourg involved a public body? It is the Government, not us, who have framed clause 6 so widely. I say to the Secretary of State for Scotland, who made the intervention earlier, that, if a religious body falls into the clause 6 definition of a public authority, there is no precedent whatever in Strasbourg for allowing it to use an article 9 defence.

The final nail in the argument that article 9 is enough is that the jurisprudence of Strasbourg is not even binding on United Kingdom courts, because clause 2 requires a court only to take it into account. Therefore, the Secretary of State, in attempting to allay the fears of the Committee, has stoked up those fears—with me, at least—

Mr. Dewar: That is an important qualification.

Mr. Leigh: And my hon. Friends. The Secretary of State can now intervene, if he wishes. If I have been talking rubbish, if the legal opinion given to me is wrong and if the point made by the Secretary of State for Scotland was as devastating as he obviously intended it to be, will he intervene on my speech and say that I am wrong?

Mr. Dewar: I hesitate, simply because we are taking so long and so many hon. Members wish to speak. The point that I was making, to which I hold firmly, is that no one has explained to me why an immense new point of principle has arisen simply from a change of forum. I acknowledge that the hon. Gentleman tried to do so by saying that judges in the United Kingdom were dangerous radicals, whereas they were nice, embraceable old fuddy-duddy conservatives in Strasbourg, but that is not entirely convincing. If there has been a threat, that threat to the Churches' independence has been there since 1953, and it does not appear to have manifested itself. I again challenge him to explain the difference in principle, which has resulted from the Bill, that justifies the sudden change of pace and the sudden upsurge of fear.

Mr. Leigh: The answer is that no margin of appreciation will operate on UK judges in the same way that it operates on Strasbourg judges, who have deliberately avoided becoming involved in this area of controversy because they feel that they should leave it to the national courts. We are now using the convention. We are giving British judges the right to invoke other articles in the convention, to which my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Cambridgeshire referred, and that is what the Churches fear. Therefore, there is a step change from the situation that we had before, about which the Committee should be concerned. The other place specifically protected the principal religious traditions.

Mr. Grieve: If there is no case law in England having direct bearing on the problems on which my hon. Friend touches, is that not in itself, if it comes to interpretation by an English court of the human rights legislation, one issue to which it will have regard in determining whether to interfere? Therefore, the margin of appreciation will still be there for the English court to apply.

Mr. Leigh: No, it will not be, because the margin of appreciation can, by its definition, be used only by an international court, not by a national court. A national court will not say to itself, "We believe that international courts are better placed to deal with these issues, so we shall not deal with them," because it is a national court. However, we are in danger of becoming involved in semantics. I hope that I have made my point. If my hon. Friend does not accept it, he can argue against it. The fact is that he is wrong in claiming that the margin of appreciation is, has, or will be used by the UK courts. It will not be.

The other place specifically protected the principal religious traditions using a phrase already evident and used in our education law. The Home Secretary dismissed it. He said that the principal religions could not be mentioned because that, he almost hinted, would be something new. It is not. We already talk about the principal religions in our existing education law. The other place gave the courts clear guidance as to which religions should be protected. The proliferation of new religions could result in a sun-worshipping sect being held to be on the same level as the Church of England. Even the most charitable view of sun-worshipping sects would not grant them such a status, but one human rights lawyer has already referred to the potential for the levelling down—his words, not mine—of religious rights.

The Government have argued that it is necessary to delete the amendments agreed to in the other place because they would cause the Bill to breach the convention by giving primacy to the rights of certain religions. That was a particular point made by the Home Secretary. It is true—the Home Secretary was right to allude to it to this extent—that the convention prohibits that, but if he is right, why does Austria still have a system of recognising religious communities? Only five religious communities are so recognised, including the Roman Catholic Church, the Lutheran Church and the Helvetic Confession—whatever that is. Those Churches receive state funding. A minority Church in Austria may feel left out, but there is no breach of article 9. As my right hon. Friend the shadow Home Secretary mentioned, Germany also gives privileged status to certain religions in its constitution.

That point made by the Home Secretary and relied on by him in his speech simply does not hold up. Lord Rawlinson of Ewell and another barrister, Paul Diamond, who run a legal opinion for the Christian Institute, have argued:

> "In our opinion it is incorrect to argue that granting a privilege to certain established religious groups is contrary to the Convention. The applicability of the inserted Defences to the principal faiths is an act that is 'objectively justifiable'."

In plain man's language, that means that giving special protection to the main religions is perfectly sensible under the convention. Other countries know that it is sensible to give priority protection to those religions that are well established and well respected in their own country, so why cannot we?

I come now to the point concerning charities. It has been said by several hon. Members that the Home Secretary's amendment will not adequately protect religious charities. The Home Secretary may say that religious charities will benefit from new clause 9, but that is not the case.

I am advised, as I said in an intervention—which the Home Secretary did not answer, but the Secretary of State for Scotland may do so later—that only organisations whose primary purpose is the advancement of religion will be classed as "religious organisations" for the purpose of the clause. Organisations that exist to provide charitable services, but which have a religious foundation will probably fall outside the clause. If the Home Secretary thinks that the intention behind the amendments is wise, but that their effect is perverse, which is what he seemed to suggest, it is open to him to amend future legislation. The omission of religious charities is a serious omission and could cause many problems in future.

Mr. Brazier: Even if, as my hon. Friend says, some religious charities may be excluded, adoption agencies, orphanages, children's homes and so on will be included in the definition of public organisations, because they carry out public functions. If Church schools require special treatment, how much more essential is it that those bodies, which have even more power over children in their most formative years, should enjoy the same special protection?

Mr. Leigh: That is an important point. It is difficult to imagine how such bodies would not be charities.

The model of incorporation that the Government have chosen is far reaching. In addition to designating a range of bodies to be public authorities, the Bill states in clause 3 that all legislation must be interpreted in line with the convention. Not only will religious bodies that get caught in the definition of "public authority" be hit, but all religious bodies will find that people who want to sue them will start putting a human rights spin on existing legislation to try to get what they want. That will become most apparent in employment law. Unfair dismissal cases will begin to take on a new gloss as a result of people pleading human rights in conjunction with the existing law.

Only last Friday, I visited St. Barnabas's hospice in my constituency. It is a religious foundation designed to care for people who are terminally ill. By its very nature as a religious foundation, it is opposed in principle to euthanasia. What would happen if a nurse employed by a hospice started to distribute pro-euthanasia leaflets? Would the hospice have the right to dismiss that nurse? The answer is that it would have the right to dismiss the nurse, but under the Bill, as amended by the Home Secretary, that nurse could sue the hospice. The Government and the Committee should be worried about that.

I shall give another example from my constituency. Members of the Plymouth Brethren came to see me in my surgery this week. The Plymouth Brethren are a fine organisation. I believe that they have lobbied many Members of Parliament, as they are worried about the Bill. By their very nature, they regularly exclude members. In a recent case, they excluded a member who then threatened to take them to court. Under existing law, he could not do so.

The Home Secretary will assure me that because, in that case, the Plymouth Brethren were not acting as employers or as a public body, there is no way in way in which the member who had been excluded and who wanted to pursue his Church in a court would be covered by the Bill. I am sure that the Scottish Secretary will want to reassure the Plymouth Brethren on that point. They have lobbied Members of Parliament throughout the country making that point. They are a serious body and need reassuring.

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale): My hon. Friend is making a powerful case, which is shared and endorsed by people of many faiths in Cumbria and north Lancashire, as I know from personal experience. In the light of what he has said and his references to the cardinal archbishop and the Archbishop of Canterbury, will he comment on the remarks of the hon. Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara), who has just returned to his seat, that the issue has been got up by right-wing fundamentalists and does not matter much?

Mr. Leigh: I have great respect for the hon. Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara), but I do not think that his points are valid. I know that he spoke sincerely and that he would not accuse the mainstream Churches, such as the Church of England or the Catholic Church, who have serious concerns about the legislation, of being fundamentalist sects. His point regarding proposed new clause 9 simply does not add up for the reasons that I have given. Through no fault of his own, the hon. Gentleman has been absent from the Chamber, so I shall not dwell on that point.

There is no doubt that Church schools will be protected, and we give credit to the Home Secretary for that. However, he has not made the case that religious charities will receive similar protection, and he must do so. The only way in which to avoid the problems of litigation that challenges the core beliefs of religious groups as "public authorities" is to exempt them from that definition. That is what new schedule 1 would do.

It being Ten o'clock, THE CHAIRMAN left the Chair to report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Committee report progress.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 15 (Exempted business),

That, at this day's sitting, the Human Rights Bill [Lords] may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Jane Kennedy.]

Question agreed to.

Again considered in Committee.

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

Mr. Leigh: In conclusion, I believe that exemption as proposed by the shadow Home Secretary is the obvious course. However, it would not be enough because religious bodies—even if they were not public authorities—would suffer as a result of all laws being interpreted to comply with the convention under clause 3. The amendments agreed to in the other place that the Government are deleting would have provided a defence, and the Home Secretary's amendment will prove to be inadequate.

I close by reminding the Government that the sorts of cases that religious people fear will arise, because this Bill makes that possible. When those cases come up and Churches and religious charities suffer intimidation, indignity and the expense of litigation and of losing, I believe that they will remind the Government of the opportunity that was offered to them that they did not act on. To coin a phase, the Government have been weighed in the balance and found wanting.

Mr. Brooke: The Committee is in the debt of my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) for a comprehensive speech on this subject, which is the product of much reading and much learning.

I shall be brief. I speak in this debate as a member of the Church of England. My paternal great grandfather and one of his brothers were ordained into the Church of Ireland of which their father was likewise a minister. He wrote a history of the Church of Ireland. My great grandfather ended his life as a Unitarian minister. My maternal grandfather was a canon of the Church of Wales and his son, my uncle, was dean of an English abbey. One of his daughters served as a Protestant missionary, became a nun, advanced to being a mother superior and ended her life in a closed order. I come from eclectic ecclesiastical stock.

I cite my Church of England pedigree because I was a Treasury Minister when my noble Friend Lord Lawson of Blaby introduced concessions for charities and measures against loopholes in his 1986 Budget. At that time, we held a seminar in Lancaster house, which the charities attended. My predecessor in this constituency, John Smith—now Sir John Smith, CH—asked the first question of the Chancellor. He said that there had been an argument in the Church of England for 400 years about what its purpose was, and the Chancellor had now decided, through a clause in the Finance Bill, that that issue would be settled by an assistant secretary at Inland Revenue. He said that he thought that that would bring much pleasurable discussion to a close. I therefore approach Government intrusion into Church matters with caution.

I pay tribute to the Home Secretary, but I must approach his revisions, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough referred, with caution, too. As a result of the Government's stance in another place, there have been aspects if not of a deathbed repentance at least of a very late conversion on the part of the Government. One wonders whether the conversion was sufficiently early that proper thought could be given to the issue. I do not believe that the late Lord Butler of Saffron Walden would have approached the Education Act 1944 with the same recklessness.

I do have fears, as my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough alluded, about vexatious cases being brought against the Church of England. The hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) cited the extraordinary case of the Salvation Army in the Netherlands being sued by an atheistic Bible teacher. That is a case worthy of Mr. Justice Cocklecarrot in the pages of "Beachcomber". As I have said in an intervention, it was only settled in the Salvation Army's favour after a very expensive case. Resources were drained from the Salvation Army to fight it.

In exactly the same way, the Church of England is, very nicely, concerned about the amount of money that it has to spend on inquiries concerning church buildings which the Church of England genuinely loves. These inquiries arise from objections raised by English Heritage. So, too, I have fears about the amount of money and resources that will be drained from the Church of England by vexatious cases of which I am sure those who occupy the Treasury Bench would not approve.

All of that said, I am encouraged that the Government's heart is now beginning to be in the right place. I would give the Government a general but not universal benefit of the doubt, for they have responded to what has been said to them. It must be said that Labour Members have had universal faith in the Government. Labour Benches having been crowded during the capital punishment debate, they have been broadly empty during this debate. With the exception of the hon. Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara), Labour Members have been entirely silent during this debate.

I left the Chamber to consult the article in The Daily Telegraph of 19 May, which the Home Secretary quoted. He referred to various words of my noble Friend Baroness Young. I am conscious that, as with selective book reviews on dust covers, Ministers can be capable of selective quotations. I am glad that I left the Chamber to consult the article. I discovered that the Church of England spokesman's response to the Home Secretary's new clause closed cautiously as follows:

"The Church will monitor closely how the Bill works out in practice and will not hesitate to go back to the Government if the legislation proves to work unsatisfactorily."

I share that caution and I hope that the Government will give a guarantee that they would react swiftly if such fears proved correct.

Assuming the Government win tonight, I remain curious about what further ground the Government would give if the other place resists the House of Commons rejecting their amendment. I hope that the Government would then act in a way which showed that they recognise the sincerity of those of us in this Chamber, who in the best theological tradition continue to have doubts.

Mr. Wallace: I wish to address the issues raised by the Church of Scotland Act 1921. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (Mr. Maclennan) said, the amendments that were inserted in another place were proposed by Lord MacKay of Drumadoon.

I declare an interest as an elder of the Church of Scotland and a member of the Kirk Session of St. Magnus cathedral in Kirkwall, which is potentially a court. One of the issues in the debate might be whether it is a court which could be affected by the Bill. On two occasions in the past five years, I have been a commissioner to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland.

I do not wish to take the time of the Committee by going into the whole history of the Church of Scotland Act. Suffice it to say that it is an important Act in terms of the constitution of the Church. It was a settlement agreed between Parliament and the Church which guaranteed the Church separate and independent jurisdiction in matters spiritual and paved the way for the union of the Church of Scotland and the Free Church in 1929.

Matters spiritual have been determined subsequently by the courts in, I think, 1936 as including the Government in disciplinary matters. In more recent times, as in the case of Logan against the Presbytery of Dumbarton, issues have arisen causing the Church to invoke the Church of Scotland Act to combat a case that was brought against the Church by a minister who had been subject to the disciplinary procedures of the Presbytery of Dumbarton.

There has been much discussion between the Secretary of State and the former moderator, and between the Prime Minister and the former moderator when he visited London at St. Andrewstide last year. The Church appreciates the time and consideration that the Government have given these matters. However, the package that has been presented to the Committee tonight has been considered by the Church of Scotland, and it is still not satisfied.

In a letter to the Secretary of State, the principal clerk of the Church of Scotland, Dr. McDonald, says:

"we appreciate any movement at all on the Government's part in this matter. However, we feel that this amendment will fall far short of anything that would meet our concerns. In the first place it would mean that the Church itself was relying on its rights under the convention, whereas the present position is that we rely on the 1921 Act. Moreover the amendment requires only that a court 'must have particular regard to the importance of that right'. It then remains open, presumably, to the Court once it has had that 'particular regard' to determine the issue. There is no automatic provision, as under the 1921 Act that a determination that a matter is a spiritual one means that the court has no further jurisdiction."

Furthermore, the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, meeting in Edinburgh this week, passed a deliverance on Saturday morning deeply regretting that

"Her Majesty's Government has, despite the representations of the Board, failed to agree to an amendment of the Human Rights Bill which would state explicitly that the position of the Church of Scotland in terms of the Church of Scotland Act, 1921, is not affected by the Bill."

It goes on:

"Accordingly, urge Her Majesty's Government either to give an assurance that the Human Rights Bill is entirely consistent with the provision of the 1921 Act or to amend the Bill to ensure that it will be so consistent."

[Mr. Wallace]

Will the Secretary of State for Scotland deal with the matter along those lines when he replies to this debate?

In a letter to the former moderator, the Secretary of State for Scotland made two points, the first of which was repeated earlier this evening by the Home Secretary. It was that one of the problems with the amendments made in another place to clause 6 is that, although it might bring some certainty to the Church of Scotland, it could bring uncertainty to the Church of England. As I said in an intervention to the Home Secretary, it is somewhat perverse to try to resolve uncertainty with the Church of England by re-creating uncertainty in the Church of Scotland. If a way could be found to create certainty for the Church of Scotland without creating unnecessary uncertainty for the Church of England, that would be a welcome development.

In a further passage in his letter to the former moderator, the Secretary of State for Scotland said:

"The civil courts have demonstrated their reluctance to involve themselves in the spiritual matters concerning doctrine, worship, government and discipline within the church, as defined in the Declaratory Articles recognised by the Church of Scotland Act 1921."

It is not so much reluctance, as whether the courts have jurisdiction. When the case of Logan, to which I referred, first came before the Court of Session for an interdict, the counsel who moved for the interdict did not draw to the attention of the presiding judge the provisions of the Church of Scotland Act 1921, and the interdict was granted. Within a matter of days, the case came back to court and the provisions of the 1921 Act were drawn to Lord Osborne's attention. He immediately withdrew the interdict and said that the provisions of the 1921 Act prevailed. There was no further consideration of the merits of the case before the court.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross said that he found compelling the argument put by the Lord Advocate in another place, that, because the courts of the Church of Scotland do not amount to public authorities, they would not fall within the scope of the Bill. However, it is fair to point out that, although the Lord Advocate said that he found it extremely difficult to conjure up circumstances in which the courts of the Church of Scotland could be public authorities, he said on 5 February in the other place that it was possible, in some circumstances, that those courts of the Church could be public authorities. The Church of Scotland wants that possibility to be addressed.

The Secretary of State for Scotland suggested that there had been no case in 30 years in which any such issue arose, and he may make the fair point that the Bill brings human rights legislation home and makes our domestic courts, rather than Strasbourg, the appropriate forum. That, too, has been the case with the Church of Scotland. The Bill's purpose is to achieve a more convenient forum in which litigants can take action. There may have been no such case because people thought that going to Strasbourg was outwith their financial reach. It cannot clearly be shown that that is a game, set and match argument, but the Secretary of State fairly asked what was the difference in principle.

That case is more difficult to answer, but, if nothing in principle has changed and given that successive Governments have in no way departed from—indeed, have acknowledged and supported—the settlement between Church and state arrived at in 1921, there should be no difficulty in the Secretary of State giving the assurance that the exclusive jurisdiction of the Church of Scotland in matters spiritual, under the 1921 Act, will be unaffected by the Bill. If it has been unaffected in the past 30 years, the point that he made must also mean that it will be unaffected by the Bill. I would welcome such an assurance.

The Church of Scotland is anxious not to be thought to be in any way ignoring human rights or the United Kingdom's obligations under the convention. Paradoxically, the Church of Scotland, perhaps before some other Churches, accepted that it would be subject to human rights legislation in its secular affairs. The Church of Scotland would be subject to the convention's provisions in relation to human rights issues arising from its provision of eventide homes and clinics for drug addicts.

Furthermore, the committee on Church and nation has today been debating a resolution—I am not sure whether it has been passed—marking the 50th anniversary of the universal declaration of human rights and welcoming the incorporation of the European convention on human rights into United Kingdom law. The General Assembly also had before it a motion stating:

"Instruct the Board of Practice and Procedure, in consultation with the Committee on Church and Nation, to consider whether, and if so how, the Church's commitment to the European Convention on Human Rights might be appropriately contained in an Act of Assembly, especially but not exclusively in relation to disciplinary and judicial procedures, and to report to the next General Assembly."

The Church of Scotland is saying that it has exclusive jurisdiction in matters spiritual and that it would not be for the House to direct it to amend its legislation if, for the sake of argument and in extreme circumstances, the European Court of Human Rights had found that there had been a breach in a procedure and practice of a court of the Church. The Church of Scotland claims exclusive jurisdiction, but it is willing to consider, where appropriate, how it might incorporate the provisions into its practices.

I have set out the position. I shall listen with interest to the Secretary of State. We may return to the matter, but it would be interesting to consider the position if he gave the assurance that nothing in principle will change and, therefore, nothing in principle that affects the exclusive jurisdiction of the 1921 Act will change.

Mr. Grieve: I am delighted to be able to participate in this debate, I hope reasonably briefly. I should at the outset declare an interest. I am a practising member of the Church of England, a churchwarden and a member of the London Diocesan Synod, so I have an interest in ensuring that freedom of religion is maintained. It is of great importance to me.

That said, I have listened carefully to the debate, particularly the comments of my hon. Friends, and my understanding—I am willing to be corrected—of the convention's workings does not lead me to share the somewhat apocalyptic vision of the Bill's consequences. That said, some of the matters that have been raised seem to be of considerable importance.

Trying to pull the curtain back from some of the arguments that have been advanced, we have to face the fact—the point has been made—that the convention is quite old. Social conventions and mores have moved a long way since the convention was brought into being. Matters that at the time of the convention were adhered to and which most people would have considered commonplace—in particular, the way in which most Governments in western Europe conducted their government, which was on the basis of what were essentially Christian principles—have changed. As social mores have changed and been adjusted to, and changes in the law have resulted, so people who practise mainstream faiths have found themselves increasingly at variance with what is widely accepted in secular society as the norm.

I dare say that the reason why there is so much anxiety about incorporation is because it has focused minds on the extent to which some of the convention's articles and their interpretation, especially those that I suppose might nowadays be described as politically correct—those defending the rights of people who wish to have life styles that might be described as at variance with the faiths that the various religious denominations practise—have a ratchet effect of dragging people increasingly into a secular society and making them conform to it. Those fears are misplaced; the convention's workings have not suggested hitherto that that is a realistic fear.

There is a second reason why I do not think that that will happen. I do not share the view of my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) that the interpretation by the judiciary, whether it be north or south of the border, will be shackled by the absence of a margin of appreciation, and that it will not be able to interpret the way in which the convention is supposed to operate correctly. The convention is all about balances—for example, the balance between article 9 and article 13. Dozens of them can be looked at, but I do not see that that is a fundamental problem.

The Home Secretary's amendment appears to go a long way towards meeting the anxieties. I see the force behind the amendments that were tabled in the other place, but one or two, especially those in relation to article 2, seem to go dangerously close to providing definitions about mainstream religion which cause me some anxiety and seem not to conform with what the convention is all about. Therefore, I accept that this is a difficult area, and I shall listen with great care to what the Secretary of State for Scotland says about the matter.

There are two fundamental issues. First, as I said on Second Reading, I have never considered the Bill to be writ in stone. If it is found not to work correctly because it appears to have a discriminatory bias against organised religion, we shall have to produce amendments to make it work. I should like an assurance that that will be kept under constant review.

Mr. Lock: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's concern about discriminatory effects, but does he accept that experience in other European countries is that a judiciary applying the margin of appreciation has not given rise to any real concerns about such effects?

Mr. Grieve: I agree entirely with the hon. Gentleman. I accept that we are moving into a new world, and I have listened carefully to the arguments and the apocalyptic visions of endless litigation and the erosion of the rights of religious organisations, which will be pilloried for their views. However, I did not find those arguments realistic, and I do not share the anxieties that have been expressed by some of my hon. Friends. However, the Government must consider some of the underlying anxieties.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Grieve: I shall give way—briefly, I trust, because I want to finish.

Mr. Hayes: I am not a churchwarden, just a humble churchgoer. Is my hon. Friend saying that we are to accept the changed norms that he says isolate Christians such as him and me rather than challenging them and fighting for what we believe in?

Mr. Grieve: The norms have been changed largely by Acts of Parliament that have nothing to do with the European convention on human rights. Legislation has been passed by Parliament under successive Governments of both major parties, changing the way in which society operates. That is a great challenge for those with religious beliefs, but it has little to do with the European convention and the way in which it is applied. In some ways, the incorporation of the European convention will provide greater protection than hitherto.

My second concern is the definition of public authority. I should like to hear more about that, because it remains a source of anxiety to me.

I am conscious that others may wish to speak, so I shall close my remarks on that note.

Mr. Brazier: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for leaving me two or three minutes to make two brief points—one technical and the other substantive.

My technical point is whether we are dealing with the European convention on human rights. In fact, we are dealing not with the convention but with the sharper instrument of a national statute. The fact that other countries that have embodied the convention into their law have chosen to take account of the concerns about the Churches that several Conservative Members have raised proves that our amendments are necessary. That is reinforced by the fact that the Government have wisely chosen to take those concerns on board for schools.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) and other Conservative Members have asked the Government to broaden the thinking that led them to make sensible amendments to the School Standards and Framework Bill to cover other religious charities.

Moving away from the technical argument, there is a substantial issue about the working of some charities. I should like to focus on children's charities, particularly adoption agencies and children's homes. Churches have traditionally run many such organisations. The Government have chosen to uphold the policy of Churches to appoint Christian teachers. Children's charities have more control over a child's life and future than even a school. An adoption agency will decide who a child's parents will be. A children's home has 24-hour control over a child. It is even more important that Churches should be allowed to continue to appoint Christians to posts in such organisations.

[Mr. Brazier]

I ask Ministers to ask themselves whether it is in anyone's interest to have a situation in which Churches could face litigation by people who, although they say that wish to work in those homes, have known and declared positions that are antithetical to the religious ethos of the organisations running the homes, which look after some of the most vulnerable children in the United Kingdom.

10.30 pm

Mr. Clappison: This has been a good debate, with worthy speeches by hon. Members on both sides of the Committee, conducted against a background of widespread and deeply felt concern among many Churches and religious organisations. However seriously hon. Members take the concerns—the Opposition take them seriously—and whatever one's views on them, it is important to do them justice and to seek to allay them in every possible way.

We have heard powerful speeches from Opposition Members. My hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) made a well-considered speech, and a powerful plea on religious charities. His plea—which we hope will be heard—was echoed in an equally powerful, but necessarily shorter speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier). He made the very same point on the need to protect charities.

We heard also from my right hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke), who, as he said, spoke from "eclectic ecclesiastical stock". He made some very important points, particularly on the danger of vexatious litigants. I think that that problem will come back to us time and again. His concerns echo the concerns of those in another place, who speak with spiritual authority. The concerns need to be borne very much in mind.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) made some very interesting points on how social change is dealt with in the convention. Opposition Members agreed very strongly with him when he talked about the inadequacies of the definition of public authorities—which is a problem that will arise time after time in our debates on the Bill, and is particularly relevant in this debate on religion and Churches.

As the Home Secretary said in opening the debate on this group of amendments, when he spoke to the Churches, he felt that he was able to reassure them, and told them that they would be regarded as public authorities only when they were standing in the place of the state—which, I think, is the phrase he used.

Mr. Straw indicated assent.

Mr. Clappison: The Home Secretary will know that, for the purposes of the law, Churches stand in no special position as a public authority. In deciding in actions whether Churches are public authorities, the courts will consider them on the same basis as they apply to any other organisation that is said to be a public authority. The test that the courts will have to apply to a Church, as to any other organisation, is one of deciding whether any of its functions are functions of a public nature.

Ultimately, the Government have not been able to tell the Churches or other religious organisations any more than they have been able to tell any other type of organisation whether they are a public authority—which gives rise to real concerns. Ministers have told us that the matter will be left to the courts, who will decide whether functions are of a public nature and whether a Church or organisation is a public authority.

The matter has been examined by those who are far more learned in the law and experienced in the matter than I am. In the other place, the eminent Lord Donaldson—who is no stranger to high judicial office—recently considered the meaning of "a public authority". He said that he thought it was clear that, for example, local government, police, immigration officers, prisons, courts and tribunals would all be public authorities. He went on to consider other organisations, and thought that, for example, the BBC performed functions of a public nature, and that, if the BBC performed such functions, so did ITV and the radio companies.

Lord Donaldson went on to say that, in his analysis of public authorities, he could not say for sure that Safeway was not a public authority, as it performed some functions that were arguably of a public nature.

Mrs. May: I wonder whether my hon. Friend will comment on the possibility that private sector organisations that are undertaking functions under compulsory competitive tendering that were previously performed by public bodies could be covered under the definition?

Mr. Clappison: That is an important point, and it supports my argument. It is something that religious bodies will have to consider. I understand that, in another place, the Minister concerned admitted that the BBC was likely to be regarded as a public authority and, possibly, even Channel 4. I thought that the whole point of the BBC was that it was not a public body—it has a charter saying that it is not part of the state. No one could say that the BBC is standing in the place of the state, yet the Government say that it too could be a public authority.

I understand that even the noble Lord Chancellor has had difficulty with this question. As we all know now, he began by saying that the Press Complaints Commission was not a public authority, but had to change his mind after receiving learned opinion, and say that perhaps it was. That is the background of difficulties over the definition of public authorities which gives rise to so much concern among our Churches and religious organisations. They rightly look for protection against any actions that might be brought against them because they are regarded as public authorities.

We have to consider carefully the degree of protection that the Government are affording them. We appreciate that the Home Secretary has gone to some lengths on this, but the protection that he is offering through new clause 9 is conclusively weaker than the protection already available in the Bill and weaker than that offered in the proposed amendments.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) said, it is the weakest form of protection that could be given—weaker than a complete defence, which is in the Bill at the moment, and weaker than a defence in specific cases. It certainly does not go as far as an exemption from being a public authority would go to afford a defence, merely asking the courts to have particular regard to the importance of freedom of religion, conscience and thought.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough rightly said, the courts may look at the provision and say that they have had particular regard to it, but that they will still come down against the Church or religious organisation.

Mr. Ben Bradshaw (Exeter) rose—

Mr. Clappison: I will not give way, in view of the hour.

There is no guarantee that any of the possibilities or contingencies that my right hon. and hon. Friends have described as regards the Churches would not come to pass. If new clause 9 is added to the Bill, there is no guarantee that those things will be prevented from happening. The Times has stated:

"A Home Office source said the amendment would in general terms 'bolster religious freedom' but stop homosexual couples from being able to sue their vicar or church if they were refused a church wedding. The amendment would also deny divorcees the right to remarry in church."

No Minister can say at the Dispatch Box that the Bill would prevent that contingency, and it is the example that the Home Office chose.

I see the Home Secretary shaking his head, but that came from a Home Office source. Neither the Home Secretary nor any other hon. Member on the Government Front Bench can say at the Dispatch Box that the new clause would stop homosexual marriages or any of the other things that might come to pass. I emphasise that I choose that example because the Government themselves chose it.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) asked whether, if it were decided that civil marriages should be allowed for such unions in the future, the convention rights would result in the Churches having to follow suit. That question was not answered, but it needs to be. So does the important point made by Liberal Democrat Members about the Church of Scotland.

The right hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (Mr. Maclennan) and the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) both mentioned that matter. The latter produced a letter from Dr. McDonald, who held high office in the Church of Scotland. He said that the Church was still not satisfied by what the Government were saying, particularly about the implications for the Church of Scotland Act 1921, which produced a separation between Church and state, and allowed the courts of the Church to govern its spiritual affairs. The Church was still concerned that that right would be taken away, and that it would be left to rely on convention rights.

We look for a considered reply from the Secretary of State for Scotland to those important points by the Church of Scotland. I have great respect for his debating skills, and I would not lightly cross swords with him, but his intervention on my right hon. Friend the Member for North–West Cambridgeshire fell below his usual standard of canniness. He had a good answer for my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough, but, if he really thinks that the Bill will make no difference and that the position will be the same as it has been since we signed up to the convention, what on earth are the Government doing?

What was the Prime Minister doing when he said at Question Time that he would try to address our concerns? What has the Home Secretary been doing in meeting religious leaders to try to allay their concerns and in tabling amendments? If the Bill was never going to change anything, was not all that activity totally unjustified? The Secretary of State seems to have come to the Chamber to urge the Committee to support an amendment that he has suggested is completely unnecessary.

I leave the Secretary of State to that task, but we believe that some important points need answering. Opposition Members have expressed significant concerns—we are concerned about this country's traditional religious freedoms, and we want to give our Churches and religious organisations a high standard of protection. We expect the Secretary of State to do justice to those important matters.

Mr. Dewar: I certainly accept that there are strong feelings on these issues, which have been well illustrated in some lengthy but sincere speeches over the past four or five hours.

I find myself in a slightly difficult situation—those words usually drip with hypocrisy—as I seem to be expected to reply to all the points that have been made. In fact, I arrived in the Chamber with a rather narrow remit—to deal with those matters that relate to the Church of Scotland. If I do not get through everything in the comparatively short time that I have, I hope that hon. Members will forgive me—no doubt they can take matters up with my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary on other occasions.

Some of the points that have been made have been excitable—that sounds uncharitable, but I do not mean it to be. Some hon. Members have convinced themselves that there will be a total sea change in the way in which we conduct our affairs, and that life will be made extremely difficult for the Churches.

A number of cases have been thrown at us. I do not pretend to know much about the Dutch Salvation Army case and the refusal to employ a non-Christian kitchen worker, but I am advised that that case was fought entirely under Dutch domestic law, and had nothing to do with the European convention on human rights. In the event, the result of the case was right from the point of view of those hon. Members who mentioned it, but the important point is that the case was fought under Dutch domestic law.

Hon. Members have expressed concern about the use or sale of pornography on Church Commission premises—that may be a legitimate worry in specific circumstances, but the Bill will not prevent the Church Commissioners from terminating the licence of a news vendor who sold pornography from their premises. The contractual relationship between the Church Commissioners as a landlord and the news vendor as a tenant is a private matter; it would not be subject to the Bill's public authority provisions.

I make that prosaic point deliberately, as great theories of what is likely to happen have been erected, and I do not think that they are entirely justified—

Sir Brian Mawhinney rose—

Mr. Dewar: I shall not give way, as I do not want to get too involved at this point.

[Mr. Dewar]

As my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary demonstrated, the Government have tried hard to give reassurances—I am talking in general terms—about the Churches south of the border. We may think that fears are exaggerated or perhaps illusory, but that does not mean that sensible people will not try to find ways in which to give reassurances. The wording of new clause 9—the over-arching provision—is entirely sensible, as was accepted by a number of hon. Members.

The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) is becoming almost an object of fascination to me. I sat through 10 days of consideration of the Scotland Bill, and he outlasted me on every one of them, but here he is back again, giving every sign of listening to the debate, which puts him in a small minority.

New clause 9 refers to "the Convention right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion", which, to put it informally, is a sort of shorthand, because it is certainly intended to include the right to manifest religion or belief in worship, teaching practice and observance. The language of article 9 is set out fully in schedule 1. I know that the hon. Member for Beaconsfield is basically on my side of the argument—I hope that that does not embarrass him—and that became clear in what he said. I hope that that is of some reassurance to him, as it is intended to be, more broadly, to others.

10.45 pm

I do not want to bandy quotations, as there are always dangers in that, but it is fair to say that Baroness Young, who led a spirited fight over these issues in another place, has accepted that our amendments and new clause are a final recognition by the Government that issues of importance were at risk. She said that the amendments

"will give assurance to people of all denominations that, should there be litigation under the Bill, the courts must pay particular regard to the position of churches and religious schools."

The Scottish situation demands some comment. I respond in particular to amendment No. 46, which would exempt the Church of Scotland Act 1921 from the principle of statutory interpretation in clause 3. It is a useful peg on which to hang a more general and important debate, but the amendment would not meet any of the points made by Opposition Members. I hope that it will not be pressed to a vote.

My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has already made it clear that we must reverse the provisions inserted in clause 6 on Third Reading in another place, which would have exempted from the public authority provisions of the Bill courts or bodies exercising a jurisdiction recognised, but not created, by Parliament in spiritual matters, although I recognise that those provisions were aimed or intended in part to help with the Church of Scotland's worries.

I understand that Church's position. It is our national Church north of the border, and enjoys a unique status in the life of the Scottish nation, as well as having a place in the life of the United Kingdom. The Act of Union of 1707 safeguarded the Presbyterian religion of Scotland, and in the 19th century there was a cathartic struggle that led to the disruption of 1843 and a remarkable stand on principle over the impact of the Church Patronage Act 1874, when a third of ministers walked out from their stipends and their livings, taking their elders into what was a wilderness, until they were rescued by a remarkable upsurge of giving and energy from their new congregations. Those are great and remarkable events in Scottish history.

Harmonious relations were re-established with the Church of Scotland Act 1921, and a settlement emerged. I do not know how many hon. Members have read the annexe to that Act, but it is a superb piece of language, biblical in its power and worthy in every sense of the original King James version. I recommend it to anyone who wants to enjoy a powerful passage, written with feeling in every sense.

I have always taken an interest in these matters, and there is no way in which I would want to damage the harmony that has reigned between Church and state in Scotland and the happy co-operation that has taken place over the years. I am aware that the Church considers that the Bill represents a threat to that harmony, and I genuinely regret that. That was not intended, and if it continued it would be a sadness for us all.

I have had extensive conversations with the Rev. Sandy McDonald, the retiring moderator, with Dr. Finlay Macdonald, the clerk, and with the procurator, Mr. Dunlop, who brought powerful arguments to bear. The conversations were constructive, but I do not hide the fact that there is still a gap between us. The Church has a long memory in such matters, and politicians are often criticised for taking a short-term view. We want to listen carefully to the Church, and we have been listening carefully, though we are still separated in logic.

I was at the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland this week because our old colleague Norman Hogg, now Lord Hogg of Cumbernauld, was making his debut as the Lord High Commissioner. I was unashamedly proud to be in the gallery. My colleagues may be amused to hear that I was hurried out by the purse-bearer just as it was starting a debate on the Human Rights Bill. I therefore did not hear the debate that led to the deliverance and the deep regret about our position that resulted.

We are still in correspondence. The principal clerk to the assembly wrote to me on 18 May. Only now have we had the opportunity to consider the letter. Briefly, he argues that the Church of Scotland Act 1921 guaranteed the Church certainty of non-interference by the state in spiritual matters. It feels that new clause 9 does not do enough. Although it regards the new clause as an improvement and some reassurance, it does not believe that it closes the gap or does enough to guarantee freedom of thought, religion and conscience as we intend. I am sympathetic, but there are real difficulties from which I cannot retreat.

It is an odd situation, because I recognise that the Church's fears are genuine, but I also believe that they are unfounded. It is difficult to reconcile the situation to the satisfaction of both sides. As has been argued in another place by the Lord Advocate, I want to make it clear, as the hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) said, that we find it hard to think of circumstances in which a Church of Scotland procedure involving acting as a court would be taken to be a public authority within the meaning of the Bill.

I do not say that lightly. We have considered the matter carefully, and used other legal advice on it. It is said that it is possible that it could happen. I am not an absolutist—possibilities are, I suppose, always possibilities—but we have tried genuinely hard to think of such a circumstance, and cannot come up with anything that justifies the fear that has been raised.

The right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) mentioned the case of Thomas Tyler, but that is not a helpful precedent. It dealt specifically with that unfortunate priest's alleged actions as an individual. As the Committee probably knows—actually, I suppose that it probably will not know, because I did not know until this document was given to me, and I have no reason to think that I was much behind the pace on this. It states:

"The Commission is not, however, required to decide whether the proceedings in the present case determined the applicant's civil rights within the meaning of Article 6 . . . of the Convention, as, even if they did, the application is in any event manifestly ill-founded".

It goes on at some length to explain the basis on which it came to that conclusion.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: I was one of the few closer to the pace, in that I knew the outcome. That was not the point of citing that example. The point is that someone whom the Home Secretary told us would almost always be acting in a private capacity was designated by the European Commission of Human Rights as primarily operating in a public capacity. That blurring of the distinction was at the heart of the Home Secretary's presentation. We should be grateful for the Secretary of State's views on that.

Mr. Dewar: I have neither the time nor the inclination to rehearse the facts of the case, but I understand that it turned greatly on the circumstances of this gentleman's private life, which became a matter of contention.

I mentioned the Tyler case because the commission considered the Court of Arches and the consistory court, and found that they were public authorities, but complied with article 6. Under the 1921 Act, the courts of the Church of Scotland would not, I believe, be held to be public authorities. That is the distinction, and the reason why I argue strongly that there is no significant risk that they would be held to be public authorities and therefore open to intervention in the civil courts under the European convention on human rights.

If one looks at the record—this is important, and it is of course a matter of interpretation, but I ask the House to take my side of the argument—one will see that, even in the Scottish domestic courts, there has been a great reluctance to intervene in these matters.

The right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire asked me about Strasbourg decisions, and to quote examples. Unashamedly, I say to him that I cannot quote examples, because there have been none—certainly in Scotland, on which I can speak with a little more clarity.

The European convention on human rights has been available for use since 1953. I understand that it may be a little easier to get to the courts once the convention has been imported into the ambit of the domestic courts, but human rights cases are often contentious and difficult cases. The fact that, in the past 45 years, no one has gone to the European Court of Human Rights and tried to challenge my interpretation and understanding of the situation is of some significance—I put it no higher than that.

It is a little bit—I hope that no one thinks that it is undignified to say so—the case of the dog that did not bark, but, if we are going to have these problems, I think that we would have had at least a few yaps in those 45 years, and they have been conspicuous by their absence.

I know that I am repeating the point that I made in an intervention in the speech of the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh), but I hold firmly to the point that the convention has been in being for more than 45 years. The fabric of our religious freedoms has not crumbled. The fact that we are now allowing the British courts—the Scottish and English courts respectively—to deal with the issues that come up under the convention of human rights represents no alteration of substance to the relationship between the Church and the courts.

I am not terribly impressed—although I understand it, and I do not want to be swept into an unsympathetic stance—with the idea that suddenly the floodgates will open, when no one can point me to any single change other than the forum in which the cases may be heard that will result from the Bill. It does not ring true.

I referred to the attitude of the Scottish domestic courts. They might be said to have a tendency to ca' canny on the matter. In considering ministers' relationship with the Church, the courts usually hold that they are not determining civil rights because the Church as a court is not a public authority.

I accept the point made by the hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland, that the Logan case did not proceed beyond the interdict stage. I do not know why the counsel who appeared for the minister at the opening hearings did not draw attention to the 1921 Act, but, when he did, Lord Osborne sent the case packing in no uncertain terms, with some fairly robust obiter of one sort or another. That reinforces what seems to me to be the general situation. The picture is one in which the powers and the structure will continue, with the one change being the court to which one can go. The fears that have been expressed have not been realised in the past.

The jurisprudence to date, both domestic and in Strasbourg, indicates the extreme reluctance of the civil courts to become involved in any matters of religious worship, government, discipline or doctrine. It is my firm belief that that will continue. The measure is not based on whim: it is based on 45 years of experience in both jurisdictions.

I do not believe—[Interruption.] I shall finish shortly. I must say that the one thing that happens in government is that the Whips become very efficient.

I do not believe that there is a practical danger. I do not believe that the Scottish courts, given the 1921 Act, will be held to be public authorities. I do not want to hide from the House, but, if that does happen, there will of course be a difficulty. I do not believe that it will happen, and I am founding on that, but I have in honesty to say that, if they were held to be public authorities, it would be difficult to justify an exception for that public authority to pick it out from all the other public authorities. However, that is not an argument in which we need to be embroiled at the moment, because all the evidence so strongly holds together to suggest that the danger will not emerge. That point has been put by the Lord Advocate and looked at thoroughly, and I believe it to be valid.

We have made considerable efforts to find a way forward, but we have not been able to find a form of amendment that meets in full the concerns of the Church of Scotland while preserving the integrity of our policy as a Government, as set out in "Bringing Rights Home". I doubt whether further reflection at this late stage will change that. Of course, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and I are prepared to consider any further representations from the Church of Scotland. I am conscious that the letter quoted this evening arrived literally in the past 24 hours; obviously, it must be looked at with care.

I do not want to slam doors shut, but I have set out what I believe to be a genuine difficulty, and I cannot envisage its being easily resolved. I have to agree that no law is set in stone. In another context, we have spoken much of parliamentary sovereignty and the sovereignty of the House of Commons, and, if the unexpected difficulties that I have suggested will not happen turn out to be very real, I hope that neither I nor my Government would be too proud to look again at the situation. However, I do not think it sensible to legislate on the basis of a situation that we genuinely believe does not exist and will not happen. On that basis, I ask that amendment No. 46 be withdrawn.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

To report progress and ask leave to sit again.—[Jane Kennedy.]

Committee report progress; to sit again tomorrow.

NORTHERN IRELAND GRAND COMMITTEE

Ordered,

That—

(1) the matter of a regional strategic framework for Northern Ireland as set out in the discussion paper 'Shaping our Future', being a matter relating exclusively to Northern Ireland, be referred to the Northern Ireland Grand Committee for its consideration; and

(2) at the sitting on Thursday 4th June—

(i) after any statement which may be made by a Minister of the Crown pursuant to Standing Order No. 112(1) (Northern Ireland Grand Committee (ministerial statements)), the Committee shall consider the matter referred to it under paragraph (1) above; and

(ii) at the completion of these proceedings, a motion for the adjournment of the Committee may be made by a Minister of the Crown pursuant to Standing Order No. 116(5) (Northern Ireland Grand Committee (sittings)).—[Jane Kennedy.]

Church Bells

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Jane Kennedy.]

11.27 pm

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield): First, I should like to set the scene. High in the towers of many of England's beautiful parish churches, as well as our cathedrals, including Lichfield cathedral, which is over 800 years old, are some of the oldest and finest examples of English heritage. Their future now seems threatened by the very organisation that ought to be protecting them.

Hanging side by side, church bells cast up to 600 or 700 years ago are often found next to bells cast in the present century. Both are examples of a truly English craft now practised by only two bell foundries in our land. Week by week, many of our church bells are rung in the truly English fashion of change-ringing, which has been practised for almost 350 years now, and which has resulted in England being known throughout the world as "The Ringing Isle".

Church bells usually weigh several hundred pounds and frequently exceed a tonne. Such weights, revolving through 360 deg each time the rope is pulled by the ringer below, exert huge dynamic forces upon their supporting structures: the bell frames. Those forces are transmitted to the fabric of the church tower. A strong, firm and stable bell frame is obviously essential if bells are to be rung correctly, safely and without risk to tower or the bell ringers below.

Traditionally, bell frames were constructed from timber, often locally grown on the squire's estate and put together by the local carpenter. Sometimes, the frames were very robust and substantial, but often their design and construction left much to be desired and they would be replaced within a relatively short time. Down the years, as change-ringing became an accepted art in England, bell frame design evolved to give more substantial frames capable of holding larger numbers of bells, up to a maximum of 12. A well-constructed frame, carefully maintained, might have lasted 100 years or more before repairs or a replacement were needed.

During the 19th century, developments in engineering by the bell founders led to the introduction of cast-iron frames replacing the all-timber bell frame. Initially, the head and base of a bell frame would still be made of timber—usually oak—but by the end of the century, the head and side of a frame would be made of cast iron, bolted down on to a massive steel or cast-iron base grillage. In turn, the grillage was built into the tower walls, which gave added stability and often helped to strengthen an otherwise weak tower.

Modern bell frames follow the same design, although in recent years, cost-saving economic considerations forced on England's churches have resulted in some bell frames being fabricated from steel sections. Although fairly successful and satisfactory for lighter rings of bells, in the short term, they do not have the proven longevity of their predecessors.

The approach of the third millennium has provided a focus for churches and bell ringers alike, who are addressing the problem of many aging and even derelict bell installations around the country. As the Minister will know, encouragement has been given by the awarding of a £3 million grant—on a partnership funding basis—by the Millennium Commission, using money from the national lottery, and a number of bell restoration projects have merited grants from the Heritage Lottery Fund, all of which has provided a valuable upturn in the long-established craft of bell founding and bell hanging.

The dream of our churches ringing out the new millennium is rapidly turning to dust in many cases. Many of those projects, including the restoration of the bells in Longdon parish church in my constituency, have foundered through the inept intervention of English Heritage. Bells that have been prevented from being rung in their intended manner because of bell frames that are of inherently weak design or which have reached the end of their useful life could well remain silent in the new millennium because English Heritage will not allow those useless structures to be replaced with a well-designed, modern bell frame built into the tower. Some towers are even threatened by such intervention. English Heritage's present policy appears to be conservation at all costs, regardless of the end result.

The problem affects churches not just in my constituency, but throughout the land. Today, I received an e-mail—it shows that we bell ringers are up to date with the latest technology—saying that the Central Council of Church Bell Ringers, which will meet on Monday 25 May, has a motion to discuss that very problem, caused by English Heritage. I am sure that the Minister is a regular reader of The Ringing World and, as such, will know that that is a constant theme, which is appearing in letters and editorials throughout the magazine.

Let us be clear. Often, the bell frames that are so beloved of English Heritage are now unsuitable for bell ringing. They are often dangerous or totally inaccessible, except to steeplejacks. If English Heritage is so concerned about the frames, why does it not allow them to be removed and put on display in the church or a local museum, where at least they could be seen?

In my constituency, there are several examples of schemes that have now been held up for unacceptable periods because English Heritage will not accept professional organisations' and advisers' recommendations. Instead, it insists that parishes should spend much larger sums to repair existing structures, which may preclude the addition of further bells now wanted by the churches.

In our cathedral church of the diocese, huge sums have been spent over the past 10 years on repairing the old bell frame. That expenditure is unlikely to prolong the frame's life for more than a handful of years, and has prevented the full peal of 10 bells from being rung for more than three years. A new bell frame would have been much cheaper at today's prices and would have taken a matter of a few weeks to install. Can the expenditure, either of hard-earned funds by a parish or of public funds from the national lottery and English Heritage, be justified?

Bell founders, bell hangers and bell ringers are aware of the need to preserve special examples of heritage, be they bells, bell frames or bell fittings, and would value the help and support of bodies such as English Heritage to preserve a selection of worthy examples. In recent years, there has been a growing trend towards preserving anything and everything, regardless of age. Even poor examples of bells cast by prolific 19th and 20th-century founders have been subjected to preservation orders, contrary to the code of practice established between the trade and the Council for the Care of Churches.

Bells are the living voice of the Church in the community. They do far more than merely mark the time or announce that a service is shortly to start; they are musical instruments, whether hung individually or as a peal, and deserve to be treated as such, just as a church organ is. I live within 60 yards of the spire of Lichfield cathedral, and I welcome the sound of bells ringing through my open window on a spring Sunday morning.

Bells should be hung using the best principles of engineering, to ensure that they can be rung with precision and without risk of physical injury or damage, either to bell ringers or to the tower in which they hang. Why, then, should English Heritage be allowed to adopt policies which, in all but a few cases, compromise those essential precepts? Bells and bell frames are not historical artefacts to be treated like museum pieces. Is it not self-evident that bells are meant to be rung? [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I thank my hon. Friends.

Let me give an example. A major restoration scheme was carried out at Alstonefield church 10 years ago. The work had been planned for more than 20 years, and was made possible by a generous benefactor. Costs had risen greatly since the scheme was conceived, then more delays occurred, because English Heritage insisted that the old bell frame should be preserved. Costs escalated; then, even more cost was incurred, because English Heritage insisted that the original bell frame had to be secured in the upper part of the tower, while a new bell frame had to be installed lower in the tower. The bells could not be rung as well in the smaller area available. Eventually, the scheme was completed—without funding from English Heritage, which does not usually fund such work—and not one person has asked to look at the original bell frame.

Bell frames are not the only issue, however. English Heritage states that it has a presumption against the tuning of old bells. An intrinsic part of the bell founder's craft is the production of a rich-sounding, melodious and well-tuned bell or set of bells. When a peal comprises bells cast by different founders at different times, a marked improvement in the musical quality of the peal can be achieved by carefully monitored treatment by the tuning machine, to put the bells on to a proper musical scale. The bell founder's skills, coupled with modern technology, which earlier generations of founders were denied, enable that to be done relatively easily and without altering the characteristics of the bells, but making them much more pleasant and melodious. That is what it is all about.

Traditionally, a bell was melted down by the bell founder when it became cracked and toneless, and was recast as a sound bell. Today, English Heritage prefers many bells to be repaired by a welding process, which is not cheap, does little to enhance the musicality of a damaged bell, and denies the bell founder his craft.

In September 1997, the Open Churches Trust, with the active support of the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), launched a scheme to encourage more bell-ringing recruits to come forward and to learn the art in time to man all the bells in the land at the millennium. The Millennium Commission has funded a special project to restore old bell installations and to provide some completely new ones, but if English Heritage is allowed to continue its present policy of preservation and procrastination, much of that work will be to no avail. It cannot see the wood for the trees. We are putting at risk the continued existence of bell ringing and bell founding, two of the oldest and finest examples of the heritage found only in England.

By all means, let us preserve the rare and very special examples of bell frames and bells in a manner that can be enjoyed by all people, but in all other cases, let common sense be coupled with prompt decisions—where indeed any decision is required—so that some of the finest parts of our English heritage may continue long into the following millennium. Let us ensure that the already costly work of restoring our bells and bell frames does not become even more costly on account of bureaucracy and procrastination on the part of English Heritage. Let us ensure that the unique art of English bell ringing and the craft of English bell founding have secure futures and that they are given every possible encouragement.

I call on the Minister to use his influence in two areas: first, to make English Heritage see sense, so that sensible decisions can be made promptly and fairly. As the Minister said when he recently came before the Select Committee on Culture, Media and Sport, of which I have the privilege to be a member, one of his strengths is the ability to bang heads together. I believed him. I hope that he will bang a few heads together following this debate.

Secondly, now that the delays caused by English Heritage have resulted in churches such as mine in Longdon and many others missing the millennium fund's application deadline, I call on the Minister to ensure that the Heritage Lottery Fund makes money available for the restoration of church bells in greater numbers than it does already, to compensate for the applications that have gone past the deadline because of the procrastination of English Heritage.

I urge the Minister and the House to give their fullest support to securing those very special parts of our English heritage.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): I call Mr. Tony Banks.

11.41 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Mr. Tony Banks): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You can call me Quasimodo if you wish.

There are times when one finds oneself at the Dispatch Box after everyone has departed feeling that one would more suitably wring necks than bells, but, even at this unlikely hour, it is more pleasing to talk about church bells than to have six bells kicked out of me over the sale of World cup tickets. I thank the hon. Member for Lichfield (Mr. Fabricant) for giving me notice of the main points that he wished to debate. It will enable me, I hope, to give him a constructive reply.

The hon. Gentleman is one of the characters of the House; I think that we can all, even at this late hour, agree on that. Certainly tonight, he managed to put the camp back into campanology. I assure him that the Government are firmly committed to the preservation of heritage in all its forms, including church bells, but there will always be conflict between preserving the best of our history and providing useful and practical facilities for today. We are confronted with the dilemma regularly, particularly, for example, in respect of sports stadiums, cinemas, leisure complexes and shopping centres. I am facing such a dilemma over the Milton Keynes shopping centre. I assure the hon. Gentleman that, by comparison, Solomon's judgment was a bit of a doddle.

The hon. Gentleman has highlighted a specific example that he is interested in, and revealed extensive knowledge. He always surprises us, and tonight, he has told me things that I never knew or guessed at. I will now go away and assiduously study Bell Ringers News, The Ringing Times or whatever it was that he flourished at me. He asks: do we try simply to retain ancient fabric, or do we provide the best facilities for today's bell ringers? I understand his point. Inevitably, some compromise will be required.

English Heritage's statutory remit is, in part, to preserve the element of our heritage that is most important in terms of architectural and historical significance. In practice, of course, that generally means buildings that are listed grade 1, grade 2 star or grade 2 in conservation areas. That includes a large number of ecclesiastical buildings. Over the past five years, English Heritage has offered £57 million in grants for church conservation works and a further £18 million for cathedrals.

Given its specific locus, English Heritage does not offer funding for the restoration of church bells. However, English Heritage and the Heritage Lottery Fund are now in the second year of a joint venture to fund heritage works in churches and other places of worship. The Heritage Lottery Fund's remit allows it to fund works to buildings and structures that are not of outstanding architectural or historic interest. That enables the joint scheme to encompass a wide scope of projects, including church bells. I understand that 70 applications have been advised on by English Heritage.

The scheme has been a huge success. English Heritage and the Heritage Lottery Fund jointly provided £20 million in 1997–98. A further £20 million is available for 1998–99. However, there have been 1,194 applications. If they were all granted, the total cost would be £186 million. The demand is clearly greater than the funds available. However, bell ringing associations now have a new stream of funding. There may have been some difficulties in adapting to the rigours of public accounting, but the new pool of money is a huge bonus for bells and ringers.

The new stream of funding has created some debate about priorities for church bells. Bell ringing associations consider their church bells to be musical instruments and are understandably concerned to ensure that any works take advantage of technical advances that can improve the tone of ringing and the ease of playing. The joint scheme focuses primarily on the preservation of the heritage and conservation of historic fabric, but in assessing applications from bell ringing associations, English Heritage is most concerned about how the proposed works make use of existing bells, their frames and beams.

English Heritage fully appreciates the views of the bell ringers, and is working hard to accommodate them in its overall remit to preserve the heritage. English Heritage could not recommend heritage funding for a scheme that removed existing bells and associated apparatus wholesale. Equally, English Heritage would not see it as a conservation success if the bell frame and other supports were retained at its insistence, but could not be used by the ringers. That would make no sense.

A great deal of time and energy has been committed to resolving the dilemma, in consultation with appropriate organisations such as the Council for the Care of Churches and the Central Council of Church Bell Ringers. I am sure that more practical compromises will emerge that allow for the retention of original fabric, while meeting the aspirations of the bell ringers.

The hon. Gentleman mentions the debate about repairing bells by welding cracks rather than recasting the entire bell. He seems strangely reluctant to encourage new technology in that case, although he is keen to use new technology for the bell frames. Welding cracked bells is a new technique that may need improvement, but it seems successful. English Heritage is not aware of any complaints about the results.

As the hon. Gentleman said, St. James the Great in Longdon did not receive funding from the joint scheme. That was because the proposed works incorporated too much new fabric to justify heritage funding. However, the decision did not impede the parish's ability to apply for millennium funding under the ringing in the millennium scheme. It was open to the parish to apply for funding from both streams simultaneously, as many other parishes did.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned an earlier case at Alstonefield. He has acknowledged the code of practice for conservation and repair of bells and bell frames, which is widely endorsed by relevant organisations in the professions. The code clearly states that unnecessary replacement or alteration of historic bells, including retuning, should be avoided, and that, where it becomes apparent that major replacement and alteration is inevitable, full consideration should be given to preservation of the bells and frame in situ. That is what happened at St. Peter's in Alstonefield.

There are many examples of English Heritage having negotiated an acceptable compromise, such as at St. Mary's at Pakenham in Suffolk, where it grant-aided the repair of a mediaeval frame to allow the existing five bells to be rung and enabled a sixth bell to be added to the ring on a separate small metal frame.

English Heritage has a wealth of expert knowledge and practical experience in the conservation of our heritage. The Government and English Heritage are keen to ensure that the very best of our heritage is preserved. Equally, of course, we must be alive to the fact that heritage is a living thing. To that end, English Heritage knows that a restoration project must both do its best to meet current needs and retain essential historic character. English Heritage's involvement in a project should therefore be viewed not as an unnecessary obstacle, but as assisting the overall preservation and promotion of our heritage for future generations to enjoy.

The hon. Gentleman put two specific points to me. On the first, English Heritage supports the code of practice, the first aim of which is to encourage the continuing use of bells to announce public worship. Sir Jocelyn Stevens has confirmed:

"We grant-aid historic frames if they can be made to work. If they cannot be made to work we allow new frames to be built, while conserving the historic frame where possible."

That seems to be a reasonable compromise.

On the hon. Gentleman's second point, concerning particularly his own church at Longdon, the Heritage Lottery Fund is continuing to commit money to churches, including bells. However, it is not in my gift to determine which projects it supports. The church at Longdon had five months from final refusal by the Heritage Lottery Fund to the Millennium Commission's deadline. Surely that should have been enough time.

The Millennium Commission is considering whether, with reference to the millennium money, it might be able to offer further support to umbrella projects that it has funded, such as ringing in the millennium. There may therefore be a further opportunity for parishes to apply for bell restoration. I wish the hon. Gentleman's church well in such a project, although, of course, no guarantee can be given here at the Dispatch Box on future applications.

My good lady wife—as they say—has been sitting in splendid isolation, listening to this debate. She has a great interest in it, and is here because she is herself a former bell ringer. I therefore take very close advice from her on those matters. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman has raised a subject that is vital both to him and to many people in the United Kingdom. I give him my assurance that I shall keep the matter under close review.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

TREASURY

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was asked—

Public Sector Borrowing Requirement

1. Mr. Hugh Bayley (City of York): What was the average central Government public sector borrowing requirement per household in the United Kingdom per year for (a) 1992 to 1997 and (b) 1997–98. [41672]

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Alistair Darling): Over the years 1992–93 to 1996–97, the previous Government's borrowing averaged £1,500 per household. In 1997–98, under this Government, borrowing has averaged just £50 per household.

Mr. Bayley: May I remind the Chief Secretary of the pledge card, which promised that a Labour Government would set tough rules for Government borrowing and spending, and congratulate the Treasury on a pledge well kept? Borrowing at £1,500 per household per year over five years goes way beyond that necessary for the financial cycle. Does he agree that such borrowing under the Conservatives was deferred taxation, so when they were in power we had not only higher taxes, but higher deferred taxation?

Mr. Darling: My hon. Friend is right. The previous Government made a catastrophic misjudgment in the late 1980s when they misread the economic signals, and the economic miracle about which they used to boast became an economic disaster only two years later. That is a reason why borrowing averaged £1,500 per household in the previous Parliament.

In contrast, as my hon. Friend said, we made it clear that we would run public finances prudently. We have reduced borrowing, which now averages about £50 per household and, at the same time, have been able to redirect resources, because of tight control of public spending, into our priority areas—education and health. He is right to draw attention to the promises that we made at the last election, and we shall deliver each and every one by the end of this Parliament.

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): If in, say, two years, the right hon. Gentleman perchance found that revenue exceeded expenditure, which was the case in two successive years under the previous Conservative Government, would he use the surplus to increase public expenditure or to reduce the PSBR?

Mr. Darling: What matters is what happens over the economic cycle, as the hon. Gentleman should know. We have made it clear that we are conducting economic affairs in such a way as to achieve long-term economic stability—something which the previous Government were, unfortunately, never able to deliver.

Mr. Derek Foster (Bishop Auckland): May I congratulate my right hon. Friend on getting borrowing and spending under control? However, I invite him to look again at the PSBR regulations, especially to allow the Post Office to borrow to invest, to enhance its competitiveness. At the same time, he may consider Newcastle airport, which also longs to borrow to invest, to enhance its competitiveness in the northern region.

Mr. Darling: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his kind remarks. Although the Government always keep the PSBR under review—indeed, we consider it almost every day, for various reasons—people must bear in mind the fact that borrowing is still borrowing and has to be paid for, no matter how it is classified. There is no easy solution to the problems to which he refers. Borrowing has to be serviced, and the Government must have regard to public exposure to borrowing, whether it is directly under the control of the Government or incurred by bodies over which we have less direct control, but for which we are, none the less, responsible.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Does not the improved borrowing over which the Chief Secretary has presided make it rather absurd for the Government to continue to maintain under-investment in public services, and does it not place them in the embarrassing position of not fulfilling their pledges and causing the situation to deteriorate? When the right hon. Gentleman completes the comprehensive spending review, will he accept that, to deal with the crisis in the public services, he will have to find money for the current year as well as for the three following years?

Mr. Darling: Yes, we are moving towards the conclusion of our spending review. The hon. Gentleman should review his policies on taxation and spending. I have noticed over the past week that he is in favour of as much spending as possible on just about everything that he can get round to naming, but against any measure of taxation to pay for that spending. A policy of tax and spend is a statable case, but a policy of spend and spend without any means to pay for it is incredible. That is why the hon. Gentleman's party has no credibility whatever on those matters. I remind him that, this year, because we have strictly controlled public spending, we are not only reducing borrowing, but have been able to make £2.5 billion available for education and more than £2 billion available for the health service. Those amounts would not have been available but for the change of Government. I suggest to the hon. Gentleman, in the nicest possible way, that he reflects on his own policies rather than complaining about ours, which are doing what the country wants to get sustainable long-term stability and good public services that we can afford.

Working Families Tax Credit

2. Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West): What representations he has received on the working families tax credit. [41673]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): The working families tax credit has been welcomed by a wide range of individuals and organisations. It guarantees every working family an income for full-time work of at least £180 a week. No family with earnings below £220 a week will pay income tax.

Dr. Starkey: May I pass on to my right hon. Friend the positive feedback that I have received from families in my constituency about the working families tax credit proposals? I should like to share with him the situation of a constituent. The lady's husband had been unemployed for some time and decided to try to improve his work prospects by going to university. She went back to work as soon as her son was born, and she and her husband were caught in such a poverty trap that the stress contributed to the breakdown of the marriage. She is currently £4.50 a week worse off in work than she would be if she were on benefit. As a result of the Budget proposals, and especially the working families tax credit, she would be £21.75 a week better off in work than on benefit. She certainly values the Government's measures to help people such as her who are trying to improve the lives of their families through their own efforts. [Interruption.] That is in marked contrast to her experience under the previous Government.

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. It is amazing that Opposition Members do not like hearing about people being better off as a result of changes to help working people. The working families tax credit reduces the number of people who are on the high marginal tax rate and eliminates the 100 per cent. plus marginal tax rate, which was so damaging to work incentives and created a poverty trap. At the same time, it will end the situation in which 500,000 people were receiving benefits and paying tax at the same time. That did nothing for the relief of poverty. The minimum wage that the Government will introduce, the child care tax credit, which will accompany the working families tax credit, and the reduction in national insurance will mean that many people such as my hon. Friend's constituent will be better off. That will be the result of the Budget and the Government's other measures.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): The Chancellor speaks as though those tax changes are here now. Will he tell the House and the country when they are to be introduced? When is the child care tax credit to come in? The Secretary of State for Social Security has been out launching that yet again, and my constituents think they can claim it now.

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman will be able to write to his constituents and tell them that the child care disregard is being improved this year and that the full child care tax credit will be introduced next year. Child benefit will rise next April, which is the time at which the minimum wage will be introduced. The combination of those measures will mean that people such as the constituent of my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) will be up to £20 a week better off.

Ms Patricia Hewitt (Leicester, West): Does my right hon. Friend accept that one of the barriers that many of my constituents face in trying to move into employment is the fear that an increase in in-work benefits will be cancelled out by a reduction in other benefits, particularly housing benefit? Will he ensure that the welcome introduction of the working families tax credit is accompanied by very close working between the Inland Revenue, the Benefits Agency, the Employment Service and local authorities, so that claimants get a seamless service that ensures that they really are better off as they move into work?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Systematically, this Government intend to remove every barrier that prevents people who want to work from getting the benefit and opportunity of work. That is why we have our welfare-to-work programme, why we have abolished—housing benefit is affected by this—the 100 per cent. plus marginal tax rate that many poor people face, and why, at the same time, we shall continue to examine, including in our review of public expenditure and housing benefit, every barrier that prevents people from getting the benefit of work. Our aim is to make people better off for working and to ensure that everyone who wants to work has a contribution to make and is rewarded for it.

Exchange Rate Policy

3. Mr. Damian Green (Ashford): What plans he has to stabilise the rate of sterling against the euro. [41674]

4. Mr. Robert Syms (Poole): If he will make a statement on his policy on the exchange rate. [41675]

7. Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne): If he will make a statement on his exchange rate policy following the launch of the euro. [41679]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): The Government's aim is for a stable and competitive pound over the medium term. The best contribution that the Government can make is to create the right conditions for economic stability. The Government have put in place policies to deliver that objective and are determined to avoid a return to boom and bust.

Mr. Green: I am sure that the Chancellor will have seen an excellent document from the European Commission, which makes it clear that those countries that do not join economic and monetary union on 1 January next year will have to fulfil various criteria to qualify. One of them is

"the observance of the normal fluctuation margins provided for by the Exchange Rate Mechanism . . . for at least two years, without devaluing against the currency of any other Member State".

When does the Chancellor plan for that two-year period to start for this country? Will it be in the lifetime of this Parliament?

Mr. Brown: If the hon. Gentleman is suggesting that we should rejoin the exchange rate mechanism, which his friends took us into in 1990, that is not the Government's intention—I make that absolutely clear. If he is suggesting that our policy should be for exchange rate stability, let me say that our aim is a stable and competitive pound over the medium term. That is the policy which we are pursuing and that is right for the British economic interest.

Mr. Syms: Given the recent economic report that 400,000 jobs may be lost in manufacturing over the next few years, the deterioration in the balance of payments, and the fact that, earlier this week, Nissan Europe said that it would not consider investing in Britain unless the value of sterling was between 10 and 20 per cent. lower, has not the Chancellor got the balance of his policies wrong, and is not new Labour bad for manufacturing, for exporters and for people with jobs in those industries?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman did not say that Nissan wants the Government to join the European currency, which is exactly the opposite of the policy of Conservative Members. He may have thought of his question when the pound was at DM3.10. Today, it is at DM2.86 and I remind the House that, when we came into power, it was at DM2.81. The rise in the pound over the past two years was almost entirely under the last Conservative Government.

Mr. Waterson: With a higher pound, higher interest rates and £20 billion worth of extra taxes, is the right hon. Gentleman at all surprised that manufacturing industry is in recession? Has he seen the Confederation of British Industry regional survey, which suggests that manufacturing output is falling in six regions and rising only in three?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman seems determined to avoid asking a question about Europe. It may be because the Conservative party is in such disarray on the matter after this week's speech by the Leader of the Opposition. The hon. Gentleman knows that, over the past few months, manufacturing employment has been rising, not falling, that the CBI, which he quotes, predicts that manufacturing output will rise this year and that that is in line with independent forecasts. He knows also that this Government's policy is to avoid a return to the situation that was created by the previous Government, when 1 million manufacturing jobs were lost as a result of the failure of economic policy and of the creation of stop-go and boom-bust in the late 1980s. We are determined to avoid a return to that situation and to have a sensible policy on Europe. That cannot be said of Conservative Members.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): Would not my right hon. Friend's task in managing the economy be made much easier if he were to announce his intention to join economic and monetary union—without setting a date? Would that not lead to a reduction in interest rates, a more competitive pound and greater investment—all achievable almost at a stroke?

Mr. Brown: The one thing on which my right hon. Friend and I agree is that we need clarity of policy—something which the Opposition do not have. Our policy is very clear. We are, in principle, in favour of the single currency; we shall apply the five economic tests that are in the country's interests; and we shall make a recommendation, if we believe it right to do so, early in the next Parliament, subject to a referendum. That policy was set out in October and widely welcomed by business, and we shall continue to follow it.

The country cannot understand how the Leader of the Opposition could announce a new policy against a single currency on Tuesday when he spoke in France, which the former Deputy Prime Minister has said is extreme and the former Chancellor has said makes the Conservatives unelectable.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that one of the practical consequences of the start of the euro next year is likely to be that some smaller firms down the supply chain of multinationals that settle in euros will be required to bill in euros? Will he give assurances that the preparations that he and his colleagues have made, which have been so welcome compared to the previous Government's irresponsible approach, will continue, in order to ensure that all sectors of the economy, including the smaller firms, are fully prepared for the introduction of the euro?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. We discussed exactly that issue with business at the meeting of the standing committee on preparations in the Treasury yesterday. The president of the Association of British Chambers of Commerce and the president of the CBI, as well as the secretary of the British Bankers Association, were represented at that meeting to put exactly my hon. Friend's views about the need to help small and medium businesses make proper preparations. I should have thought that it would be agreed across the Floor of the House that business should be prepared for the advent of the euro.

We have decided on a course of action that will provide information and an opportunity for businesses' questions to be answered. A campaign of information will begin in June. We are determined that every business, large, medium and small, is properly informed about the implications of the euro. We are determined to do what we can to ensure that banks and other financial organisations are in a position to help. Preparations have been behind because the previous Government refused to take the necessary steps.

Ms Claire Ward (Watford): Do not the Opposition have a cheek, showing concern about manufacturing industry jobs, given the number that were lost when they were in government? Is my right hon. Friend aware that, although we believe that there should be a sustainable and stable economy, manufacturing industry in my constituency is facing difficulties as a result of the high rate of sterling? One company, which conducts a large amount of its work in exporting manufacturing components, is finding it particularly difficult to make ends meet. Will he assure companies in my constituency that undertake a great deal of exporting that we are considering the problems that they face, will be ensuring a stable economy and will be attempting to achieve some stability in sterling?

Mr. Brown: I agree with my hon. Friend that stability is what matters to industry. Creating a stable foundation and a platform of monetary and fiscal stability from which industry can build is an absolute pre-condition for this Government. That is why we made the Bank of England independent, have set a five-year deficit reduction plan and, for the first time, have a proper long-term fiscal and monetary framework. We are determined to avoid a return to the boom-bust, stop-go conditions of the late 1980s that lost 1 million manufacturing jobs. I should remind the House that, when the previous Conservative Government came to power, there were 7 million manufacturing jobs. When they left power, there were only 4 million. That is what they thought of manufacturing industry.

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden): The right hon. Gentleman was an unqualified supporter of Britain's previous membership of the exchange rate mechanism. Can he explain to the House why he is now so opposed to Britain rejoining or shadowing the ERM?

Mr. Brown: The right hon. Gentleman has a cheek to blame membership of the exchange rate membership—[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."] They do not like it. The previous Government took us into the exchange rate mechanism, chose the rate that became unsustainable and caused our exit from the ERM in 1992. As for our policy on exchange rate stability, we are committed to a stable and competitive pound over the medium term. We believe that the basis of achieving that is sound economic policies and the avoidance of a return to the stop-go policies of the past. We shall not join the exchange rate mechanism—we have no intention of doing so. We shall make the decisions that are right for Britain.

Mr. Lilley: The Chancellor should realise that, every time he goes off into auto-rant instead of answering the question, he alienates thousands of people who listen to these exchanges. We should still like to know why he is opposed to membership of the ERM or shadowing of it, whereas he was an unconditional supporter of the ERM. Does not that reluctance to rejoin the ERM sit rather oddly beside his enthusiasm for the euro? Is it not a bit like being unwilling to paddle in the shallow end but willing to throw the pound in the deep end?

Does the Chancellor realise that the words quoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) were taken from the treaty of Maastricht? They are a clear obligation to rejoin the ERM. The Chancellor's own supporters recognise that obligation. Mr. Duisenberg says that we have to join; the Bundesbank says that we have to join; Commissioner de Silguy says that we have to join; and the Commission says that we have to join. Are they all wrong?

Mr. Brown: The right hon. Gentleman has reminded me not only that his Government took us into the ERM, and that he was Trade Secretary at the time—he was supposed to be reporting to the Cabinet on its effect on manufacturing industry—but that his Government signed the Maastricht treaty. As for lectures on European economic policy from Conservative Members, it would be better if they were to tell us their real position. The Leader of the Opposition made a statement on Tuesday, saying that he would never join the euro or economic and monetary union. The next minute, we had a statement from the former Deputy Prime Minister, saying that that was an extreme position. We were then told by the former Chancellor that the position makes the Conservative party unelectable. May we be told the true position of the Conservative party? Is it in favour of a single currency, or is it against it?

The Government will pursue a stable and competitive exchange rate. That is the policy which we established when we came into power, and that is the policy which we shall pursue. Italy and Finland were not members of the exchange rate mechanism for two years, but have been accepted for membership of the euro. As for the Government's policy: we shall not join the ERM. I have made it absolutely clear.

Mr. Lilley: The Chancellor has still not answered the question of why he is opposed to renewed membership or shadowing of the ERM. Has he no reasons for his own policy?

Mr. Brown: We are pursuing the policy that is right for Britain. The policy that is right for Britain is a stable and competitive exchange rate over the medium term. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] I do not know whether Conservative Members think that it is wrong to pursue a policy of a stable and competitive exchange rate, or whether they merely do not like such a policy being pursued—successfully—by a Labour Government. We shall succeed in the policy because we are determined to eliminate the stop-go policies and the instability that has caused so much damage in the past—the very instability that caused ERM membership under the Conservatives to be such a disaster for Britain.

Mr. Bill Rammell (Harlow): I hope that the Chancellor will acknowledge that a pattern is developing in the Conservative party's attacks on the single currency, all in an attempt to undermine the launch of the euro. The shadow President of the Board of Trade has been saying that the Government should go out of their way to destabilise the euro. The Leader of the Opposition has been comparing the creation of the single currency to the creation of a Bosnia-style situation throughout Europe. Is it not crucial, whether we are in or out, that the euro is launched successfully? That is in our economic self-interest. Does my right hon. Friend agree that the wholly exaggerated and unjustified attacks by the Conservative party could undermine to Britain's economic self-interest?

Mr. Brown: The first point that the Conservatives should explain is why their policy on the euro is disliked by almost all this country's major business leaders. Secondly, they should explain why even if the economic benefits of a single currency were proved to be clear and unambiguous, they would oppose it for ideological and doctrinal reasons. It is the Conservatives who must now explain, particularly after the remarks of the former Deputy Prime Minister and the former Chancellor, their real policy on the euro and their economic policy for this country.

Balance of Payments

5. Mr. Richard Spring (West Suffolk): If he will make a statement on future trends in the balance of payments. [41676]

The Paymaster General (Mr. Geoffrey Robinson): The balance of payments is forecast to record a deficit of 0.75 per cent. over the next two years.

Mr. Spring: Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that we have just had the largest quarterly trade deficit for many years? Is not the turnaround in our current account in two years—a deterioration of £11 billion—a shocking indictment of the Government and their policies?

Mr. Robinson: The hon. Gentleman should be aware that a deficit of 0.75 per cent. of gross domestic product is, historically, a low level. We need no lectures from the Opposition on that level—under their mismanagement of the economy, it rose to 4 per cent. of GDP, which is five times higher than the level that we are forecasting.

Mr. Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central): Are not the economic difficulties that our trading partners in Japan and south-east Asia experiencing bound to have an impact on the British balance of payments? If our reaction to that were to damage trade even further, and if similar actions were taken by our partners in the United States and Europe, would not the result be a downward spiral of economic activity that could affect the whole world, not least the economy of north-east England, which is so heavily dependent on the continuation of that trade?

Mr. Robinson: My hon. Friend is correct. What would most damage trade is the adoption of Opposition policies, particularly on economic and monetary union. Our policies are for long-term stability and steady growth. Manufacturing is forecast to grow—I point out to Conservative Members that these are the CBI's figures—from 1.3 to 2.5 per cent. and exports are forecast to grow from 3.5 to 4.5 per cent., which is healthy growth.

Tax and Mortgage Rate Changes

6. Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds): If he will estimate the financial impact on a family on average earnings of tax and mortgage rate changes since 1 May 1997. [41678]

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Alistair Darling): As a result of the Budgets in July last year and in March, a family with two children on median income of £17,500 will see an increase in their disposable income, excluding housing costs, of about £260 a year from October 1999.

The impact on any family's housing costs would depend not only on interest rates, but on their accommodation, on the size of their mortgage and on other factors.

Mr. Ruffley: When will the Chief Secretary stop fiddling those figures and accept the calculations independently arrived at by the House of Commons Library, which demonstrate that the average family is £1,000 a year worse off after the mortgage and tax rises under this Government?

Mr. Darling: The hon. Gentleman should face the fact that interest rates went up because of the previous Government's failure to take appropriate action when they knew that inflationary pressures were building in the economy. If he looks back over the 18 years of the Government that he supported, he will see that interest rates were in double figures for much of that time and mortgage rates were extremely high—far higher than under this Government.

We are determined to ensure stable economic conditions so that all families can have the long-term prosperity that they want. When the hon. Gentleman criticises us, he should reflect that, for much of the past 18 years, instability and high interest rates led to a record number of repossessions and we did not hear a single word of complaint from him then.

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North): Will my right hon. Friend comment on the EU proposals for the harmonisation of tax rates on income from savings, and the effect that they could have on families in this country, especially those paying lower rates of income tax?

Mr. Darling: I am aware that proposals have been published, but we have no intention of going down that road. For obvious reasons, we certainly would not do anything to disadvantage this country.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks): Does anybody seriously believe that the official family tax burden figures would have been suppressed if they had shown a fall since 1 May last year? Will the Chief Secretary confirm that the poorest households have been the hardest hit by the tax rises so far? Will he now guarantee that, by the next general election, the average family will face no higher a tax burden than they had on 1 May last year—yes or no?

Mr. Darling: The hon. Gentleman is certainly trying to wear new clothes in expressing concern about poor people. He was one of those who fervently espoused the poll tax, which must have hit poor people more than any other measure introduced by the previous Government. I remind him that, as a result of Budget measures introduced by my right hon. Friend, including the working families tax credit, every working family will be guaranteed an income of at least £180 a week, no family earning less than £220 a week—half average earnings—will pay net income tax, and child benefit is being increased from next year by a record amount. We also reduced VAT on fuel, which helped poor people, as it helped everyone else.

All the measures that the Government have introduced have been geared not only to increasing work opportunities, especially for those who are either unemployed or on low incomes, but to ensuring that families, especially those on lower incomes, are helped. Not only did the Conservative Government do nothing about that, but, during their entire period in office, they could not have cared less about the plight of poor people.

Charities

8. Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): What changes he proposes to introduce in taxation policies in relation to charities. [41680]

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Dawn Primarolo): A review of charities taxation was announced in the July 1997 Budget. The contributions to the first phase of the review are currently being analysed and we expect to publish a consultation document in the next few weeks.

Mr. Pike: Does my hon. Friend accept that, at times, charities feel that they are raising money for taxation? The Government's response to the sale of the new version of "Candle in the Wind" and the Princess Di memorial fund showed that that they could respond positively. Does my hon. Friend agree that people want to see the money that they give to charity sales go to the charities and not to the Government?

Dawn Primarolo: As my hon. Friend knows, the Government's decision to donate the VAT paid on the purchase of "Candle in the Wind" to the Princess Diana memorial fund was a unique gesture. However, he should also be aware of how much the Government value the contribution that charities make to our society. More than 3,500 submissions have been made to the review discussing the future tax relationship between charities and the Government, and the Government will ensure that it is a positive relationship, which is recognised in the contributions made.

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): What is the scale of concern in the Inland Revenue about loopholes in charities taxation?

Dawn Primarolo: The purpose of the review was to consider how to simplify the regime, and to provide a fairer and easier relationship between charities and the Government. It is considering both direct and indirect tax. VAT was of particular concern to charities, as were some of the reliefs on the borderline that cause problems and loopholes for others to exploit. Those are all very much part of the discussion, and will be included in the consultation document shortly to be published.

Single Currency

9. Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): If he will make a statement on the constitutional issues raised by possible British entry to a European single currency. [41681]

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mrs. Helen Liddell): Sharing a common monetary policy with other member states represents a pooling of economic sovereignty. so we accept that there are important constitutional considerations. That is why the Government are intent on holding a referendum before Britain joins the single currency.

As the Chancellor pointed out on 27 October last year, the constitutional issue is a factor in the decision, but not an overriding one—rather, it signifies that, for monetary union to be right for Britain, the economic benefits should be clear and unambiguous. If a single currency would be good for British jobs, business and future prosperity, it is right in principle to join. Given the comments of the Leader of the Opposition on Tuesday, it seems that, even if it were right for the British people for us to be part of a single currency, a future Conservative Government would not join it.

Mr. Bercow: Is the Economic Secretary aware of the statement made by the president of the Bundesbank, Hans Tietmeyer, that within a single currency

"it is an illusion to think that states can hold on to their autonomy over taxation policies"?

If that statement is vindicated by events, does the hon. Lady believe that the cession of sovereignty would represent a constitutional bar to Britain's joining such a currency—yes or no?

Mrs. Liddell: The hon. Gentleman—if I may borrow a phrase from the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke)—is getting rather excitable. Many people in different organisations make a variety of statements. Indeed, some Conservative Members have referred to other Conservative Members as dinosaurs who are out of date. The key element relating to fiscal policy is the principle in the treaty of co-ordination among national Governments, not the transfer of responsibilities to the centre. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. Hon. Members should stop these parrot-like cries.

Mr. Tony McNulty (Harrow, East): Does my hon. Friend believe that Britain's preparations for economic and monetary union were helped or hindered by crass and irresponsible speeches that referred to public disorder and civic unrest, or does she agree with the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) that, happily for Britain, such comments are speeches without audiences?

Mrs. Liddell: My hon. Friend make a valid point. It is notable that some Conservative Members have referred to the intemperate remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition. Ironically, the confident attack on the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), as being unwilling to listen and hopelessly out of touch, came from a party which currently enjoys only 28 per cent. support in the opinion polls.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): I am sure that the House is grateful to the Economic Secretary for verifying the fact that there is, indeed, an important constitutional element to the question whether we should join the European single currency. Will she ensure that the Chancellor of the Exchequer includes that statement in any further comments that he may make on the matter, and that he does not continue to confine his criteria to economics?

Mrs. Liddell: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman was off choosing a new tie on 27 October, when my right hon. Friend the Chancellor made it clear in his statement to the House that, although he recognised the constitutional issue, he did not regard it as an overriding objection to our joining a single currency.

Tax Rates

10. Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney): If he will assess the advantages of introducing lower taxation rates for those on lower incomes. [41682]

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Dawn Primarolo): The introduction of lower tax rates will make those on lower incomes better off. The working families tax credit, together with the introduction—when it is economically right—of the 10p tax rate, will help those on lower incomes by allowing them to keep more of what they earn.

Mr. Blizzard: Does my hon. Friend share my view that one of the most depressing features of our society is that some unemployed people with families want to work, but cannot afford to, because they would take home less than they receive on benefits? That is depressing not only for those people, but for the people who foot the benefits bill. Does she agree that the combination of the 10p tax rate, the new working families tax credit, changes to national insurance contributions and a national minimum wage will tackle the iniquitous poverty trap that was devised by the previous Government, and redress the situation whereby those on the lowest incomes pay a higher marginal rate of tax than those on the highest incomes?

Dawn Primarolo: My hon. Friend is right. To the list of excellent policies that he identified, I would add the increase in child benefit, which is particularly helpful to families. As he knows, we inherited from the previous Government a situation whereby more than 500,000 families paid tax to the Inland Revenue while receiving family credit. The Labour Government's policy of reforming tax and benefits, as part of our welfare reform programme, is designed to ensure that people keep more of what they earn, have the chance to be lifted out of the poverty trap and can participate in the world of work on a decent wage.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York): Is the Financial Secretary aware that she has the right to apply for a discretion under European law to levy reduced VAT rates on labour-intensive industries? That could be used to reduce VAT on repair and restoration work on churches and other historic buildings. Why has she decided not to apply for and exercise that discretion? Perhaps she can also explain why she does not sign her letters to parliamentary colleagues.

Dawn Primarolo: That is the first pro-European comment that we have heard from a Conservative Member, even if the assertion is incorrect. The Government are not pursuing the reduced rate on VAT, which was presented to Governments as an option to assist employment, because we believe that our welfare-to-work programme, the new deal, working families tax credit and the reforms that we are undertaking are the positive route to creating more jobs.

The hon. Lady does get her letters answered. Ministers give replies in exactly the way that Conservative Members did when they were in government. Perhaps she should concentrate a little more on dealing with those who are unemployed and welcome the Government's new deal, instead of making silly points on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire): To return to the original question, might not lower taxes for those on lower incomes be assisted by higher taxes for those on higher incomes, in extra national insurance contributions if not in income tax? That may be felt to be a problem because of electoral pledges on income tax, but it is possible for Governments to be persuaded to change their position in line with public opinion, and it might be time for a "can pay, want to pay" campaign.

Dawn Primarolo: We must have fair taxes, and the high marginal rates on those on lower incomes that we inherited from the previous Government need to be tackled, to ensure that people make a contribution to public services through their taxes on a fair basis.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham): Does the Financial Secretary accept that the combined effect of the tax changes of the past two Budgets has been to make the tax system as a whole more rather than less regressive? If she disputes that proposition, will she agree to publish promptly the Treasury statistical series, which has been discontinued, and which enabled us to see the combined effect of direct and indirect tax burdens?

Dawn Primarolo: I do not accept that proposition. The Government cut VAT on fuel, raised child benefit, introduced a windfall tax to help the unemployed and are introducing working families tax credit, with an element to assist child care. All those measures are helping precisely the households to which the question refers.

Capital Gains Tax

11. Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): What representations he has received on the impact of his proposals for ending retirement relief from capital gains tax. [41683]

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Dawn Primarolo): Treasury Ministers have received 40 such representations, most of which ask for retirement relief to be retained or to be phased out over a longer period. Many business people have warmly welcomed the introduction of the new business assets taper relief, which takes over from retirement relief.

Mr. Swayne: Will the Financial Secretary confirm that the measure is regressive and amounts to a significant redistribution of income from the modestly-off to the wealthy, and that its effects are harshest on small business people who live above the shop and are approaching retirement—precisely the sort of people for whom Labour used to care? What will she do for those people, particularly in respect of the retrospective aspects of the tax?

Dawn Primarolo: I do not accept what the hon. Gentleman said. What a surprise! Taper relief is fairer. It will encourage long-term investment and reward entrepreneur investment. That is the Government's intention.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): Will the Financial Secretary confirm what is in her Finance Bill—that the capital gains tax system announced in the Budget is more generous to those selling very large business assets after 10 years, and less generous to entrepreneurs who sell their small businesses because of the loss of retirement relief? It is a fat cat charter in line with the Labour party's new priorities. It is in the Bill now, but will she confirm our suspicion that a U-turn is in prospect? As the Finance Bill unravels in Standing Committee, the capital gains tax system is being shown to be unworkable, impractical and perverse. Will she confirm that this generosity to fat cats at the expense of small entrepreneurs is wrong and will be reversed?

Dawn Primarolo: What is perverse is that Conservative Members welcomed the announcement of capital gains tax reform in the Budget and now seek to reinterpret their words. The reform encourages long-term investment and rewards entrepreneurs, something which the right hon. Gentleman's Government failed to do in office and which this Government intend to deliver.

Household Incomes (Statistics)

12. Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): If he will review the quality of statistics relating to household incomes available in regions of low population density; and if he will make a statement. [41684]

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mrs. Helen Liddell): The Government statistical service collects a wide range of statistics on household incomes, which are regularly kept under review.

Mr. Kirkwood: Will the Economic Secretary consider the difficulty of getting robust statistical data for constituencies such as mine in south-east Scotland? Sampling errors are significant in less populous areas. She follows these things carefully, so she will know that textiles, electronics and farming are all in decline in south-east Scotland. It is difficult to get a focus on what is happening because expenditure survey results are published only on a Scotland-wide basis. Some sub-regional statistics are susceptible to sampling errors. With the Office for National Statistics, will she consider doing finely targeted statistical surveys, even down to travel-to-work areas, so that policymakers trying to respond to the difficulties can be better informed?

Mrs. Liddell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that question. In recognition of the need for better statistical data to support the Scottish Parliament, plans have been announced for a new Scottish household survey. It will be designed to provide a range of information on households in Scotland, including information on their incomes. Over two years, it will give estimates for each local authority area in Scotland. That may meet his point.

Sir Michael Spicer (West Worcestershire): If there is to be a review of sparsity data, will the hon. Lady ensure that there is fairness between England and Scotland? Will she take into account the fact that on most items of public spending, almost twice as much is spent per capita in Scotland as in England?

Mrs. Liddell: The job of the Office for National Statistics is to ensure that valid statistics of high integrity are available for policymakers and others to reach decisions. As part of that, the ONS has recently published a Green Paper to ensure the integrity of the statistical service in response to our manifesto commitment during the general election. The hon. Gentleman may want to argue about the various levels of expenditure throughout the United Kingdom, but those levels are based on need.

Comprehensive Spending Review

13. Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): What plans he has to ensure that there can be parliamentary scrutiny of his comprehensive spending review before the final results are published. [41685]

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Alistair Darling): The results of the comprehensive spending review will be announced to Parliament for scrutiny and examination in the normal way. It will be for the usual channels to discuss the way in which the House debates those proposals at some point after the initial statement.

Mr. Robathan: The hon. Member for North-East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) has suggested that pledges are not necessarily binding. Does the Chief Secretary recall his right hon. Friend the Chancellor making a pledge when in opposition that he had no spending plans that would require extra taxation? Yet since the election, there have been at least 17 tax rises based, presumably, on spending, so that is one broken pledge. After the comprehensive spending review is revealed, how many new tax rises will there be?

Mr. Darling: The hon. Gentleman will have to wait and see what the Government propose after their spending review. I remind him that, unlike the previous Government, every promise that we made at the election has been kept and will be delivered on by the end of this Parliament. That is something which the Opposition could never claim because they misled people on tax and just about everything else, which is why they are sitting on the Opposition Benches in such reduced numbers.

Mr. Christopher Leslie (Shipley): Will my right hon. Friend consider making Treasury economists available to the Opposition so that they can conduct their own comprehensive spending review? He may well have noticed that during the past month alone, amendments have been tabled to the Finance Bill and the Social Security Bill totalling more than £6 billion—a massive hole in public finances. Perhaps the Conservatives have been infected by the financial recklessness of their Liberal Democrat colleagues on the Opposition Benches.

Mr. Darling: I am not sure that it is just economic advice that the Conservative party is in need of. It is perfectly obvious that the Opposition—at least, the main Opposition party at present—are increasingly giving up any prospects for the future. Not only have they adopted a policy on Europe that many people, in particular business people, find absolutely incredible, but they have already demonstrated that they would be prepared to spend huge sums without giving us any indication about how they might finance that spending. Their antics and their policies are becoming more incredible by the day.

Mr. John Swinney (North Tayside): When the Chief Secretary contributes to the usual channels' discussion of how the comprehensive spending review is to be considered by Parliament, will he support an initiative to give the departmental Select Committees the opportunity to look in detail at the Government's proposals, to ensure that any potential damage to existing public services from the review is aired in the full light of day before Parliament, through scrutiny in those Committees?

Mr. Darling: Select Committees are entirely independent of the Government, and it is up to them what they scrutinise and when. As always, the Government are happy to co-operate with anything that they want to do. I am not part of the usual channels, as the hon. Gentleman knows, but I am sure that his representative in that department will ensure that whatever the Committees want to do to ensure that our spending plans and policy proposals are properly scrutinised is taken on board. The Government are moving towards the concluding stages of the review and, because we are determined to deliver our manifesto promises, we are happy to justify those promises to anyone, inside or outside this House, whenever they want.

Pensioners' Fuel Bills

14. Mr. Vernon Coaker (Gedling): What representations he has received on his tax and benefit changes to reduce pensioners' fuel bills. [41687]

The Paymaster General (Mr. Geoffrey Robinson): My hon. Friend will be interested to know that we have received 1,000 representations on pensioners' winter fuel bills. He will be aware that there has been widespread acceptance and endorsement of the measures that we have taken on that matter, which include the abolition of the gas levy, the reduction in value added tax to 5 per cent. for energy-saving materials and the reductions in other areas. Taken together with the £20 and £50 announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor for winter fuel bills last winter, that means that pensioners will be better off on their winter fuel bills alone by between £100 and £130.

Mr. Coaker: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer and congratulate the Government on their measures so far to help pensioners with their fuel bills, in marked contrast to the policies of the previous Government. However, does he agree that it is important not only to help pensioners pay their bills, but to ensure that those bills are as small as possible in the first place? We need the Government to do as much as possible to keep those bills small through various measures. Will he join me in congratulating my authority, Gedling borough council, which recently launched a wide range of energy-saving initiatives to help pensioners in particular to stay in their own homes and keep their fuel bills low?

Mr. Robinson: My hon. Friend is absolutely right on both counts. I would add that local authorities throughout the country are taking up the opportunity offered by the reduction in VAT on energy-saving materials to do precisely what he said; I compliment Gedling local authority on doing so.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton): What is the Government's latest estimate of the cost of the tens of thousands of £10 and £20 cheques sent out in error, which will not be refunded to the Treasury?

Mr. Robinson: The hon. Gentleman is trying to zero in on a narrow and irrelevant point—he should consider that there were 6 million communications, of which a small proportion fell into that category. Why does he not think of the 6 million pensioners who got the benefit, instead of trying to narrow in on a small and incidental administrative point?

Bank of England Reserve Requirements

15. Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): What plans his Department has to extend the use of Bank of England reserve requirements as an instrument of monetary policy. [41688]

The Paymaster General (Mr. Geoffrey Robinson): None.

Mr. St. Aubyn: The rate of inflation last May was 2.5 per cent., which was exactly in line with the previous Government's target; the rate of inflation today is 4 per cent., which is 1.5 percentage points above this Government's target. Do Treasury Ministers accept that it is their failure of fiscal policy, in particular increasing taxes twice in one year, which has caused the increase in inflation? Will they, instead of asking the Bank of England to write to them explaining the failure of monetary policy, write a letter to the Bank to explain their deeply flawed judgment on fiscal policy?

Mr. Robinson: None of that arises from the question, but I am quite happy to reply to the hon. Gentleman. We need no lectures from the Conservative party, whose Government saw inflation rise to 21 per cent. in 1980. Inflation will come down as our long-term policies for stability and growth prove to be correct, and we avoid the boom-and-bust economic policies that the previous Government went in for. We go for long-term policies because there is no quick fix. For the hon. Gentleman's information, the Bank of England has expressly ruled out using the reserve ratios as an instrument of monetary policy; it did so last August, as recorded in the report of that date at paragraph 63.

ROYAL ASSENT

Madam Speaker: I have to notify the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act, 1967, that the Queen has signified Her Royal Assent to the following Acts:

Animal Health (Amendment) Act 1998
Social Security Act 1998
Magistrates' Courts (Procedure) Act 1998
Tax Credits (Initial Expenditure) Act 1998

Fairness at Work

3.31 pm

The President of the Board of Trade and Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mrs. Margaret Beckett): The Government have published today the White Paper "Fairness at Work", which is a further landmark in our drive to create both a more prosperous and a fairer Britain.

Let no one doubt that, in the modern world, those two ambitions go hand in hand. Companies and organisations that succeed in today's and tomorrow's world need to address and to anticipate the needs of their customers. To do so, they must draw out, and draw on, the native ingenuity, the innovative ability and the creativity of every one of their work force. The prosperity and opportunity of each are bound up with the prosperity and opportunity of all.

Some of the issues that we address in the White Paper relate simply to human dignity and enshrine simple individual rights. To assure them is simple justice, but it is also good hard economic and industrial sense.

Our industrial policy rests on the three pillars of strong markets, underpinned by our Competition Bill, modern companies, promoted by the White Paper, and building an enterprising nation, which requires those steps among others.

The White Paper is set in the context of action that the Government have already taken to create a fresh balance of rights and responsibilities at work, including signing the social chapter, bringing in, for the first time, a national minimum wage, implementing the working time directive, simplifying procedures for check-off and restoring trade union membership rights at GCHQ. Those were all necessary steps, but they are not sufficient to create a new and better balance in the fast-changing world of work.

The White Paper looks to the future, not the past. There will be no going back to the days of strikes without ballots, mass picketing and the closed shop. We are setting out to foster and support a new culture in the workplace—a culture of partnership. That culture is already evident in many of our most successful and modern companies, but the framework of our existing law all too often undermines or runs clean counter to it.

We expect and anticipate that many of the matters that we address, where differences of interest or of emphasis may genuinely arise, will be settled voluntarily and without recourse to the law, but, if required, the law must be able practically and sensibly to provide peaceful means to resolve disputes if they arise.

The proposals we make fall broadly into three areas: rights for the individual, collective rights and the development of policies that are family friendly. We also propose further consultation on many issues relevant to changing patterns of work. Those changing patterns can underpin flexibility and competitiveness, but they are undermined by a lack either of security or of confidence. So, in a world of far more frequent job changes, employees who have qualified for protection are reluctant to lose it by changing jobs.

Therefore, we propose, first, to reduce the qualifying time for protection against unfair dismissal from two years to one. We also propose to remove the limit on compensation for unfair dismissal, so that people who are unfairly dismissed can recover their full loss. That will end the anomaly whereby there is no limit on compensation for those unfairly dismissed on grounds of sex or race, but those dismissed for other reasons can at present be awarded only a maximum of £12,000. We also intend to index link other statutory employment awards and payments in future.

We propose, too, to consult business and others on whether—and, if so, what—changes are needed to the law on short-term and zero-hours contracts. Contract work can provide useful flexibility to both employers and employees, and the Government would not wish to lose that flexibility, but poor employment practices discredit such arrangements and deter people from taking advantage of the flexibilities offered by contract work in other organisations.

Secondly, we also need to establish a framework that promotes constructive dialogue between employers and employees. That will include implementing the European works council directive on consultation arrangements at work by the end of next year. In many cases, such dialogue is best established by collective arrangements, which are often the preferred option of both employers and employees. In other cases, more informal consultative arrangements can be suitable.

I shall not attempt in this short statement to detail all the changes we propose, but central to the White Paper is the promise in our manifesto to legislate to enable employees to have a trade union recognised by their employer where the majority of the work force want it. The Confederation of British Industry and the Trades Union Congress have worked together, and with the Government, to create as much common ground as possible on the practical issues surrounding such legislation.

The Government believe that mutually agreed arrangements for representation are the best way to proceed; but there are occasions when employees want to be represented by a trade union, but their employer will not agree. The Government believe that better and more effective relationships at work are fostered by having a clear procedure for the resolution of such disagreements, which is itself based on the starting point of voluntary agreement.

The Government propose that the law should require employers to recognise a union where the majority of those voting, and at least 40 per cent. of the eligible work force, are in favour of recognition. That will make it crystal clear that a vote for recognition enjoys genuine and widespread support among employees, and provides a sustainable basis for collective bargaining.

If there are issues on which the parties cannot agree, a restructured and reinforced Central Arbitration Committee will play a supervisory role—judging, for instance, whether the union has proposed a suitable bargaining unit, whether it has reasonable support within it, and whether a sufficient majority of employees support recognition.

When more than 50 per cent. of employees are union members, thus clearly demonstrating that they want to be represented by a union for collective bargaining, recognition will be automatic. There will be a similar procedure for derecognition, and the Government invite views on its operation. No new applications for recognition or derecognition will be considered until three years after a previous application.

The Government recognise that these arrangements may not suit the circumstances of small firms. The statutory procedures will not therefore apply to firms with 20 or fewer employees, although many small firms will no doubt recognise unions, as they do now.

Let me reiterate one vital point. The legal framework that we have proposed will come into play only when employers and employees cannot reach agreement on recognition; but, by ensuring that a clear procedure is in place and known from the outset of discussions, we believe that voluntary agreement is more likely to be achieved and industrial action to be avoided. Neither employers nor employees gain from the present arrangements, and the protracted disagreements that can occur only damage future relationships, whether a union is recognised or not.

The Government intend to take other collective measures—for instance, giving employees greater rights to complain of unfair dismissal if they are dismissed while on official strike, and a right for anyone to be accompanied by someone of their choice, who may be a trade union official, at grievance or disciplinary procedures.

Thirdly, we must recognise the special responsibilities of parents. We place great demands on them. Most need to work to give their children a secure life, but children need their parents' time, too, if family life and society are to be cohesive. The White Paper sets out policies that will enhance family life while making it easier for both men and women who work to avoid conflicts between their responsibilities at home and at work.

The Government will, for example, ensure that employees can take parental leave and reasonable time off for family emergencies, and will clarify the law on maternity rights, extending maternity leave to 18 weeks to match maternity pay, and provide new rights for adoptive parents. A number of those measures will flow from our implementing the European directive on parental rights, giving employees in Britain the same rights as their counterparts in the rest of Europe.

The White Paper sets out a broad agenda for legislative reform. The Government intend to proceed to implement these changes—in some cases after further consultation—at the earliest opportunity. The White Paper sets out the principles that the Government will follow in reforming employment law. It provides a comprehensive package of constructive change. It will take time to implement, and will undoubtedly require time and stability to settle into place. The Government regard the White Paper as a settlement for this full Parliament and do not propose further legislative changes in this area.

The White Paper will support the strong and evolving partnerships at work—partnerships that are needed to give British enterprise and the British economy a clear competitive edge. That edge comes from fulfilling the potential of our people and our country, and it is the only basis on which we can deliver prosperity and justice to all.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham): Once again, all the main measures in a Government White Paper were given to the press long before they were given to the House. Everyone knew what would be in the statement before the Secretary of State rose to her feet. I hope that she will explain how that happened, and why the press knew the detail—the exact detail—of what was in the White Paper.

The White Paper is a down payment on the bill the country will pay for trade union support of the Labour party. The unions gave more than £100 million to the Labour party during its Opposition years. Understandably, they now seek a return on their investment.

The right hon. Lady says that the White Paper is a final settlement for this Parliament, but the document makes it clear that even the crucial 40 per cent. threshold for ballots is subject to review. Will she tell us which of the following is true: will she give hope to Labour Members who do not think that the White Paper goes nearly far enough in helping the union cause, or will she tack back towards the Prime Minister and a little more towards industry by reassuring us that there will be no further significant changes after these measures have been put to the House?

I am sure that some Ministers will be grateful for the provisions on unfair dismissal. Many of them, facing dismissal in a few weeks—I am glad to see that one or two Ministers are laughing—will be pleased to find that they no longer have to serve two years before qualifying; there is some good news for them in the White Paper.

However, there is no good news in the measure for manufacturing industry. The last thing that manufacturing industry needs, as it grapples with the recession that this Government have created, is more costly regulation. The last thing that manufacturers need is more Government intervention to damage labour relations. The last thing that they need is the cost of a ballot on statutory recognition, half-charged to themselves.

The Institute of Directors commented today:

"The idea that we have a business-friendly Government is rapidly going sour."

Meanwhile, Mr. Morris of the Transport and General Workers Union has threatened:

"You cannot compromise on fundamental principles."

No amount of platitudes from the President of the Board of Trade can bridge that divide.

Why did the Government not let sleeping laws lie? Why have they not protected the fine inheritance of good labour relations—the best in western Europe—that we gave to them when we left office? It has taken Labour only one short year to set unions against business, and business against unions. The Government's very idea of partnership is phoney. They are not leaving the partners to come to voluntary agreements through free negotiation. They are forcing both sides to accept a deal that neither likes. That is not a partnership. It cannot bring peace and stability in the workplace.

The Opposition support freedom, choice and fairness for employees in the workplace. We will judge the detail of the proposals by their impact on good labour relations and the creation of more jobs. Our fear is that they will damage both.

Will the President of the Board of Trade tell us today what will be the total cost of these measures to business? How many jobs will be lost? Does she know that business organisations are already predicting job losses on the back of these measures and those of the Chancellor of the Exchequer? Why cannot more small firms be exempted from what will prove to be very onerous provisions?

The proposals begin a journey back to strife. They begin a journey back to the bad old days and back to the bad old ways. They will do further damage to manufacturing, which is already damaged by high sterling and the recession that the Government have created. They demonstrate, if more demonstration were needed, that Labour is bad for business.

Mrs. Beckett: Not for the first time, I suppose that we could not expect the right hon. Gentleman to confuse himself or his colleagues with the facts. He demanded that I explain why there had been speculation in the press about some aspects of the package. No such speculation was in any way fostered or contributed to by myself or my right hon. and hon. Friends. The press will inevitably make guesses, but the right hon. Gentleman will recognise that there is much in the White Paper that the press did not foreshadow or get right. Indeed, if I recall correctly, the right hon. Gentleman himself demanded at the last DTI Question Time that I anticipate the White Paper by saying what was in it, so he does not have much right to complain about that.

The right hon. Gentleman asked me to give an assurance that when I say that the White Paper is the full settlement for this Parliament, that does not include the prospect of review. I made it plain in the statement, as the White Paper makes it plain, that it sets out clear principles, but we have also made clear our determination that legislation should be workable and practical. If it becomes apparent over time that elements of the legislation are impeding the resolution of disputes, the Government will be prepared to look again at those elements.

The right hon. Gentleman said that the Conservative party stands for freedom and choice, but it is clear from what he said that even if 100 per cent. of employees in a workplace wished to be represented by a trade union and to have that trade union recognised, he would not support them. I do not call that supporting freedom and choice.

The conflict that the right hon. Gentleman foreshadowed in such apocalyptic terms is all too plainly just what he and his colleagues would like to see. Of course, as in so many other things, they are out of date and out of touch. The new culture in the workplace is a culture of constructive partnership, because employees and employers recognise that their interests demand that they work together. The Government's goal is to make the best practice in the best companies normal practice throughout the economy. That is what the White Paper sets out to do.

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Ochil): I thank the President for her statement and congratulate her on introducing the 50 per cent. plus one automatic recognition rule. It will mean that a number of trade unionists across the country will immediately get the recognition to which they are entitled.

However, some of us are a little worried about 40 per cent. rules being applied anywhere. We have experience of that in Scotland, and we have had troubles as a consequence. We are heartened by the fact that the President has said that she is prepared to look at the operation of the 40 per cent. rule. Will she confirm when such a review will be put in place following the passage of legislation? Some hon. Members might be prepared to give a fair wind to the 40 per cent. rule on the basis that there would be a review at an early date. Will the President help us in that regard?

Mrs. Beckett: I thank my hon. Friend for his kind words. He asks me to look some distance into the future. We are today at the White Paper stage. The legislation is not yet before the House, but my hon. Friend asks me to suggest when the Government might be prepared to review and, if there are problems, change it.

The Government are determined to introduce a framework of law in case disputes require to be taken to law—we hope and believe that that will be a rare occurrence. My hon. Friend will see that the White Paper's procedures for enforcing recognition, if a majority want it, always take us back to the voluntary agreement. Voluntary agreements are the whole thrust of the White Paper. However, if it becomes apparent—after some time and experience—that there is an impediment in some of the proceedings in the White Paper, we shall re-examine the matter. I fear that I cannot give my hon. Friend a clearer idea of the time scale.

Mr. David Chidgey (Eastleigh): Liberal Democrat Members broadly welcome the President's proposals—particularly the fact that the emphasis is placed on looking forward rather than back to the past. She will know that the Liberal Democrats have long argued the case for treating the workplace as part of a stakeholder society.

Does the President agree that, in the context of developing her proposals for legislation, it is vital that all parties—the suppliers, manufacturers, customers, investors, employees and the local communities where the businesses are located—are persuaded to take ownership of the legislation?

I press the President a little further about individual rights, which are featured in her statement. Does she recognise the paramountcy of the individual in the proposals and their right to join or not to join a trade union? How will her proposals deal with the huge increase in the flexibility of labour, which is now a fact in our working society, with more and more workers finding that the key to their employability is their individual transportable intellectual skills? That is their property, which they take with them. How will her proposals marry those individual characteristics with modernising the traditional collective representation approach which has pervaded for so many years?

While I agree with the President that most claims for union recognition and collective representation are settled amicably—we should be pleased about that—does she agree that when recourse to law is required, that law must first establish a procedure that is not rigged or cumbersome, which, in itself, could only exacerbate a dispute?

Finally—[Interruption.] In response to the President's statement—which I think deserves a proper response—does she accept that, while we broadly welcome her proposals, which provide a platform for developing a package of measures that recognise the need for a more forward-looking approach to new partnerships with all stakeholders in the workplace, it is now important to discuss and scrutinise those proposals in order to develop legislation that actually works?

Mrs. Beckett: I shall pick up first the last point made by the hon. Gentleman. He is entirely right, and that is absolutely the Government's wish. When he studies the White Paper at length, he will see that we refer throughout to our wish to consult and to take advice, especially on the specific detail of how the legislation will be implemented. It has long seemed to me that a major problem into which the Conservative party got itself in government was that it ceased, over a long period, to listen to the views of those outside the Government. We do not intend to repeat that mistake, especially in the legislation.

The hon. Gentleman asked how we could develop the partnership at work and make it responsive in different circumstances. A Government proposal that I did not flag up in the statement is that we shall make funds available to contribute to the training of managers and employee representatives, precisely to assist and develop partnerships at work.

The hon. Gentleman also asked whether it is clear in the White Paper that the Government recognise the rights of individuals to join or not to join a trade union. Of course we do, and we make that explicit. A difficulty in constructing the White Paper was achieving the balance of the sections on individual and collective rights, because some rights that come under the broad heading of collective rights are rights for individuals. We very much recognise the role of the individual and of an individual's skills.

The hon. Gentleman made a point about procedures not being cumbersome. We have sought to avoid that and have put in place clear time limits on procedures so that they cannot be dragged out unduly, to everyone's disadvantage. I repeat that the thrust of the White Paper is to drive back towards voluntary agreement, at every step.

Ms Ruth Kelly (Bolton, West): May I warmly welcome the solid family-friendly policies in the White Paper, especially the three-month parental leave, for men and for women, whether they have a child or whether they choose to adopt a baby? I also welcome the protection from unfair dismissal, should people choose to exercise that right.

Is my right hon. Friend aware that, at the latest count, more than 14,000 women were on maternity leave in the north-west of England? Will she join me in asking the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) whether he is prepared to tell any of those women whether that new right would be repealed under a Tory Government?

Mrs. Beckett: My hon. Friend is entirely right. The right hon. Member for Wokingham and his colleagues are clearly opposed to many of the measures in the White Paper; what is not clear is whether they would abolish the right to parental leave and whether they would go back on the reduction of the qualification period for unfair dismissal. It is far from clear to what extent the Conservative party would drive back the agreements that we propose to enshrine in law, but, as the right hon. Gentleman identified any change as being disadvantageous, my hon. Friend is entirely right to fear for our proposals, should the Conservative party be returned to power.

Mr. Tom King (Bridgwater): Does the right hon. Lady recognise that I particularly appreciate her statement that there will be no going back to the days of strikes without ballot, mass picketing and the closed shop? Does she recall the particular pleasure that I had of taking through the legislation that gave people the right to ballots before strikes? I have a good enough memory to remember that she and a considerable number of Labour Members voted strongly against it. May I say how pleased I am that there is to be no going back on that, and ask her whether she can give a clear assurance that recognition ballots will at all times be postal?

Mrs. Beckett: No. It would be possible for such a ballot to be conducted on the basis of a ballot at the place of work, if that is what is sought. [Interruption.] If there is a feeling that that would not be desirable and that there would be, for one reason or another, a desire for a postal ballot—obviously, all ballots would be secret—that, too, could be assured. We have allowed for either a workplace or a postal ballot, depending on choice and what is thought to be right.

Mr. King indicated dissent.

Mrs. Beckett: The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but that brings me to my second point to him. He was careful to say that he welcomes our recognition that some of the changes in law that he made do not require to be changed in future. I hope that he will give us the assurance that he recognises that the pattern of change that the Government propose is right for today's and tomorrow's workplace and that he will support it.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the nature of the trade union laws passed by the previous Government is such that it has resulted in, for example, the National Union of Mineworkers not only not being recognised by private owners but not being able, in the industrial climate in many workplaces where the bosses rule, to have a basic pay increase throughout the 1990s? The right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) is totally out of touch with the present climate of opinion in which people recognise that those who work and provide the country's wealth have a right to proper trade union recognition.

Two or three areas in the White Paper are a bit dodgy, to say the least. First, we think that the 40 per cent. should not have been applied. If it had been applied in the referendum on a mayor for London it would not have passed the test. Secondly, the limit of 20 employees will mean that about 5 million workers will not be included in the measures. The measures on unfair dismissal should have taken us back to the pre-1979 position or to day one from work.

Mrs. Beckett: I hear what my hon. Friend says. He has a long history of fighting on behalf of workers who face difficulties and, sometimes, exploitative and unfair employers. The 40 per cent. is a balanced judgment. There was certainly mutual agreement between the Confederation of British Industry and the Trades Union Congress that it would not be right for recognition to be granted unless there was a serious body of support in the workplace for it—unless there was, in the phrase that is enshrined in industrial relations law and which has been practised for some time "sustainable support" for collective bargaining in the place of work.

[Mrs. Beckett]

It is generally and widely accepted that collective bargaining requires to be sustained by considerable support, and it becomes a matter of balancing that judgment. It seemed to the Government that the balance should be 40 per cent. One of the features of the Government's proposal on that judgment is that it is in everyone's interest to maximise turnout and the vote in the ballot. If an employer does not wish a union to be recognised it is in his interests to get as many employees as possible to vote. Similarly, it is in the interests of the trade union to get as many employees as possible to vote if it wishes for recognition. That seems to be the right balance. We are encouraging a genuine and as large as possible turnout of people expressing their view and that, after all, is the issue on which the legislation will be based. [Interruption.] I am reminded of the point that my hon. Friend made about small firms. Current employment legislation contains a criterion for small firms to be excluded on the ground that such legislation might have a particular impact on them. The definition has been set at the level of 20 employees or fewer, and it has been repeated in the legislation.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham): Does the right hon. Lady accept that one of the most important reasons for the improvement in our industrial relations during the 1980s and 1990s was the decline in the number, influence and power of trade unions? Anything that reverses that is a step back to the anarchy and strife of the 1970s. Does she further accept that her proposals are a serious infringement of the rights of employees who do not want union recognition in their businesses? Is that not an example of the rights of individuals being set aside at the behest of the right hon. Lady's paymasters?

Mrs. Beckett: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is a prominent member of one of the few remaining closed shops—not, I hasten to add, that I am in any way attacking lawyers—and benefits from a protection that he wishes to deny others. As for all the other rubbish that he came out with, being in government for too long has made him completely out of touch with the modern workplace.

In today's workplace, people fear not the overweening power of trade unions, but having no rights, no security and no confidence either that they can be sustained fairly in their place of work, or that they can find fresh employment, should they be unfortunate enough, for whatever reason, to lose their job. Those are the concerns which, in a variety of arenas, and including the White Paper, the Government are endeavouring to address.

As for all that stuff about how people will have things forced on them that they do not want, it will be a matter of choice. The right hon. and learned Gentleman and his hon. Friends are saying that even if 100 per cent. of employees in a place of work wish their trade union to be recognised, they would deny it to them. That is not freedom of choice.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): May I tempt the right hon. Lady away from the 40 per cent. rule and towards what I believe are her own natural instincts? For 20 years, I have watched Scottish politics being poisoned as a result of a fundamentally undemocratic 40 per cent. rule, where those who did not vote were deemed to have voted in, or supported, one direction. It would give employers an incentive not to get people out to vote, but to let people stay at home. The Government did not ask for it in Scotland last year, they would not have dreamed of asking for it in Northern Ireland and they allowed a mayor of London to be created on 25 per cent. of the total electorate. How can it be that some of the largest, most progressive and successful companies in Scotland have made it clear that they would be happy with the principle of "One vote is enough in a democracy," but the Government have kowtowed to a few last ditchers in the CBI?

Mrs. Beckett: I know that there are many large and successful companies throughout the United Kingdom that believe that it is right and in their interests, as well as in those of their employees, to recognise trade unions. There is nothing to prevent them from doing so; indeed, this legislation encourages and supports them in that wish. The hon. Gentleman is simply mistaken in saying that this legislation contains incentives for people not to vote. That is not true.

The Government are clear, as are both the CBI and the TUC, what people want. I emphasise again that if it is not possible for voluntary agreement to be reached and if people are forced to fall back on the law—although we believe that, in the vast bulk of cases, they will not be—there will be every incentive for all the people involved to create the maximum interest in the ballot and to get the maximum expression of opinion among the work force. If that expression of opinion does result in a majority, with 40 per cent. of those who vote in that ballot being in favour, recognition will undoubtedly be secured. That is an important change.

It is crystal clear that we would not have got anything in this package from the Conservative party. Frankly, we would not have got it from the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) either, as he would never be in a position to deliver it.

Mr. Derek Foster (Bishop Auckland): Is my right hon. Friend aware that we had only to listen to the litany of out-of-date, out-of-touch attitudes from the Conservative party to be reminded of what the voters rescued us from on 1 May last year? Nevertheless, she will be aware of the widespread unease among trade unionists that the formula for recognition seems to be markedly different from what we believed the manifesto said. Even so, the White Paper represents a major step forward in enhancing fairness at work. What is required now is an enthusiastic response from the business community in pursuing partnership to deal with the productivity gap that the Government have identified.

Mrs. Beckett: My right hon. Friend is entirely right. The Government are seeking to foster such constructive partnership. In fact, one of the reasons for strongly promoting an atmosphere of voluntary partnership is precisely that it is the only way to secure productivity improvement. Indeed, it is the only way to secure economic prosperity.

On my right hon. Friend's first point, I can only repeat that the matter remains one of balance and judgment. I believe that no one thinks that a very small minority of people in a place of work voting in a ballot for recognition means that collective bargaining in that place of work could be sustained. Owing to his long experience and expertise in these matters, my right hon. Friend will know that, when informal procedures operated in this area, there was a general broad judgment of custom and practice on the level of involvement in the union required to sustain collective bargaining. The Government are giving that statutory recognition.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Hull, North): Is my right hon. Friend aware that much in the White Paper will be welcomed by the vast majority of people? It contains many great advances in family-friendly policy and other matters, but, as Mr. Eric Heffer, the former Member for Liverpool, Walton, once said over a document called "In Place of Strife", it is a barrel of honey spoilt by a ha'porth of tar.

This ha'porth of tar comprises two things. First, if 39 per cent. of employees in a firm of 100 employees vote for recognition, two vote against and the rest do not vote, there would be no recognition.

Secondly, my right hon. Friend spoke about simple justice and human dignity, but if one works in a firm of 21 people, the union is recognised, whereas if one works in a firm of 19, the union is not. My right hon. Friend has striven very hard, but even her figure of 40 per cent. does not meet the 33.33 per cent. that ACAS and others recognised in the past—and that was too high.

Mrs. Beckett: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for some of his supportive words. All I can say to him is that, of course, whatever the threshold or the ballot result, a result will not be reached when a firm comes in at one below or two below. That would apply whatever the test or the nature of the test. The matter is one of balance and of judgment. In the overall framework of the package that the Government have proposed and in considering how such issues will be decided, we have tried to set the balance where we think it is right, workable and demonstrates serious and substantial support for collective bargaining.

The level of 20 employees has been enshrined in legislation as a point at which there is a difference in the structure of the workplace and the ease with which these matters can be decided. However, if some dispute or difficulty should arise in workplaces with fewer than 20 employees, particularly if a person is a trade union member—this is partly what I meant when I said to the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey) that, although some of the provisions are in the context of collective rights, they are rights for the individual—that individual trade union member will have the right to be accompanied by a trade union official should he or she wish to be so. I know that, from his experience, my hon. Friend recognises how important that is—perhaps far more than the threshold for very many employees of small companies.

Sir David Madel (South-West Bedfordshire): In its 23 years of existence, the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service—ACAS—has made an enormous contribution to the improvement of industrial relations. Was it pressing for any or all of the reforms in the White Paper? Will the White Paper encourage more single-union recognition agreements in manufacturing industry, since such agreements have also done much to improve industrial relations?

Mrs. Beckett: The hon. Gentleman may be aware that we have recently supported legislation from another place strengthening ACAS's roles and responsibilities. However, ACAS's responsibility is not to advise the Government on how we should develop policy but to help to administrate. The context of the work done by ACAS is to encourage voluntary resolution of difficulties and disputes, which is the exact context and thrust of the White Paper.

It is for employees to decide whether they wish to work in a single union. I do not think that it would be possible to say whether the legislation specifically promotes single or multi-union workplaces. Quite simply, it provides a framework within which decisions can be reached when a majority of employees, or a substantial number of employees, seek union recognition.

Mr. Joe Ashton (Bassetlaw): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the Conservatives lost the general election because they created a climate of fear in every workplace across the country, which cost them hundreds of thousands of votes? Despite the change of Government, there is still a great deal of fear in the workplace about sticking one's neck out, to try to form a union.

Although the White Paper states that it will be an offence to blacklist anyone who tries to join a union, is my right hon. Friend aware that—in these days of the Data Protection Bill, and the widespread use of computers networked across the country—it will be very difficult to prove blacklisting? Is she aware that people who stick out their neck in trying to go for the 40 per cent., and fail, can easily be made redundant, placed permanently on night shifts, moved to another part of the country, or have other sanctions, which can be very difficult to prove, used against them? Will she show some flexibility on the 40 per cent., and on the blacklisting provisions—to make them watertight?

Mrs. Beckett: My hon. Friend has great experience in these matters. With great respect, I tell him that, although blacklisting is not always easy to prove, the fact that it is now an offence to promote blacklisting will certainly make a substantial difference. It will also, correctly, be an offence to penalise anyone who campaigns either for or against union recognition. People will have the right to be protected against ill-treatment because of their actions either in their own cause or in advancing the cause of others.

As the legislation is considered, its detail will have to be explored to determine how effectively those rights can be protected. Nevertheless, we believe that the Government's enshrining of those protections in the law, for the first time, is an important step.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): Is the Secretary of State aware that she has taken a huge gamble with industrial relations, and therefore with prosperity in this country? Against the background of a secular and very welcome long-term fall in unemployment and an all-time low in industrial strife, does she not think that there is at least a strong risk that many of the measures that she is proposing in the White Paper could jeopardise both of those positive factors, and therefore operate against prosperity in the medium to long term?

Mrs. Beckett: I recognise the concerns identified by the right hon. Gentleman. I simply tell him that I am not a gambler. The only thing that I ever gamble with is my life and my livelihood, by standing to be a Member of this place. He is profoundly mistaken in thinking that our package of measures represents a gamble. As I said earlier and now repeat: the Government are attempting to spread best practice in the workplace, so that it is normal practice.

I think that the right hon. Gentleman will find—as he has more freedom now to go about the countryside, inquiring about what is happening in the modern workplace—that all the most successful companies will be able very easily and very freely to operate within the framework of the law. The type of practices that we encourage and enshrine are those that they now pursue—which is partly why they are successful.

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): I warmly welcome most of what my right hon. Friend had to say today, but, as she has heard from other hon. Members, a 40 per cent. threshold denied Scotland a Parliament, which a majority voted for in 1979. Is she aware that, had such a threshold been applied in the Government's referendum in Scotland last year, our new Parliament would have been denied the right to vary the income tax rate, which was supported by 65 per cent. of voters? Does she understand that, in the vast majority of cases, 40 per cent. thresholds are designed specifically to create an insurmountable obstacle to those trying to achieve whatever they are trying to achieve?

Does my right hon. Friend agree that the role of a Labour Government is to provide not balance between the CBI and the TUC, but justice between the CBI and the TUC? The TUC has called the 40 per cent. threshold unreasonable and unworkable; I believe that it is also unjust and so do many of my hon. Friends. I hope that my right hon. Friend will consider that before she makes the mistake of writing that threshold into legislation.

Mrs. Beckett: Of course, I always take seriously my hon. Friend's observations. I share his view that the Government's role is to provide justice, not between the CBI and the TUC, but in setting the framework of law for rights in the place of work. The Government do not believe that setting the threshold for those voting in favour at 40 per cent. creates an insurmountable obstacle. As I have said to other colleagues, we must consider the balance of the whole package. After all, that threshold is part of the final stage in procedures that will come into play only if voluntary agreement is not possible. I repeat that, at every step, the White Paper encourages and supports a move towards voluntary agreement.

The assessment of the bargaining unit in which the judgment is made, and the procedures to be followed for discussions and negotiations between employers and employees will focus on, support and encourage partnership.

My hon. Friend should take into account the fact that the Government recognise that there are occasions when the voice of employees is irrefutable, and there will be automatic representation where more than 50 per cent. of employees in a place of work are members. The overall balance of the package must be assessed. The Government believe that the balance is the right one to sustain collective bargaining, make practical and workable law and encourage the partnership to deliver competitiveness that we all want.

Mr. David Prior (North Norfolk): In the Prime Minister's recent presidential tour of Japan, he drew attention to this country's excellent industrial relations and flexible labour market. Given the very high level of unemployment in most European economies, why is the President of the Board of Trade so slavishly following continental practice?

Mrs. Beckett: Oh, dear. The hon. Gentleman does not know much about continental practice if he thinks that all our actions slavishly follow it. We are setting a fresh balance for the framework of industrial relations law—where it is necessary to resort to law—that reflects the modern workplace and partnership that so many of our most successful companies advocate and practise.

Mr. Ian Pearson (Dudley, South): May I tell my right hon. Friend that good employers will welcome today's proposals on employee rights and have no problems with them? Does she agree that beating up on one's work force is not good management and is not good for Britain's economy? Will she assure the House that in the consultation process that follows, she will consult widely with small companies employing between 20 and 100 people to ensure that their interests are fully taken into account?

Mrs. Beckett: Apart from encouraging the use of voluntary measures to resolve difficulties, the White Paper throughout places emphasis on consultation, and I can certainly give my hon. Friend that assurance.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: Thank you. I am now closing the exchanges on the statement.

As there are a number of hon. Members in the Chamber, may I make it clear that I have always believed, and acted according to the belief, that when Members wish to question a ministerial statement, they must remain in the Chamber to hear it. If they leave, they have not heard the full statement and it is a discourtesy to the Minister who is at the Dispatch Box.

I noticed today that Members on both sides rushed out to the Vote Office to get the statement and the White Paper. It is not the White Paper that is being questioned, but the statement of the President of the Board of Trade. The time will come to debate the White Paper. I shall not call Members who go out to the Vote Office and seek papers. I have their names, so they need not bother to stand, if that is their intention. We shall now have the business statement.

Mr. Jim Marshall (Leicester, South): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I take points of order after all statements.

Mr. Marshall rose—

Madam Speaker: After we have finished the business statement.

Mr. Marshall: It is relevant, Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: They are always relevant, but I am afraid that I am now taking the statement by the Leader of the House.

Business of the House

4.24 pm

The President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mrs. Ann Taylor): With permission, Madam Speaker, I would like to make a statement about the business of the House. The House is, of course, in recess next week, but I should like to inform hon. Members of the business for the first week back after Whitsun.

MONDAY 1 JUNE—Proceedings on the following Bills, which are consolidation measures:

The Petroleum Bill [Lords].

The Audit Commission Bill [Lords].

Remaining stages of the National Lottery Bill [Lords].

Remaining stages of the Late Payment of Commercial Debts (Interest) Bill [Lords].

TUESDAY 2 JUNE—Opposition Day (12th allotted day).

There will be a debate entitled "The dangers of changing Britain's successful and fair electoral system" on an Opposition motion.

WEDNESDAY 3 JUNE—Until 2 pm, there will be debates on the motion for the Adjournment of the House.

Consideration in Committee of the Human Rights Bill [Lords] (second day).

THURSDAY 4 JUNE—Until about 7 pm, Second Reading of the Registration of Political Parties Bill.

Debate and motions on modernisation of the House of Commons.

FRIDAY 5 JUNE—Debate on Government support for sport on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

The provisional business for the following week will be as follows:

MONDAY 8 JUNE—Progress on remaining stages of the Teaching and Higher Education Bill [Lords].

TUESDAY 9 JUNE—For three hours, conclusion of remaining stages of the Teaching and Higher Education Bill [Lords].

Consideration of any Lords amendments which may be received to the European Communities (Amendment) Bill.

WEDNESDAY 10 JUNE—Until 2 pm, there will be debates on the motion for the Adjournment of the House.

Consideration in Committee of the Human Rights Bill [Lords] (third day).

THURSDAY 11 JUNE—Debate on the prospects for the Cardiff European Council on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 12 JUNE—The House will not be sitting.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard (South-West Norfolk): I thank the Leader of the House for that statement. I am glad to hear that the House will have the opportunity on its return from the recess to debate the Registration of Political Parties Bill, and also that we shall have the opportunity to debate European matters, albeit on a motion for the Adjournment. It is especially welcome that the issues considered by the Modernisation Committee are to be debated, when we will have the benefit of hearing views on them expressed by all hon. Members.

[Mrs. Gillian Shephard]

The right hon. Lady has announced debates on the national lottery and sport for all. Will she arrange for the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, before those debates take place, to make a statement to the House on his plans for the television coverage of major sporting events and to give his response to the views on listed sporting events of his own advisory panel?

No doubt the right hon. Lady will be hoping that I do not ask again for a debate in Government time on the national health service—but I intend to do so. I, in turn, hope that she will not reply that the Conservative Government held only one such debate during the previous Parliament. As she must know, that count omits all the debates on health legislation under the Conservative Government. That is a nice little argument thought up by researchers, but it does not stand up to scrutiny.

The Leader of the House knows that yesterday the Prime Minister was finally forced to admit that he had broken an early election pledge, as hospital waiting lists have gone up—not down, as he promised this time last year they would. Will she therefore arrange for a debate in Government time on the national health service, so that Ministers can come to the Dispatch Box to explain that they have broken their own election promises—it is not something which they can blame on previous Governments—and that, despite the extra panic injections of cash into the NHS, their spending in the past year falls well short of the annual percentage increases achieved by successive Conservative Governments? Ministers may also want to say what they plan to do about the National Audit Office's alarming report on the difficulties that the health service is having in coping with the millennium bug.

I feel sure that the right hon. Lady will be aware that, as a result of the Foreign Secretary's refusal to respect the Standing Orders of the House on the powers of Select Committees to send for departmental papers, the Foreign Affairs Committee, with the support of hon. Members from all three main political parties, has today taken the unprecedented step of making a special report to the House—I have a copy here—enclosing its correspondence with the Foreign Secretary and asking for the views of the House. The Foreign Secretary's unacceptable behaviour towards the Foreign Affairs Committee raises profound issues concerning the conduct of all Select Committees and, indeed, of the House. What arrangements will the right hon. Lady make so that the House can give its views on the matter, as the Foreign Affairs Committee requested?

Mrs. Taylor: I am glad that the right hon. Lady has welcomed some of the debates that I have announced. Listed sporting events can be discussed during debates on the remaining stages of the National Lottery Bill, which she mentioned, at Question Time to the relevant Minister on Monday 1 June and during the specific debate. We must rely on my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport to choose when to make an announcement on the matter. He has certainly gone out of his way to ensure that as many hon. Members as possible have been consulted; their views will be taken into account before decisions are made.

The right hon. Lady asked me not to remind her that, under the Conservative Government, there was only one Government debate on the health service in so many years. Tuesday 2 June will be an Opposition day—if the Opposition felt that the issue was sufficiently important, they could have chosen to debate it then. The right hon. Lady accused the Government of panicking, but the Prime Minister made it clear yesterday, in reiterating our election pledge, that waiting lists would be reduced in the lifetime of this Government. He cited significant figures showing the extra money—£5 million every day—that the Government are spending over and above what the Conservative Government would have been spending had they remained in power.

On the report of the Foreign Affairs Committee that was issued today, the right hon. Lady is wrong to say that the Government are not respecting the Standing Orders of the House. She will know that, in writing to the Select Committee, my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary said that it was a long-standing practice of all parties in government that telegrams should not be made public, as telegrams, like other classified documents, frequently contained frank and other sensitive reports of exchanges with other Governments, or with individuals, who expected their confidences to be respected. There is no point in the House pre-empting the independent inquiry that has been announced and whose findings will be made public.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): Will the Leader of the House reflect further on the request that has been made to her about the Foreign Affairs Committee? Does she recognise that the opinions of hon. Members from all parties are represented in the Committee's majority view?

Will she also reflect on the general concern, which touches not only on Sierra Leone, but on the unfinished business in the wake of the Scott report? Is it not now clear, particularly in the light of the revelations about Mr. Jonathan Aitken in the press this morning, that the House must get to the bottom of a great deal more murky business relating to arms sales under the previous Government and, I regret to say, under the current Government, to Indonesia? Does it not now seem amazing that the former Prime Minister should have appointed Mr. Aitken as Minister for Defence Procurement, and is it not extraordinary that neither the former Prime Minister nor any of his associates have made a statement about this morning's revelations? Should we not recognise that, despite the valiant efforts of the Foreign Affairs Committee, the House needs a special mechanism to monitor the sensitive question of arms sales?

We have for many years been able to have full confidence in the Intelligence and Security Committee, on which the right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) deal with sensitive issues relating to Government communications headquarters, MI5 and MI6. Surely we can develop a system whereby the House can have full confidence that these sensitive matters are under full parliamentary control.

Mrs. Taylor: I have nothing to add to what I said about the report. Former Ministers and the revelations in the newspapers this morning are fortunately not matters for me.

Mr. Jim Marshall (Leicester, South): It is not my intention to raise a point of order, Madam Speaker, since I believe that you are aware that, in a blink of one of your eyelids, an hon. Member scurried out and scurried in with copies of the statement of the President of the Board of Trade.

Madam Speaker: For which he is now terribly sad.

Mr. Marshall: I can see the sadness in his face, Madam Speaker.

My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House will be aware of the wide interest in the statement on the Government's White Paper "Fairness at Work". Will that be debated in the very near future? Looking further ahead, when the detailed legislation is introduced, will the two figures, dealing with the 40 per cent. threshold and the exclusion of firms with fewer than 20 employees, be presented in such a way as to be debatable and amendable either in Committee or on Report?

Mrs. Taylor: My hon. Friend is right to remind the House that hon. Members are called entirely at your discretion, Madam Speaker, and I know that you exercise that discretion extremely well.

The White Paper was generally extremely well received in the House a few minutes ago. I understand how much interest there is, and that hon. Members will want to debate the proposals. My hon. Friend knows how crowded the parliamentary timetable is at the moment, and I do not expect he believes I can provide a time in the immediate or near future for a debate, but, of course, I will bear it in mind. When the legislation comes to be discussed, the selection of amendments is a matter for Madam Speaker, and that selection will determine what items are debated. I cannot pre-empt a decision on when the legislation will be introduced, because we do not say in advance what will be in any Queen's Speech.

Sir John Stanley (Tonbridge and Malling): Is the Leader of the House aware that her answer on the Foreign Affairs Committee report completely missed the central point? Is she further aware that the Foreign Secretary's comment about the publication of telegrams is a red herring, as the central issue is the power of Select Committees to send for papers, which most certainly do not have to be published?

Mrs. Taylor: There are long-established practices in the House, and I do not think that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary is suggesting that they should be changed.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire): Can we have a debate on the closure of jobcentres? There are two answers that I am not looking for: first, that I should apply for an Adjournment debate, because I fully intend to ask for such a debate on the threatened closure of jobcentres at Dronfield and Eckington in my constituency; and, secondly, that I should table a question for Employment questions on 11 June, because I intend to do that as well. We need a fully fledged debate on the problem of jobcentre closures and the apparent policy of what is known as rationalisation.

Mrs. Taylor: My hon. Friend anticipates my advice, but I can tell him that no decisions have been made. There have been exhaustive consultations on the issue in his locality, and my right hon. Friend the Minister for Employment, Welfare to Work and Equal Opportunities and I know of his concerns. I will ensure that my right hon. Friend is reminded of the keen interest that my hon. Friend takes in these matters.

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): Has the Leader of the House seen early-day motion 1356?

[That this House notes with dismay reports that Sir Thomas Legg was forced to admit to the Committee of Public Accounts in 1993 that he had given an incorrect answer to the Committee when he stated that no judges had complained about cuts in legal aid when in fact such complaints had been received from both the Lord Chief Justice and the Master of the Rolls, and suggested to the Committee that he did not see these protests as 'very germane'; believes he is therefore a wholly inappropriate person to hold the inquiry into the Arms to Sierra Leone fiasco; and calls on Her Majesty's Government to replace Sir Thomas Legg with a High Court Judge and to hold the inquiry in public.]

Will the right hon. Lady now acknowledge that the Government are steeped in hypocrisy, as is apparent when one contrasts their handling the BSE inquiry and the Cookie cover-up inquiry? Has she noticed that the BSE inquiry has an independent judge and meets in public, hearing evidence from all sides designed to get at the facts, while the Thomas Legg inquiry involves a Whitehall insider meeting in private and is designed to cover up the truth?

Mrs. Taylor: I totally reject what the right hon. Gentleman says. As he knows, Sir Thomas Legg is heading the inquiry. The shadow Foreign Secretary has acknowledged his qualities. When the report is published, we will see just how shallow some of the allegations are. Conservative Members seem to forget that it is allegations that are spoken of, not facts. The inquiry is the best way forward.

Mr. John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington): If there is not to be an early debate on the White Paper, may we have an early debate on industrial relations? That would enable us to highlight the concerns, particularly in west London, about the bitter dispute at the factory owned by Mr. G. K. Noon. My right hon. Friend may recall that my hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Ann Keen) and I raised the issue of the dispute several weeks ago. There was cross-party agreement that management and unions should come together. I facilitated such a meeting and Mr. Noon agreed to give the union the right of representation. Unfortunately, yesterday he resiled from that agreement and has disciplined a senior shop steward. We would like to expose such mendacity and intimidation in a debate on industrial relations.

Mrs. Taylor: I understand my hon. Friend's concerns, but I am afraid that I cannot find Government time in the near future to explore the issue that concerns him and, no doubt, his constituents. His best course may be to apply for an Adjournment debate.

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): As Britain is a signatory to the Ottawa treaty, which, as the right hon.

[Sir Sydney Chapman]

Lady knows, contains provisions on banning of land mines, land mine clearance and the rehabilitation of land mine victims, does she think that legislation is necessary in the UK Parliament to give effect to its provisions? If so, may we have her assurance that such legislation will be introduced sooner rather than later—if possible, before the end of this parliamentary Session, given that its provisions are presumably uncontentious?

Mrs. Taylor: I have previously said at business questions that I am very sympathetic to the Ottawa convention and understand the need to ratify it as soon as possible. We signed it in December and want to ratify it as quickly as possible, but we have to do so when there is parliamentary time. I hope that there will be much support for such a move. Such measures can never be guaranteed an easy passage, but we are looking to make progress on the issue.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Has the Leader of the House seen early-day motion 1237 on motor neurone disease?

[That this House welcomes the launch of Motor Neurone Disease Awareness Week on 25th April and congratulates the Motor Neurone Disease Association and its 94 branches throughout the UK for its work in caring for people affected by this uniquely rapid terminal disease; notes that there is no cure and no known cause of the disease, from which one person dies in the UK every eight hours; further notes that the association has chosen the theme of Racing Against Time for Awareness Week to reflect the fact that the speed of progression of the disease from diagnosis to death poses a major challenge to health, social service and social security providers; further notes that because of a failure by statutory providers to prioritise MND adequately, people with MND often do not access appropriate support and services rapidly enough; and further calls on Her Majesty's Government to take into account the unique nature of motor neurone disease in its health, social service and social security policy reforms and specifically to ensure that MND sufferers in receipt of lifetime awards are not subjected to detailed interview under the Benefit Integrity Project.]

The motion has been signed by 69 Members, and states, in essence, that three people a day die from the disease and that not enough of the sufferers get the care that they need quickly enough.

I received a faxed statement today from the Preston Acute Hospitals NHS Trust which states that funding for its motor neurone care facility is being withdrawn. The facility has operated since 1993, is internationally renowned and gives care and support to the people who are suffering most. Could the right hon. Lady bring that to the attention of the Secretary of State for Health? On a day when we have had appalling news about the national health service, to think that a care facility that is doing so much good work for so many people in the Preston area could be withdrawn is a scandal. I have written to the Prime Minister to ask him to intervene. Will she do all that she can to bring it to the attention of her colleagues?

Mrs. Taylor: I do not know about the circumstances that apply in Preston, but I know of the good work of the Motor Neurone Disease Association in supporting sufferers and in research. The hon. Gentleman asked me to bring the matter to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health. I am certainly willing to do so. I am afraid that I cannot find time for a debate, but he may wish to apply for an Adjournment debate.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch): When we discuss modernisation of the House, will the right hon. Lady have regard to the need for the Government to modernise their approach to treating Members? Is it not unacceptable that the Secretary of State for Social Security, having received a letter from me on behalf of a constituent in desperate financial difficulties back in December, responded only today, some five months later, despite numerous reminders? Is it not also unacceptable that, on two separate occasions in recent weeks, the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson) has promised to deliver documents to the House within a specified time scale and failed to deliver them? Only today has she produced the final national road traffic forecasts background papers that were originally promised last October. When will we get the much-delayed White Paper on integrated transport?

Mrs. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman raises a series of issues. I was not aware of any of the problems on documents to which he referred, because he has not mentioned them to me. I hope that we will see the transport White Paper in the not-too-distant future. On answers to questions and letters, he may not have been here yesterday when I informed the House of the action that the Cabinet Secretary and I have taken on the matter.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): My question follows that of my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope). The right hon. Lady told the House on Monday that she had written to her colleagues at the end of March about their appalling service to Members of Parliament in responding to letters. What response has she had—or is she, like us, still waiting for a reply?

Mrs. Taylor: I am tempted to ask the hon. Gentleman where he was on Monday when he missed a question to me on this issue. As one who has followed the issue, he knows that we are monitoring the situation. Some Departments have had a vast increase in the number of letters that they receive. We are taking steps to ensure that full replies are given as soon as possible.

Mr. John Swinney (North Tayside): Will the Leader of the House find time for a debate on the nuclear tests carried out by the Government of India, to give the House the opportunity to express its views in the strongest way possible about the further proliferation of nuclear tests?

Mrs. Taylor: We had a statement on that. I think that there is much concern among all hon. Members about the action that India took. I understand why hon. Members would like time to debate it further. I am afraid that I cannot see the prospect in Government time in the near future. That does not mean that all hon. Members are not very concerned about what has happened.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): Can we have a debate on the relationship between the House of Commons and the Administration? I ask because there is an increasing perception that Ministers are completely failing even to attempt to answer questions, oral or written. I cannot judge whether it is a case of idleness or of evasiveness, but, whatever the reason, it is becoming a serious problem. I hope that the you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and Madam Speaker will take an interest in it. The matter must be dealt with openly because it is becoming a scandal. Perhaps the answer is to set up a traditionalisation committee to get back to old standards instead of inventing new ones.

Mrs. Taylor: The right hon. Gentleman is so concerned because he does not like the fact that it is Labour Members who are answering the questions. He had many years in government and was an expert at deciding what information he would give. He is suffering from selective amnesia.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire): May I press again for a debate on how magistrates courts are organised, following the growing concern in Derbyshire about the proposed closure of Ashbourne, Bakewell and Matlock magistrates courts? That will mean long journeys for my constituents to get access to local courts. If local papers cannot report what is going on in the courts, justice will suffer.

Mrs. Taylor: I know of the hon. Gentleman's concern about those issues, which is shared by other hon. Members who represent that part of the country. He will be aware that my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) raised that matter in the spring Adjournment debate yesterday morning. I promised then to draw Ministers' attention to the remarks, and will add the hon. Gentleman's remarks this afternoon.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire): If the Leader of the House is unwilling to have a debate on the health service in general, will she at least arrange for a debate on the national health service White Paper, as more than five months have gone by since it was published and there have been no opportunities to debate it? The widespread concern among general practitioners about the Government's proposals for primary care groups could then be aired in the House. Does the right hon. Lady recognise that the habit of presenting health service policies without providing an opportunity for debate is becoming chronic?

Mrs. Taylor: The White Paper made clear our commitment to putting family doctors and community nurses in the driving seat in shaping local health services in the future. There is a general welcome for our approach. I certainly do not rule out a debate on the health service. Indeed, I told my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) that I would very much like to be able to find time for such a debate around the 50th anniversary. At the moment, the timetable is extremely congested and there simply is not time for it. If the Opposition thought that the matter was of sufficiently high priority, they would have opted for a debate on it the Tuesday after we come back, which is an Opposition day.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): Will the right hon. Lady find time for an early statement by the President of the Board of Trade on a subject that was not significantly covered in her remarks this afternoon, the European Commission's proposal for works councils in Britain and elsewhere in the European Union? Is the right hon. Lady aware that on 9 November, on the BBC's "On the Record", when asked what she would do if the European Commission persisted with proposals for works councils in Britain in companies with as few as 50 employees, the President of the Board of Trade limply replied, "Well . . . er . . . we shall see how things go." Are we not owed a statement of intent by the President of the Board of Trade or a simple admission of impotence?

Mrs. Taylor: Clearly, the hon. Gentleman is frustrated that he could not ask a question of the President of the Board of Trade earlier. My right hon. Friend dealt with the issue extremely well, and I see no need for another statement.

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): Will my right hon. Friend give an undertaking that, when a decision is reached on the channel tunnel rail link, the announcement will be made to the House and there will be a statement? I understand that a conclusion has almost been reached on what is a matter of great importance to my constituents and those of many other hon. Members—and particularly to those of us who feel that the link should either be completed in its entirety or not at all.

Mrs. Taylor: I understand the concern of my hon. Friend and other hon. Members about that issue. My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister has kept the House informed of developments. London and Continental Railways has given him its revised proposals, and discussions between the company and Government are continuing. My right hon. Friend will make a statement in due course.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): Will the right hon. Lady reconsider her curtly dismissive replies to questions on the first special report of the Foreign Affairs Committee? May I remind her that it is, indeed, a first special report? Is she aware that the Clerk's letter to the Foreign Secretary pointed out that there is a precedent for making the documents requested available? It dates from 1982 when another party was in office—I will not remind her which. Also, there was no request for the documents to be made public; the request was that they be made available to the Committee. Does she really think it appropriate that Sir Thomas Legg should be able to see documents to which Privy Councillors sitting in this House are denied access? Will she please reconsider her answer and also address herself to the final question of my right hon. Friend the Member for South–West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard), which referred to the final sentence of the report:

"The views of the House are sought."

What arrangements does she propose to take to ascertain the views of the House?

Mrs. Taylor: The usual arrangements will apply. The Foreign Secretary has pointed out the difficulties that could arise if the long-standing practice was not applied.

[Mrs. Taylor]

Also, we are in an unusual situation in that an independent inquiry is being conducted into these matters. We should not try to second-guess the outcome of that inquiry.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. We must now move on.

Points of Order

4.56 pm

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Perhaps you or Madam Speaker could make a statement to remind the House of the rules about whether hon. Members are allowed to ask particular questions if they have registered an interest. Anyone reading today's Hansard and the Register of Members' Interest will see the link between trade union sponsorship and questions asked, very much off message, by Labour Members—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There is a procedure for dealing with such complaints, and at this time the Floor of the House is not the place to do it.

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. In view of the reports in today's newspapers about the crisis in the nation's blood supply, the financial crisis within the National Blood Authority, and the news of the sacking of that authority's chief executive—which I heard this morning and which was not conveyed, to me at least, by ministerial letter—have you had a request from a Minister to make a statement to the House about that serious matter affecting the nation's blood supply and its management?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have no knowledge of any statements to be made on that subject.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard (South-West Norfolk): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It would be helpful if the Leader of the House could explain what are the usual arrangements when the views of the House are sought by a Select Committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is for the Leader of the House to respond in the way that she thinks fit.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I heard, as did my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard), the Leader of the House tell us—in what I thought was a spirit of helpfulness—that the usual arrangements would apply. It is not unreasonable to ask for the House, including you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to be given guidance by the right hon. Lady as to what those arrangements are.

The President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mrs. Ann Taylor): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I cannot believe that right hon. and hon. Members with experience of government do not know that the Government always respond to Select Committee reports.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have dealt with that point of order, and right hon. and hon. Members on both Front Benches have heard what has been said. This is becoming an extension of business questions.

Sir Patrick Cormack rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it a different point of order?

Sir Patrick Cormack: It is, Mr. Deputy Speaker. There has been a confusion between a Government's response to a Select Committee report, which we all know about, and the Select Committee's opportunity to report. The Select Committee is a Committee of this House, set up by this House with a duty to report to it. When that Committee asks that this House advise it of its views, what opportunity has the House to do precisely that?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As I have already made clear, those are simply requests for debates framed in different ways. It is for the Leader of the House to respond to those requests in the way that she deems fit. Now, perhaps, we can move to the main business.

Common Agricultural Policy

[Relevant documents: ECD No. 10934/97 relating to the common organisation in the market in beef and veal; ECD No. 13380/97 relating to agricultural production methods compatible with the requirements of the protection of the environment and the countryside; ECD No. 13111/97 relating to a Community aid scheme for forestry measures in agriculture; ECD No. 5102/98 relating to the second Commission report on the functioning of the ewe premium; ECD No. 5733/98 relating to the common organisation of the market in raw tobacco; ECD No. 5939/98 ADD 1, 2 and 3 relating to the prices for agricultural products (1998/99); ECD No. 6752/98 relating to measures and compensation relating to appreciable revaluations that affect farm incomes; and ECD No. 7072/98 relating to the granting of aid for the production of olive oil.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): I have to inform the House that Madam Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition. Also, Back-Bench Members' speeches will be limited to 10 minutes for this debate.

4.58 pm

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Dr. John Cunningham): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 7073/98 relating to reform of the Common Market Organisations for beef, cereals and milk and for the development of rural development policy in the European Union, and the Second Report from the Agriculture Committee, Session 1997–98, 'CAP Reform: Agenda 2000' (HC 311) and the Government response thereto (HC 719); and supports the Government's intention to negotiate an outcome which takes account of the interests of UK producers, consumers and taxpayers alike and of developing countries and to press for a reformed Common Agricultural Policy with substantially reduced overall costs, which is more economically rational, which reduces the bureaucratic burden on farmers, which provides a better framework for targeted environmental and rural development support, which contains fair and common rules to ensure that the UK's farm and food industries can exploit their competitive advantage in European and world markets, which facilitates the accession of associated countries and which offers the medium-term prospect of benefits to developing countries.

The debate is about Agenda 2000 reform of the common agricultural policy and related matters, but no doubt other issues will arise during our exchanges. Reform of the CAP is an important issue, not only for farmers, but for consumers, taxpayers and the environment. The Government are determined to see progress in these matters—indeed, enlargement of the European Union to the east, and the next round of World Trade Organisation negotiations make change essential, even inevitable. The Government's stance is generally shared by the National Farmers Union, the Country Landowners Association, the Liberal Democrats, many consumer and environmental organisations, and, in some respects, I am pleased to say, by Her Majesty's official Opposition.

During our presidency, we have given the reform negotiations a powerful start. A special Agriculture Council in March launched the debate. The presidency then initiated intensive technical examination of the proposals in Brussels, which continues. In Newcastle upon Tyne last week, Agriculture Ministers from all member states held a thorough debate on the subject of livestock farming in environmentally fragile areas, such as our own less-favoured areas.

The Labour Government continue to take a lead in Europe, unlike the Conservatives, whose posturing while they were in government did untold damage to British interests and to our farmers' interests. Judging by the speech by the Leader of the Opposition this week, they still have not learnt any lessons on Europe. We believe that it is better to influence the debate while it is happening, rather than stand on the sidelines sniping; only then can we ensure that the views of our country and of our farmers and rural communities are effectively represented.

A further discussion of the Commission's proposals at the Agriculture Council next week will enable initial conclusions to be drawn and impetus given to the continuing negotiating process. Our work provides a sound basis for agreement to be reached, probably in the first part of 1999. The Government have argued for reforms that will be less costly overall, which encourage a more competitive, sustainable agriculture, and which are fair to British farmers and enhance the rural environment and rural economy.

We have welcomed the Commission's general proposals. The proposed substantial cuts in support prices will save British consumers some £1 billion a year. They will encourage a more market-focused response from farmers and improve competitiveness on world markets. The proposed rural development regulation will create a welcome new framework for promoting agri-environmental measures and rural development. Farmers will receive compensation for the price cuts, and will benefit from the effective ending of compulsory set-aside.

However, the proposals do not meet all our concerns; nor do they go as far in some respects as we would wish. The initial costs of compensation payments are high, and the Commission has made no proposal for those payments to be time-limited, degressive and decoupled from production, as we believe they should be. It is also by no means clear that the proposals are sufficiently radical to permit successful enlargement of the European Union; nor might they be sufficient for the Union to avoid challenge in the forthcoming round of negotiations within the World Trade Organisation.

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon): The right hon. Gentleman said a moment ago that it was Government policy not to stand on the sidelines but to be part of the debate while it was happening, but it was reported this morning that the Prime Minister told Mr. Rupert Murdoch that the Labour party would not commit itself either way to the single currency at the next general election. Is that true, and, if so, is that being part of the debate or standing on the sidelines?

Dr. Cunningham: I do not believe that that newspaper report is true; nor is it relevant to what I was saying. However, let me say that both my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer have made the Government's position on the single currency absolutely clear. Incidentally, our position on that matter is supported by the National Farmers Union, unlike that of the Conservative party.

To return to the subject of reform of the CAP, the proposed dairy price cuts are insufficient to enable milk quotas eventually to be abolished. We shall press hard for arrangements permitting a quota-free regime after 2006, although that is a desperately late time for the changes to be made. In the meantime, I am not prepared to accept increases in milk quotas that discriminate against our efficient, competitive British dairy farmers, as the current Commission proposals would do.

Charlotte Atkins (Staffordshire, Moorlands): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the devastation caused to dairy farmers in my constituency by bovine tuberculosis? Since January, there have been 46 new outbreaks, with farms closed down. Will he tell us what progress is being made on the implementation of Krebs and the identification of new hot spots, as that is crucial to dairy farmers in my patch?

Dr. Cunningham: My hon. Friend raises a matter which is important to dairy farmers and to the nation generally. We are aware of the outbreaks in dairy herds, although, fortunately, they remain at a relatively low level. We have given a clear statement of our acceptance of the principles of the Krebs report—an investigation quite properly set up by the previous Administration; and we have set up an expert group under Professor John Bourne to advise how matters may be taken forward in that respect. We shall move with all possible speed consistent with accepting and having available to us the best scientific advice, but we know that the problem is an urgent and serious one which affects many dairy farmers, and we shall act as quickly as possible.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): Before the right hon. Gentleman leaves the subject of milk quotas, will he tell the House, in the light of his request to the Agriculture Council in respect of the 30 per cent. cut in intervention prices, what increase in milk quotas he will now press for in order to compensate our farmers?

Dr. Cunningham: As the right hon. Gentleman knows, the Commission proposals envisage a 2 per cent. across-the-board increase in milk quotas for those member states which "have mountainous areas". With that very phrase, six member states, including the United Kingdom, are totally excluded from the proposals, and I regard that as arbitrary and unacceptable. We have made our position absolutely clear and shall continue to oppose the proposal on that as well as other grounds.

We will not accept a ceiling on farmers' payments which is applied at EU level and therefore takes no account of this country's larger and more efficient farm structure. If there are to be ceilings, they must be a matter for member states and member states alone to decide. In that event, it would be logical for any savings to remain available to the member state to finance agri-environmental and rural development measures, and not, as is envisaged, for savings to be returned to the CAP general fund for redistribution.

Improving the rural environment is an important component of the reforms. Cutting support prices should bring environmental benefits in many areas—for example, where it leads to reduced use of agro-chemicals. The rural development regulation will form an important new environmental pillar of the CAP. It will be important to ensure that measures under that regulation are not limited to farm-based activities, but can be used to foster a wide range of rural development activities to enable rural communities to prosper.

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale): The right hon. Gentleman is referring to the idea of reforming the CAP in the direction of transferring subsidies towards rural development. In that context, can he say anything about the proposals, which we believe are being discussed in Whitehall, to restructure the Ministry of Agriculture to become a rural affairs Ministry of the sort that the Select Committee on Agriculture recommended?

Dr. Cunningham: The hon. Gentleman tempts me, but the answer is no; I cannot say more than I have said—that matters are being considered. However, ultimately, decisions on reorganisation of Whitehall responsibilities are determined by the Prime Minister. No such decision is about to be announced.

I return to changes in the CAP. The Government's policy is ultimately to phase out direct production-linked support, and use some of the savings to reinforce the new rural development pillar. We believe that that is the best, most cost-effective, way to secure further environmental benefits.

The negotiations on CAP reform will inevitably continue for some months before they reach conclusions. Throughout those negotiations, I shall press for reform in the interests of farmers, consumers, taxpayers and the environment. They are, of course—

Mr. William Cash (Stone): Will the Minister give way?

Dr. Cunningham: No; I shall not give way at the moment.

There are many other important issues confronting British agriculture, both in Brussels and at home.

As everyone recognises, British farmers have been going through an especially difficult time, due principally to the strength of sterling and the continuing ban on the export of British beef. While acting within necessarily tight budgetary constraints, we continue to discuss these issues in partnership with farmers and their representatives, to ensure that the Government, wherever possible, can provide the best possible framework of policies to assist our farmers.

Mr. Cash: Will the Minister give way on that point?

Dr. Cunningham: No; I am not giving way to the hon. Gentleman.

I shall say something about changes that we can make while discussion about CAP reform continues.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way on the subject of exchange rates?

Dr. Cunningham: No; I am not giving way to the hon. Gentleman at the moment.

I know that specified risk material controls have had an especially heavy impact on the returns of our sheep farmers, and have caused them difficulties in the sale of cull ewes. Those difficulties have been brought to my attention by hon. Members on both sides of the House, including my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales, and I undertook to inquire into how we might help. As a result of the requirement for ewe carcases to be split in abattoirs or cutting plants, and the spinal cord removed, French demand for whole carcases has been taken up by producers in other countries.

Following those representations from Liberal Democrat Members and other individual Members of Parliament, I and my officials have discussed with the French authorities whether they would agree to changes in that trade, and I have decided, since they have agreed, to amend our SRM regulations so that our producers may regain a share of that market. It will be necessary to continue to ensure that spinal cord is removed from the carcases before the meat is sold, but, by agreement and negotiation, we have reached a deal whereby that can be done in designated French abattoirs.

Depending on the outcome of the statutory consultation, which I am obliged to undertake, with interested organisations on our proposals to amend SRM rules, it should be possible for exports of whole ewe carcases—by which I mean ewe carcases from which the head has been removed—to resume this summer. I know that that will be welcome news to sheep farmers throughout the United Kingdom. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]

I now discuss another aspect of negotiations, on an important measure—agrimonetary reform. An important negotiation we face now, and throughout the remainder of the year, concerns the new agrimonetary system needed to take account of the single currency. That will provide an opportunity to secure a more transparent system, less costly to taxpayers and consumers, and less complicated for business. At the same time, it will be important that the new arrangements are fair to all parties, whether or not their country is part of the single currency. We shall also want to ensure that the transition to the new arrangements avoids excessive shocks for farmers and others in related businesses.

In the meantime, at the April Agriculture Council meeting, we secured a continuation of the freeze, so that CAP payments will not, in the main, be affected by currency movements until the end of the year. I believe that that, too, is good news for our farmers, but, of course, there are difficult negotiations to conclude.

Mr. Leigh: Representations have been made to me, as a rural Member, about the strength of the pound, which is costing farmers £300 million a year. They have asked me to urge the Minister to press Brussels for the introduction of transitional compensation arrangements. Will he comment on that and reply to the National Farmers Union case on that point?

Dr. Cunningham: In so far as the hon. Gentleman is speaking about the transition to new agrimonetary arrangements, I have just mentioned them. I understand the justified concern of the hon. Gentleman's constituents and farmers. It is important that we get this matter right. As I have just assured the House, we shall do everything we possibly can in the negotiations to achieve that objective.

I shall now focus on the continuing problems caused to our livestock producers as a consequence of the BSE crisis and the beef ban. As we all know, that is a major issue for all our beef farmers, throughout the United Kingdom.

We have made an important breakthrough with the decision enabling beef to be exported from Northern Ireland under the export certified herds scheme. During

[Dr. Cunningham]

April, the European Commission's inspectors visited Northern Ireland. Earlier this week, they informed the Standing Veterinary Committee that they were largely content with the arrangements that they had seen were in place in Northern Ireland. I understand that the Commission intends next Wednesday, 27 May, to adopt a decision that would allow exports of beef from the Province to resume from 1 June. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] That is excellent news for Northern Ireland farmers, and for the Northern Irish economy as a whole.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnorshire): I wonder whether, in that context, the right hon. Gentleman would comment on his progress on the date-based scheme for beef cattle to be exported.

Dr. Cunningham: The next paragraph of my speech deals with that. The hon. Gentleman obviously has a reasonable crystal ball, as well as farm management expertise.

We have made good progress on negotiations on the date-based export scheme, which I recognise is of far greater significance to our farmers than the progress made in relation to Northern Ireland. However important it was to solve the Northern Ireland problem, the date-based scheme will apply to all animals born after 1 August 1996, and apply throughout the United Kingdom. The scheme would permit the export of meat from animals born after that date—the date from which we believe there was no risk from contaminated feed.

The scheme that we have proposed has strict rules, designed to take account of the only known source of infection after that date—maternal transmission—and we have proposed an offspring cull as part of the proposals. My officials and I have been working very, very closely with the Commission on this. As a result of our most recent negotiations, we expect a proposal on the lines that we have suggested to be tabled for discussion by the Commission very soon.

I would not want to mislead the House: subsequent negotiations on that proposal will not be easy—I have no illusions about that. We finally secured support for the Northern Ireland scheme by 11 votes to two, with two abstentions. I should be happy if we could repeat that outcome, but I believe that, this time, it may be more difficult. Nevertheless, we shall use all our endeavours to secure a positive result.

The scheme is soundly based and robust. It can be effectively managed. Our beef is more rigorously safeguarded than that produced anywhere else in the world. I am sure that our industrialists and farmers, and our meat industry, will do everything possible to comply with the scheme. They have suffered long and hard as a result of the BSE crisis and the export ban. I hope that the Government can count on the support of everyone in the beef industry, and in the House, in reaching the next important milestone in the lifting of the ban.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire): I am sure that we all wish the Minister well in his efforts to get the date-based scheme into operation. On the assumption that he will sooner or later be successful, many farmers are asking whether it will lead to an unwinding of the over-30-months scheme as new cattle come into the frame.

Dr. Cunningham: The OTMS is an important safeguard, and is strongly supported by the Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee. One can see that, if the date-based scheme is accepted, it would seem logical that animals born after 1 August 1996 may not have to go into the OTMS. We may therefore see the beginning of the end of that scheme, but I stress "beginning". With the livestock sector as it is, animals will go into the OTMS for some considerable number of years.

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): Will the Minister give way?

Dr. Cunningham: In a moment.

I want to make it clear that I would have to secure the agreement of the Commission and of SEAC before I could make any such change to the scheme.

Mr. John Swinney (North Tayside): I want to go back to the Minister's point about securing agreement on the date-based scheme among our European partners. What will be the principal obstacles to persuading representatives of other countries that the features of the scheme are as strong as possible?

Dr. Cunningham: I can answer the hon. Gentleman with a single word—politics. There is no valid case on the basis of medical or veterinary science for preventing support for the scheme. I have said that repeatedly, not only in the House, but in the Council of Ministers. We have gone to extraordinary lengths to fulfil our obligations under the Florence terms and to ensure that our beef is safe to eat. I reiterate my firm belief that there are no safety, health or veterinary science grounds on which the scheme should not be accepted.

Mr. Maclean rose—

Mr. Cash rose—

Dr. Cunningham: I will give way once more, to the right hon. Gentleman who is my constituency neighbour, but that is the lot.

Mr. Maclean: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman.

I listened carefully when the Minister said that there might be circumstances once the date-based scheme is up and running in which it might be possible to eat away at the OTMS. Will he consider specialist beef herds, such as dexters, Galloways and others, in which there have been no—or very few—cases of bovine spongiform encephalopathy? Perhaps they might be first in line.

Dr. Cunningham: The special arrangements of the beef assurance scheme are already there if producers want to take advantage of them. It was introduced by the previous Administration, and I am disappointed that there has not been a better take-up. I emphasise what I have already said: the ending of the OTMS is not something I can simply do with a stroke of a pen, and I have properly qualified our ability to move forward on that.

We have made good progress in creating a computerised cattle tracing system for Great Britain. It will become operational in September and will record the birth, movements and death of all cattle moving into the national herd from late September. Holding details on cattle on a central database will provide swift and accurate information to help trace animals easily if there is a disease outbreak and it will give greater assurance to buyers and consumers about an animal's history.

The new system is an essential part of rebuilding confidence in British cattle and British beef, at home and abroad. We recognised that and began implementation as soon as we came to office. We took an early decision about the site for the new service that will run the cattle tracing system. That site is ready and the equipment has been delivered and installed. Some staff are engaged in test runs and more are being recruited, including a number of Welsh-speaking staff so that farmers from Wales may communicate effectively in their own language with the centre at Workington.

Over the next few months, there will be intensive testing of the new system before it is launched. We have already demonstrated the scheme with an audiovisual presentation to other European Agriculture Ministers at the recent informal Council in Northumberland. We were fortunate to host the Council and to be able to make the presentation.

The audiovisual presentation was followed by a practical demonstration at Park farm, Alnwick, of live animals being electronically tagged; then the food chain was followed right through to a meat counter that we had installed with the help of the Meat and Livestock Commission. That showed the absolute traceability of beef that was bar-coded, down to portions for sale in a butcher's shop or on supermarket shelves. It was an excellent bit of work, and I congratulate all involved, including staff of the Ministry of Agriculture, Don Curry, the chairman of the Meat and Livestock Commission, and, last but by no means least, Tim Mallen of Park farm, who showed unfailing courtesy and patience over months of visits from my staff and me to ensure that everything possible was being done to convince our European colleagues of the scheme's effectiveness.

Mrs. Ray Michie (Argyll and Bute): I welcome, as I am sure we all do, the fact that the headquarters at Workington will have Welsh-speaking staff to assist Welsh farmers. Will it also have Gaelic speakers to assist Gaelic-speaking farmers?

Dr. Cunningham: We will probably have a few Geordie speakers, too. I shall look into the possibility. In the interests of efficiency, of course, we would much prefer electronic communication with the centre, but we recognise that that is not yet possible for all farmers.

Let me turn to a more difficult issue, which, although not strictly speaking directly to do with CAP reform, has to do with management of MAFF. It relates to the Central Science Laboratory at York and Norwich.

The health and well-being of consumers and the protection of the environment are, as everyone knows, at the top of our agenda domestically, in the CAP reform negotiations and elsewhere. In Britain, the Central Science Laboratory, which is an integral part of MAFF, provides essential scientific and technical services in support of those objectives.

However, I inherited a very unsatisfactory financial situation. As the design of the CSL's new laboratory at York was approved, the Department's research and development budget has been reduced. The budget has also been subject to heavy and increasing demands from BSE-related research, an area in which the Central Science Laboratory is not involved. As a result, the modern facilities at York have been under-utilised. That was the set of circumstances which I inherited from the previous Government.

Against that difficult background, I have been reviewing the previous Government's decision that the CSL should continue to operate on two sites—principally the York site, but also a smaller presence at Norwich. In order to ensure a more secure future for the agency and a better return from the investment in the excellent facilities at York, I have decided, after long and detailed consideration, that the work done at CSL Norwich should be relocated to the York laboratory. The relocation will be completed during 1999.

Consolidation of the Central Science Laboratory at York will produce a unique and financially robust centre, with strengths throughout the food chain. It will improve the CSL's ability to compete for public and private sector work, and will strengthen its position as a world-class scientific facility. I know that this announcement will be as welcome in York as it will be unwelcome in Norwich.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): The Minister is making a statement.

Dr. Cunningham: If I did not announce the decision to the House, I would be criticised and there would be points of order because I had not faced hon. Members and made the announcement in the Chamber. I advise the Opposition to keep quiet and stop whingeing.

Mr. Cash: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Cunningham: No. I am not giving way.

Mr. Cash rose—

Dr. Cunningham: I am not giving way.

Mr. Cash: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is perfectly clear that the Minister is refusing to take any intervention from me. Is it not—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is entirely a matter for the Minister from whom he takes interventions.

Dr. Cunningham: I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not complaining that I have not given way sufficiently during the debate.

I understand and respect the vigorous, sustained and continuing campaign of my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke) on behalf of his constituents, and I pay full tribute to him for that. I have met him several times on the subject, we have corresponded regularly, and my hon. Friend the Minister of State has answered innumerable questions from our hon. Friend.

I also understand the consequences of the decision—the upheaval for staff and their families. More welcome news was announced yesterday by the Government: the Institute for Food Research will relocate to Norwich, so that will be some compensation.

Mr. Charles Clarke (Norwich, South): I thank my right hon. Friend for his kind personal remarks. I pay tribute to the way in which he and my hon. Friend the Minister of State have tried to deal with the matter in an open way. However, the entire food science community will regret that shoddy decision, which will damage food science research in this country.

I acknowledge that it was an extremely difficult decision for the Minister, but I believe that it would have been better to wait for the establishment of the Food Standards Agency before taking such a destructive decision, particularly as it was taken for the bureaucratic reasons that he set out, to fill a laboratory that is a white elephant. As he said, it was an inherited—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is far too long an intervention.

Mr. Charles Clarke rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: No, the hon. Gentleman should leave it there.

Dr. Cunningham: I understand my hon. Friend's strength of feeling on the subject, but it is certainly not a shoddy decision. It is a decision in the best interests of the long-term viability of the Central Science Laboratory, although I understand that it is controversial.

Mr. Hugh Bayley (City of York): The decision will be warmly welcomed in York. We already have a community of 1,500 bioscientists, who have a combined research spend of £80 million a year. Although the decision was difficult, it was the right decision for British science, MAFF and the farming community.

I, too, thank my right hon. Friend for the careful and patient way in which he has listened to arguments from me and from other hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke), and I hope that he will continue to listen carefully to the York case for building on the Sand Hutton site to allow additional work on novel foods, and a seedbed for small bioscience businesses.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We have three hours to debate the reform of the CAP, which is a matter of great interest to the constituents of Conservative Members, but the debate has degenerated into a private discussion among Labour Members about where a quango should be located.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This afternoon's debate can cover a wide range of topics, and that is exactly what the Minister is doing. Points of order only take time out of the debate.

Dr. Cunningham: I am grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The distinguished scientists at York, in a leading institution established by the previous Government, will take careful note of the derogatory description of them and their institution by the rather foolish and ill-informed hon. Gentleman who just introduced a bogus point of order.

I want to move on quickly—

Mr. John MacGregor (South Norfolk) rose—

Mr. Cash rose—

Dr. Cunningham: I am not giving way any more. [Interruption.] Opposition Members have just complained about shortage of—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister has clearly said that he will not give way.

Dr. Cunningham: I shall move on quickly to farm health and safety issues, which I raise in discussions in Brussels as well as in the United Kingdom

Health and safety on the farm is an area where we must all work for major improvements. Everyone has a right to a safe working environment. We should devote more time to discussion of these matters, whether in the context of CAP reform or elsewhere, because of the appalling record.

I recently asked the Health and Safety Executive to brief me on the agricultural industry's safety record. I am deeply concerned that agriculture has one of the worst health and safety records—

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Minister has been speaking for some 40 minutes, and is moving on to a new subject that has nothing whatever to do with the subject that we are supposed to be debating.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have explained that the debate can range widely. I have also explained to hon. Members that points of order take time out of the debate. We have had far too many points of order.

Dr. Cunningham: I am grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The record shows that, since 1986, 620 people have been killed in farming, and thousands more have been seriously injured. I have made it clear that that is unacceptable and I welcomed the Health and Safety Executive's confirmation that safety in agriculture is now one of its highest priorities. The HSE outlined a range of measures that it is taking, which I welcomed. The Government have allocated the HSE an extra £4.5 million for 1998-99. The money is being targeted on inspection and enforcement, with agricultural safety a key priority.

I shall deal briefly with the amendments on the Order Paper, starting with that in the name of the Leader of the Opposition and his right hon. and hon. Friends.

My first observation is that the amendment is twice as long as the motion tabled by the Government. That tells us something about the verbosity of the Opposition. Secondly, it refers to farm incomes and the difficulties faced by farmers. We know that those difficulties did not start on 1 May last year. We have no better authority for that statement than the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack), who stated in his election address:

"I have fought for Fylde farmers during a very difficult time"— the very difficult time being 18 years of Conservative government.

The amendment goes on to refer to rising unemployment in rural areas, when in fact unemployment is falling in rural areas, including the right hon. Gentleman's constituency. According to the Rural Development Commission figures, rural unemployment as a whole has fallen by almost 4 per cent. since July last year.

In the amendment, the Conservatives—as ever—complain about CAP reforms costing more money, yet they call for British taxpayers to pay more agrimonetary compensation. They call for reform of the CAP, yet oppose the extra short-term costs that that entails. They call for the Government to get the best from the reforms in European negotiations, yet the Conservative party is increasingly dominated by Eurosceptics who refuse to deal with anyone in Europe.

In view of the time, I can be much kinder about the amendment standing in the name of the Liberal Democrats.

We shall lead the debate in Europe through the Agenda 2000 reforms, so that our farmers are well placed to take advantage of the changes. Reform of the CAP to bring about a more market-oriented and environmentally positive policy is widely recognised by farmers as being in the industry's long-term interests. It is also in the interests of our rural communities and of the economy more widely. My aim is to help bring about such reform. It is the way to secure profitable, competitive and sustainable farming in the United Kingdom. I urge the House to support the Government motion, and to reject the Opposition amendment.

5.40 pm

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): I beg to move, as an amendment to the motion, to leave out from '(HC 719);' to end and add:

'albeit against the background of the Government's failed stewardship of British agriculture which has seen farm incomes plummet by 45 per cent, a rise in rural job losses, and a failure to utilise fully all the resources available to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food for the benefit of farmers; urges the Government to negotiate an outcome that works to the advantage of Britain's efficient farming industry as well as to the interests of United Kingdom producers, consumers and taxpayers, and of developing countries and to press for a reformed Common Agricultural Policy with substantially reduced overall costs, which does not act against farms larger than the European average, which is more economically rational, which reduces the bureaucratic burden on farmers, which provides a better framework for targeted environmental and rural development support, which contains fair and common rules to ensure that the United Kingdom's farm and food industries can exploit their competitive advantage in European and world markets, which facilitates the accession of associated countries and which offers the medium term prospect of benefits to developing countries; but regrets the fact that, so far in the discussions on Agenda 2000, the United Kingdom Government has not advanced proposals designed to allow Britain's farming industry to realize its full potential under the revised arrangements.'.

Hearing the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food come to life is a bit like watching his beloved Newcastle United: they only show any fire in the last five minutes of a game. I wish that the Minister's presentation had been a bit more lively at the beginning, because there are many issues that we wanted to raise with him. I welcome the Minister's opening remarks, particularly his comments about cull ewes which will be widely welcomed by those in the sheep trade. It is a matter of concern, and I congratulate the Minister on making a breakthrough in that area. I thank him also for at last having the candour to admit what the real timetable is likely to be for lifting the beef ban. I recall Labour's rhetoric during last year's election campaign about how it would lift the beef ban. Judging from the Minister's comments, that will take about two years—but at least farmers now know the true situation.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Jack: No, not at this stage. I must make progress, because, unlike the Minister, I do not want to speak for 40 or 50 minutes.

The Minister's careful and measured tones throughout the majority of his speech could not hide the real crisis in British farming. We have seen a textbook exhibition of complacency on the part of the Minister in responding to the real concerns of farmers and growers in this country. I am delighted that the Minister has found time to come to the House after a year in office at least to discuss agriculture. It is a pity that some of his Ministers cannot find time to join me when I meet real farmers at the Devon county show tomorrow. Lord Donoughue is in Devon, but he refuses to meet farmers. We shall hear the true and authentic voice of British farming when we are out and about at the agricultural shows.

This debate will enable us to see in stark terms how hard the shoe is pinching in rural Britain as a result of the way in which the Government have conducted their stewardship of their farming responsibilities. The rural economy in this country is really suffering. For some who are listening to the debate, Agenda 2000 will seem a distant prospect because farmers and agribusinesses are going to the wall now. We shall say more about that later in the debate.

The debate will also give the House an opportunity to assess whether the Agenda 2000 proposals will allow Britain's efficient farmers to prosper in an ever more competitive world or merely do the minimum required to get the World Trade Organisation off our backs. As I said a moment ago, the harsh reality of farming today in this country—which the Minister did not want to talk about—is illustrated by the Ministry's own figures. Farm incomes fell last year by 45 per cent. and the value of farming output fell by £1.9 billion. The value of subsidies was down by £322 million, including the hill livestock compensatory allowances which are so vital to the Minister's farming constituents, and which were cut by £35 million. Farmers also know that price fixing for next year—consideration of which is part of the debate—offers them little prospect of additional help or relief.

Mrs. Campbell: Is it not true that current farm incomes are at about the same level as they were more than a decade ago in 1985–86? Can the right hon. Gentleman confirm those figures?

Mr. Jack: The hon. Lady should try convincing real farmers that that kind of retrospective analysis has any relevance to their current situation. That is typical of Labour's lack of understanding, lack of sympathy and lack of appreciation of the real problems facing farmers. In any event, I think that the hon. Lady has cited cash figures rather than real figures.

As if that is not enough, farmers have had to face the endless uncertainty surrounding the lifting of the beef ban. The Minister has today removed a little of that uncertainty, but we clearly do not know what other member states will say. I have received letters from the Danish and German Ministers asking questions about the procedures that we have in place. I hope that they were convinced by the Minister's display. If it was as good as he says, let us hope that they will stop prevaricating, agree that we have met the Florence agreement terms and lift the beef ban once and for all.

Farmers have also faced the beef-on-the-bone ban this year. Perhaps the Minister should spend a little time reading Farmers Weekly. If he did, he would read how Rev. Ian Hall, the vicar of Eskdale in the Minister's constituency, describes that policy as a "pig's ear" and as "draconian". The Minister is condemned out of the mouths of his own constituents. What was his response?

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West) rose—

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle) rose—

Mr. Jack: I will not give way at the moment. The Minister's response to the problems of agriculture was to spend the equivalent of half the annual income of a Cumbrian hill farmer on an antique reproduction desk for his office. It is little wonder that another of the Minister's constituents, Joss Naylor of Bowderdale, told Farmers Weekly that the Minister

"has gone very wrong, like a lot of people when they get into a job like that . . . his heart is set on doing away with the little farms that have made the Lake District what it is today."

I am glad that my constituents are not saying that about me or any of my right hon. and hon. Friends.

Mr. Charles Kennedy: I am interested that the right hon. Gentleman has chosen to refer to the ban on beef on the bone. He will remember that when we debated that issue in the House, the Conservatives and the Liberal Democrats voted together. I am sure that he, like me, welcomes the initial outcome of the decision at Selkirk sheriff's court in the Scottish borders, which went against the case advanced by the Government—although the matter is still before the Court of Session in Edinburgh. If he does welcome that result, what is his view about the Scottish Tory party's claim that that case should not have gone to court in the first place?

Mr. Jack: The case did go to court, and the hon. Gentleman's remarks have shown clearly that the Minister is incapable even of doing the wrong thing correctly.

We have heard much about Labour's views on reform of the common agricultural policy. In its publication, "The CAP—Time for a Change", Labour said:

"the family farm structure of much of the industry and the role of farming in the rural areas . . . these factors together make farming deserving of special attention".

What kind of special attention have the Government given farming? If the Minister had spoken to any of the farmers who demonstrated at our ports or who marched in London, he would know that they believe that they have received sympathetic consideration whatsoever—and certainly no special treatment.

Anyone who heard the Minister's hard-nosed speech at the annual general meeting of the National Farmers Union will know exactly what I mean. It made a mockery of Labour's claim that things could only get better. The situation in farming has got considerably worse since 1 May. Family farms will be £20 a week worse off as a result of tax rises in the Budget—so much for special treatment for farmers.

Part of the crisis in British farming is a result—

Mr. Martlew: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Jack: The hon. Gentleman should be patient; he is irritated because I am getting under his skin. He always interrupts me when we get to the truth of the matter.

Part of the problem is that the Government subcontracted the setting of interest rates to the Bank of England. The pound soared because rates were too high. There have been three green pound revaluations. That has cost farming £522 million, according to the NFU, and has encouraged a flood of imports that has kicked the floor out from under agricultural prices. That is what has caused the crisis in farming. What did we get from the Minister when farmers appealed for help? We got the usual mantra that no money was available because of the self-imposed public spending position and that agrimonetary compensation arrangements were not available to farmers.

Even on the last point, we found the Minister wanting. We analysed the MAFF annual report and, as verified by the Library of the House of Commons, clearly showed that he had underspent his budget last year by £139 million, and that he planned to underspend by £46 million this year. Before he gets to his feet, I should say that I accept the line of argument in his rebuttal that his Ministry is not sitting on a pile of money. In strict public expenditure terms, however, if he had had the real interests of farming at heart, in these exceptional times he would have used that as a bargaining chip in asking the Chief Secretary to the Treasury about using that money. Instead, British farmers' own money has gone back into the Treasury. The Minister does not have the courage to ask for it from the Treasury; if he had done so, he could have levered in £200 million of agrimonetary help to farmers, or provided special help schemes to see them through these difficult times.

Dr. John Cunningham: The right hon. Gentleman came out with that utter rubbish on 30 April during agriculture questions, and I immediately wrote to him. He is comparing estimated and forecast expenditure with outturn expenditure. He is a former Treasury Minister, so that says a lot about his failure to understand Government accounting. As he knows, there was no underspend in my departmental budget last year, and there is no planned underspend this year. His remarks are not only rubbish, but deeply misleading to farmers, and he should be ashamed of himself.

Mr. Jack: I am surprised that the Minister does not know the difference between a public spending total and outturn, because that is what my figures are based on. I have checked them with the Library and I have talked to the Institute for Fiscal Studies.

Dr. Cunningham: Rubbish.

Mr. Jack: It is great to hear the Minister rubbishing the Library of the House of Commons and the IFS. I am sorry that he has contradicted them; I wanted to make sure that my facts were right, and he has proved that they were.

The Minister talked about agrimonetary arrangements. When he pays attention, I shall ask him two questions—the ones that farmers want answered. Will farmers be able to receive their payments in euros after 1 January? Will the Minister be more specific about what will happen at the end of the year, because if we do not save the current 11 per cent. shield on agrimonetary arrangements, farming will lose £400 million?

I asked Farmers Weekly whether there were any questions that farmers wanted to ask the Minister at this stage in our debate. Mr. Peter Hall, of Wrexham, asked:

"Why is it that in just 12 months of a Labour government, the confidence of farmers has declined so dramatically?"

That sums up the mood of farming. Mr. Rich, of St. Buryan, asked the Minister:

"Do you want us? If so, let us know your forward planning. If not . . . lie low."

Mr. Leslie Foss asked:

"What is the future for . . . young farmers?"

Mr. Ward, of Rotherham, asked whether the Minister would do anything to help lowland suckler herds. I could go on and on, but I shall send the Minister those searching questions. If the Government are the people's Government, the people's farmers deserve a reply from him.

The rural economy is suffering as a result of the Government's policies. For example, is the Minister proud of the findings of a report by the Welsh Institute of Rural Studies in Aberystwyth, which forecasts a loss of 5,000 rural jobs in Wales over the next decade? That is a rather odd statistic to discuss when the Government's welfare-to-work scheme is coming into play, but that is the situation in Wales, a key part of the United Kingdom which is dependent on agriculture.

The situation is similar in the rest of the country, and agricultural jobs are being lost. For example, there have been 23 redundancies at Ryehill Farm Services in Malton, Carter Agricultural in Norfolk has reduced its work force by 25 per cent., and the labour force at Lumeter Ltd. in Oldbury is down by 20 per cent. There are many more examples of where the shoe is pinching tightly as a result of the Government's stewardship of agriculture. My hon. Friend the Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman), if she catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will give more information.

Mr. Alan W. Williams (East Carmarthen and Dinefwr): The right hon. Gentleman mentioned Wales and has dwelt on farmers' incomes. The leading article in last week's Farmers Guardian discusses the effect of the euro and is based on Barclays bank's suggestion that farmers should ask for payments to be made in euros and open accounts so that they can borrow at European interest rates of 3 or 3.5 per cent. Where does the Conservative party stand on the euro? In view of the comments of the Leader of the Opposition last Tuesday, are the Opposition in serious danger of being overtaken by events? All farmers will want us to join the single currency.

Mr. Jack: If the hon. Gentleman had been awake a few moments ago, he would have heard my question on that point.

Mr. Paterson: My right hon. Friend might like to reflect on the fact that, outside the Welsh Grand Committee, farmers booed the hon. Member for East Carmarthen and Dinefwr (Mr. Williams) when he tried to speak to them in public.

Mr. Jack: I thank my hon. Friend for that observation; I think that I have dealt with the matter.

I put to the Minister four key points on Agenda 2000 which deserve a reply: they are the acid test for the way in which we should consider it. First, will it make British farming more competitive? Secondly, will it avoid knock-on or distortive consequences? Thirdly, will it simplify bureaucratic procedures? Fourthly, will it leave farming profitable? An inevitable consequence of it is that agricultural decision making must become ever more market based, and the cost of the CAP must be reduced for Europe's taxpayers. In the past, we supported reform of the common market agricultural policy, and we favour fundamental reform now. It is ironic, however, that the Labour party backed reduced cost for the CAP in its pre-election rhetoric; the policy before the Council of Ministers is costed at more than the CAP.

The way in which Agenda 2000 has been introduced represents a lost opportunity for Europe fundamentally to rethink its agricultural policy. If it was interested in more competitive agriculture in Europe, there would not have been a proposal to put 1 per cent. of additional milk quota—as the Minister rightly reminded us—up the mountains and in the hands of some of Europe's least efficient dairy producers. There would have been a very different regime. There is no discussion in Agenda 2000 of the new agriculture, products and crops being pioneered in this country by organisations such as Anglian Industrial Crops. The current policy is being chipped away to make it friendly in the eyes of the WTO.

We strongly back the proposals in Agenda 2000 further to decouple support from production, while recognising that farmers have wider responsibilities as strategic food producers and environmental custodians of the countryside. Where will the measures be subjected to the greatest pressure? It is a pity that Ministers are engaging in conversation while we are asking relevant questions on behalf of farmers. I repeat the question. Where does the Minister think that the measures will come under the greatest pressure, either from within the EU or from the World Trade Organisation? Does he think that the current reform package, which tries to be all things to all men, is the best way in which to approach these crucial negotiations?

I welcome the Minister's commitment to defend the interests of Britain's more efficient and larger farms. I should like to examine his language in responding to the Select Committee on this issue. He said that he would seek to avoid conclusions that discriminated against the interests of UK agriculture. Why did he not employ more vigorous language in his reply by committing the Government to negotiate with our partners to convince them that Agenda 2000 must not discriminate against efficient, larger farms, especially those in the United Kingdom?

Can the Minister give a cast-iron assurance that he will oppose ceilings that would reduce payments according to farm size? Will the continued existence of subsidies that are linked to production be acceptable to the WTO? Can he say more about his environmental requirements on cross-compliance, on the loss of income and on the factors that will have an impact on farmers who breach the cross-compliance requirements? What about national envelopes? Will he guarantee that all the money that is taken under the terms of national envelopes will be spent on United Kingdom farms, or will he do as he did with his underspend and simply return the money to the Treasury?

We need to know more about the Minister's flexibility under the new proposals. We should like to hear more about the operation of the new objective 3 rural policies. Will fewer people be covered by them? How will the Minister ensure that tenant farmers in new agri-based businesses will be able fully to take advantage of the new arrangements? Such farmers are a significant and important part of British farming, but, under the current law, their tenancy agreements prevent them from diversifying in the way that is suggested by Agenda 2000.

My right hon. and hon. Friends will highlight the problems of British agriculture and the challenges that it will face under Agenda 2000. They will highlight the fact that while the Minister has had stewardship of British agriculture, he has shown little sympathy or understanding for the real needs of Britain's farmers. It is only through the Opposition that their voice can truly be heard.

6.2 pm

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle): I have spoken in many debates on agriculture but in none of them have there been more Labour Members than Conservatives. That shows the Government's interest in agriculture and suggests that Conservative Members have caught the early train home.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on the excellent job he has done over the past 12 months. He had a difficult job and took over from the worst Minister this century. He has been criticised by the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack), who was a MAFF Minister in the previous Government. The right hon. Gentleman spoke about the ban on beef on the bone. During the statement on that ban, the right hon. Gentleman did not criticise it, and the leader of the Conservative party supported it. It was only when Conservatives thought that they could make a party political issue out of it that they opposed the ban, and that has happened again in this debate.

I shall not spend any more time speaking about Conservatives because some local issues have worried me over the years. One of them is the sale of green-top milk, which is raw and unpasteurised. It is said that people should be given the freedom to buy it, but I worked in the dairy industry for 20 years and I do not think that it is safe. The Government are putting the facts together, and if the scientific facts show that green-top milk should be banned, they should ban it. If that happens, there will be an outcry in the press, and the Opposition and perhaps some spin doctors will say that it should not be banned. However, if we are not careful there will be an outbreak resulting in fatalities. Outbreaks from such sources often affect the young, and I should not like to be here if a Labour Government put young people at risk.

Milk quotas were introduced because of a milk surplus in Europe, but that merely swapped one problem for another. Quotas were traded and no milk was involved. I am sorry that quotas will not be phased out much faster. To do that may mean reducing milk support to world levels, but it would be worth it, especially for British farmers who are probably the most efficient in Europe. Cumbria contains many efficient farmers, but they are not producing milk on the fells. It is nonsense to give extra quota to the mountainous areas of Europe. It should be given to places such as the Eden valley, Solway plain, Cheshire and the south-west.

I visited a local farmer at the end of March towards the end of the quota term. He had to stop good milk entering the system because he was over quota. He had a major problem, but he could not pour the surplus down the drain because, if he had, the Environment Agency would have chased him. We must get rid of quotas as soon as possible. I recently spent a weekend in Buttermere, which is probably one of the world's most beautiful places. It is in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), as is Borrowdale. I first visited the area 30 years ago as a schoolboy. [Interruption.] Well, perhaps more than 30 years ago.

In that area, I noticed a difference in the landscape that was not due to tourism, because that is controlled by the Lake District planning board. The difference was not even the yellow lines on country roads. It was the effect of overgrazing on the fells. The system encourages farmers to put too many sheep on the hills, and that is destroying the habitat. When I was there, a gale was blowing and many of the old trees were being felled. However, there is no natural regeneration of the woodlands. They have gone because Europe pays farmers to produce more, although demand for beef and sheep meat is going down. We must quickly take action on that.

When major changes in agriculture occurred in New Zealand, marginal land was abandoned, but Britain will not accept such a policy because, to many of us, such land forms the most beautiful parts of our country. Therefore, we must have a system whereby we target money to those farmers, so that they continue to farm, but at a less intensive rate and we keep them in that area. We have to do that by specifically saying to them that we will help them to maintain the countryside and give them extra money.

Mr. Cynog Dafis (Ceredigion): In that case, does the hon. Gentleman agree that the line that is being pursued by the Government—that we need to reduce the number of people who farm in upland and mountainous areas—is exactly the wrong approach?

Mr. Martlew: That is a misinterpretation of what the Government are saying. There is a feeling that farmers who farm marginal land are not very well rewarded, which they never have been, and that we should perhaps encourage some of them to amalgamate and give them extra resources. What we should not do is force them off the land. We should have a system whereby they can stay. However, we have a difficulty in giving taxpayers' money to farmers because we appear to give the money to all farmers. That creates resentment among the general public. Often, people see that farmers live in bigger houses, drive better cars and have greater capital assets than they do, yet they are expected to subsidise them, so we must specifically target farmers who have real problems.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Martlew: I am sorry. I have only 10 minutes. I am not going to give way.

Animal welfare is another issue which concerns me. As some hon. Members may remember, I introduced a Bill to ban the export of calves to Europe in veal crates. It was stopped by the previous Government, but then the trade was stopped by BSE, which was caused by them.

Animal welfare in this country is the best in Europe. I give credit to the previous Government. They brought in legislation that was far in advance of that anywhere else in Europe. We pressured Europe to improve conditions. I am sure that, under the ministry of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, my hon. Friend the Member for Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley), that will continue, but we have to say to people that if we are paying billions of pounds of taxpayers' money to the CAP, we should make animal welfare a major priority.

I do not wish to say any more because many other hon. Members wish to speak, but I am pleased to say again that the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has done a very good job, under difficult circumstances.

6.12 pm

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West): Obviously, it is very difficult to follow a speech as savage as the one that has just been delivered, particularly the peroration. Therefore, I hope that the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will be—I am sure he will—robust enough to deal with constructive criticism that is not quite as overly wired-in and sycophantic as the remarks of the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew). It is very good that those remarks will appear in Hansard, because, if the hon. Member is seeking higher things in the Labour party, it will do him good to have that confirmation coming from occasional partners on certain constitutional issues on the Liberal Democrat Benches. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] I think that that is an open secret; I do not think that there is much doubt about that.

The speech of the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) was disappointing; in a way, the Government got rather an easy ride from the so-called official Opposition—[Interruption.] I am glad that they have come to life. They did not come to life during the right hon. Gentleman's speech; it is nice that they have come to life during this one. It is none the less an important debate and it is timely for two reasons. First, there is a genuine crisis—crisis is a word which is much overused in politics by all of us—in agriculture throughout the UK. Secondly, the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Government as a whole hold the presidency of the Council of Ministers.

It is a bit bizarre—it says a lot about this place—that more has not been said about the presidency. People have very short memories. When, a few months ago, the Prime Minister unveiled at Waterloo station, in all that glitzy, glamorous style of his, his headline objectives for the presidency, he singled out CAP reform as one of the principal objectives. Then, after the discussions with Chancellor Kohl and the German Government made it clear that, with the elections coming up in the autumn, which looked problematical then and look even more problematical now, they were not willing to countenance any significant or fundamental changes to the CAP before those elections, reform slipped drastically down the agenda.

That was a disappointment. We read in the newspapers about what European agriculture Ministers were eating, what they were going to see and what delights they were going to sample—I am sure that they had an excellent time when they were hosted by the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food—but we have heard precious little during or since last week about what was achieved in practical terms. I found it telling that the Minister had nothing whatever to say about that.

One would have thought that, in a round-robin debate highlighting CAP reform, the Minister would have been able to give the House more of an indication of the progress that had been made under his chairmanship during the six months. That speaks volumes for the Government's approach. The style is good, but the substance, when we begin to look at the detail, simply is not there. It is that detail which I want to deal with in my remarks on behalf of the Liberal Democrats.

The first detail—detail is perhaps the wrong term to use; let us say the first item—is the strength of currency. My hon. Friend the Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) made a speech to that effect in the House earlier this week. Without going through all the details of that again, there is not a shadow of doubt that the sheer strength of sterling is placing the most profound pressure on every section of manufacturing industry, and agriculture is a primary example.

It is extremely significant—I do not blame the Conservative spokesman for not wanting to delve into the issue—and pertinent that the NFU leadership has come out as unequivocally as it has in favour of a single European currency. It recognises two things: first, the way in which events are moving; it recognises that if that famous train is departing, it is better to be coupled to it than to be left on the platform. Secondly, the leadership hears what its constituents, its fee-paying members, are telling it at the grassroots: the strength of sterling at present is a massive disincentive to their agricultural efforts.

That is why we remain not just committed to the single European currency on principle, but frustrated that the Government are not seizing the golden opportunity that the presidency has given them to drive that event forward and to be in the driving seat. That would have been a major psychological and practical boost to farming incomes. Farming incomes in Wales are, I think, worse than those in any other part of the UK, but they are by no means the exception. They have been driven down over the past 12 months.

Reading the Conservative amendment, one would think that the world suddenly started at the stroke of midnight on, or into the early hours of, 1 May last year, and that all the policy initiatives that the Conservatives suddenly seem to favour and all the things that they are against were a road to Damascus conversion that happened some time on 1 and 2 May last year. Of course, that is not the case, and farmers, perhaps more than most sections of the community, tend to have long memories. They are traditional people and, often, several generations of the same family have managed the plot of land and business. They will not forget that many of the difficulties that are highlighted in the Conservative amendment, and replicated in the Liberal Democrat amendment, did not arise in the past 12 months. The root of them lies in the difficulties that attended farming during the previous Administration.

Mrs. Ray Michie: Does my hon. Friend think that the Minister really understands rural parts of Wales, for example, and the highlands and islands, where crofting and family farms undoubtedly sustain the economy, the population and the environment? We are not talking about amalgamations and agribusinesses. We need to keep people in such areas, and agriculture is one of the ways of achieving that.

Mr. Kennedy: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Her intervention brings us to the heart of CAP reform. We should be trying to protect and promote the family farm, not just for reasons of sentiment but for reasons of sense. The Minister talks about restructuring agriculture. I remember Margaret Thatcher talking about restructuring coal, steel and various other industries in the 1980s. Restructuring is a very ominous term. My worry, which is shared widely outside the House, is that the Government's approach to Agenda 2000 and CAP reform is to restructure, as my hon. Friend the Member for Argyll and Bute (Mrs. Michie) rightly acknowledged, in a way that we do not want—into agribusiness and much bigger holdings, so that the family farm will be lost.

The Government have not given nearly enough sensitive thought or attention during their presidency to the fact that if we want more sustainability, more environmental responsibility and more active husbandry of the landscape, we need people to achieve it. Mr. Fischler can come out with the most amazing ideas, the Council of Ministers can modify them in the most brilliant ways, but if, in the interim, the Government's restructuring instincts bear fruit, we will not have the personnel to deliver the desired policy.

Mr. Swinney: Does the hon. Gentleman share my concern that there is a danger of two forms of restructuring: one due to the strength of sterling, which is forcing people out of the industry, and the other due to the fact that, potentially, we are sleepwalking into Agenda 2000, which favours larger holdings and forcing people off some of our most fragile land?

Mr. Kennedy: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. He is absolutely right. His part of Perthshire, for example, is a classic example of an area that could be endangered in the longer term if we go blindly—sleepwalking is a very good way of putting it—into such a cul de sac. There is no viable option for many people in such areas short of some land-environment-conservation-husbandry role in the local community. The Government have not given sufficient sustained thought to that.

Mr. Jack rose—

Mr. Kennedy: Having been so critical of the right hon. Gentleman, it would be churlish not to give way to him.

Mr. Jack: May I ask a simple question? What is the Liberal Democrats' view of labour unit modulation?

Mr. Kennedy: That is at the heart of the matter, too. It was interesting what the Minister alluded to in his speech. If modulation is applied in the way in which it is being suggested at European level, it will be doubly damaging to UK farming interests because of the issue of size. I hope that we might hear a little more about the matter in the Minister of State's winding-up speech.

I noted that the Minister referred to the national application of modulation. I am not quite sure what he meant by that. If he meant what I hope he means, the phrase is encouraging. I hope that, as and when modulation is introduced, the Government intend there to be repatriation—that is a dirty word to use in politics due to the late Enoch Powell, but I use it in the best sense—of degrees of decision making. As the UK is evolving, with the Welsh assembly, the Scottish Parliament and, let us hope, a Northern Ireland assembly, I hope that discretion will be devolved to this member state to apply modulation sufficiently sympathetically and sensitively to UK agricultural interests.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kennedy: No, I will not—but it is very nice to see the hon. Gentleman.

I hope that the Government will take on board points made about modulation and that we are able to make common cause across the Floor of the House on it, because we recognise something of a east-west divide in Scotland, England and Wales over the issue.

We are considering a very difficult situation against the backdrop of CAP reform, and, perhaps, this debate has not so far addressed that. However, we would be wrong not to hold the Government to account or absolve them from responsibility for the extra costs that they are choosing to impose on agriculture. We know that there are already higher charges in the knackery sector. We know that there will be extra costs for pig and poultry farmers in order to comply with EU environmental and pollution legislation. Incidentally, such farmers do not receive EU support.

There are new costs for pig accommodation, new rules on calf accommodation, proposed tagging of sheep and pigs, proposed changes in standards for poultry, likely new EU groundwater directive supervision charges and unilateral rules imposed on specified risk material. Those are significant add-on costs to any business, but to impose them on agriculture during an agricultural recession is perverse.

The Government and the Liberal Democrats disagree in principle about the use of tax revenue. As they well know, we favour more largesse and, if necessary, more taxation to provide it. None the less, we argue strongly that imposing additional charges on the farming community without introducing sufficient compensatory measures makes a very bad situation even worse. We urge the Government to reconsider.

The way forward on CAP reform generally and Agenda 2000 in particular must surely be towards family-farm based agriculture that conforms with the size of local communities and places greater emphasis on husbandry of local land. The deep dilemma for so many people in agriculture is that they are listening to a Government who are paying lip service to CAP reform, but talking about restructuring British agriculture. The net effect of their policy will be not only contradictory and self-defeating but utterly disastrous for the future of family farms, particularly in marginal parts. If the Government take any message from this debate it should be that, as they approach the end of a rather dispiriting and disappointing UK presidency, they should think afresh and think again.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge): I am very pleased to have the opportunity of speaking in this debate. I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on the progress that he has made in having the Northern Ireland beef ban lifted, and on the database scheme for all animals born after 1996 in the United Kingdom. Those developments represent huge progress, and belie the final remark made by the hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy) on the Government's performance in the European Union presidency.

Tremendous progress has been made, and I know that my right hon. Friend will continue to make such progress. Common agricultural policy reform is one of the Government's priorities, and I am pleased that it has the Government's backing.

Agenda 2000 is preparing the European Union for enlargement to the east, and to deal with pressure in the World Trade Organisation to liberalise European agriculture. Enlargement is desirable, and it is vital that the states of central and eastern Europe are brought into the European Union. If they are not, the likely result will be economic, political and, potentially, military instability.

Enlargement will bring two problems, the first of which is institutional design. There is growing criticism of using the same institutions to govern 20 or more member states as were used in governance of the original six member states.

Although the institutional issue has never really been comprehensively addressed, I think that the budgetary implications of enlargement are more immediate and urgent. Because of the Maastricht convergence criteria, the European Union budget will not expand significantly after enlargement, thereby putting pressure on the major item of European Union expenditure—the common agricultural policy.

I do not think that anyone would quarrel with the policy goals—which I have re-examined—incorporated into the treaty of Rome: a fair standard of living for farmers, reasonable prices for consumers, and creation and fostering of stable markets for agricultural commodities. However, the mechanism by which those goals were to be achieved is ineffective. It is certainly outdated.

The mechanism is essentially Commission central planning within a market structure. Wholesale price floors and ceilings have been established for a range of commodities. The European Union purchases intervention stock if the market price falls below the floor, and it pays export subsidies to producers when the market price rises above the ceiling. Although I am critical now of the mechanism, initially it was successful, and the sector moved into structural surplus in the 1970s.

The common agricultural policy transformed the European Community from a net importer to a net exporter, which was crucial to achieving the goals of European security and economic recovery. However, by the end of 1990, despite the export subsidy regime, there were 14.4 million tonnes of cereals, 600,000 tonnes of dairy produce and 530,000 tonnes of beef in public intervention storage. Spending on the CAP doubled in real terms between the mid-1970s the mid-1980s. Even the extra expenditure was not sufficient to control the overproduction that was inherent within the system.

Market price support is a highly inefficient way for Governments to give aid to a sector of the economy. Such support requires, among other things, very large and unpredictable levels of Government expenditure, while offering no way of ensuring that the most needy farmers receive the most subsidy. I hope that, in our presidency of the European Union, we will address that issue, which is one of the most important principles of social justice.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Campbell: I am not giving way, as I have only 10 minutes and should like to put as much as I can into them.

The common agricultural policy isolates producers from the market, providing a financial incentive simply to produce the maximum possible quantity, as producers know that anything that cannot be sold on the market will be purchased by the European Union. The very good brief that we have had from Compassion in World Farming states that that organisation feels that it is unacceptable to incentivise livestock overproduction, and then either to slaughter or export that livestock to limit the effect of that surplus. I could not agree more.

The CAP also raises many environmental concerns. Maximum-quantity production entails the use of large amounts of fertilisers and fungicides—chemicals to reduce plant growth, and sprays to reduce disease—which have potentially harmful effects on local water supplies and the food chain.

Soil erosion is becoming a serious problem. My hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) mentioned the problem when he was describing the overgrazing problem in high areas near his constituency. Soil erosion occurs also in lower areas. I well remember that—during the general election campaign, when I was driving to help my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke)—I saw soil blowing off the fields because of soil erosion caused by intensive farming practices. The soil blown off fields ends up as silt in rivers and streams, which is a major cause of flood damage—an issue to which I have drawn the House's attention on a number of occasions.

Price support creates artificially high food prices in Europe, and depresses world food prices, as the export subsidy allows European Union produce to be sold below the world price. Price support makes life very difficult for farmers in developing countries, who cannot sell their output at a fair price.

The common agricultural policy is also deeply untransparent in its financial dealings. Through price support, it makes a large resource transfer from EU consumers to producers. If its revenue were raised through direct taxation rather than high food prices, there would be huge public dissatisfaction with current policy.

The 1992 MacSharry reforms were introduced to strengthen the European Union's hand in the Uruguay round of the general agreement on tariffs and trade, trying to create a shift from price support to direct payments to farmers. Intervention prices were cut, and removed altogether for some commodities.

The reforms had some very minor effects. Arable farms were subjected to rotation or set-aside, for example, although we discovered subsequently that the practice may encourage more intensive farming methods on fields. That reform has not been successful in reducing production.

Labour reduction on farms was achieved by introducing favourable early retirement terms, thereby reducing the number of people working in the industry. Additionally, environmental guidance was given, although I feel sure that it could be strengthened.

The 1992 reforms had some successes. However, I think that the Agenda 2000 proposals will attempt to deal more radically with the structural problems in the European Union—although perhaps not as radically as many Labour Members would like. I certainly encourage the Government to continue to press, within the European Union, not only for more radical reform than is currently on the table but for the much-needed structural change—decried by the hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West—that is so badly needed if we are to provide more and better support for the most needy farmers, and not necessarily for big agribusinesses.

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon): I am tempted to begin by recommending to the Government that they take a firm stand against any type of common agricultural policy reform, on the ground that most reformed CAP systems cost more than their predecessors. I recommended to the previous Government that they take that unique stand in their general election manifesto. Although I was not successful in getting that suggestion accepted, history may show that there may have been a grain of truth in the idea.

Even if we were to take the stand that I suggested, we would be in a wholly untenable position, as two great juggernauts are bearing down on the CAP. The first one is enlargement, with which Agenda 2000 attempts to deal. The key element in enlargement is Poland. In determining the future shape of agriculture in Europe, Poland is more important than all the other countries put together.

The second, and more important and inescapable development, is the Singapore round of the general agreement on tariffs and trade, or the World Trade Organisation. It is important to realise the extent to which the decisions that we shall have to make in that round have already been conditioned by the decisions that we made in the previous round. The framework has already been set by those decisions.

If the European Union wants to attack world markets and be free to take advantage of, for example, consumer opportunities in south-east Asia and of the productivity gains that remorselessly occur in agriculture—whether or not they are convenient—it must free itself from its dependence on export subsidy. While the EU is dependent on export subsidy, it is locked into having fixed quantities to put on the world market. We effectively have no choice if we want our agriculture to look outwards, towards an international competitive environment.

Of course, farmers will react differently. There will inevitably be a generation gap in agriculture. For some in the dairy industry, particularly elderly farmers who are locked into farm tenancies in difficult areas, the milk quota is their pension. They would be reluctant for quotas to disappear because that is the only pension to which they can aspire. Their sons might well consider the milk quota an imprisonment that prevents them from getting more productivity out of their farm. They may face having to de-intensify and produce less because of the cost problems of having to hire extra staff.

An important third force, which is just as powerful and must be understood, is consumer demand and what the marketplace is asking for within our shores. The demands for traceability, farm assurance, better welfare standards, health undertakings and environmental protection and conservation represent, initially, costs to the farmer; but they are also conditions that he must meet so that the marketplace is willing to take, and will be satisfied with, his product.

Farmers may rail, as I know they do from time to time, at what they see as the iniquities of Tesco and Sainsbury's, but that is futile because the supermarkets are at the cutting edge of consumer demand. They provide one of the major outlets for farmers, and it is in farmers' long-term interests to work alongside the supermarkets and produce what they require.

It is interesting that, in the present circumstances, those pressures come together in a series of outcomes to reform. A move to direct aid divorced from production is, first, the essential policy underlying Agenda 2000. Secondly, it is the key formulation required to achieve a successful outcome in the World Trade Organisation. Thirdly, it is the outcome which most commends itself to environmental and consumer interests. For once, we have the opportunity to square the circle—or, at least, the triangle—by having a method of sustaining agriculture that meets with the approval of consumers and taxpayers, conforms with the requirements of GATT and opens the way for the enlargement of the Community and the eastward extension of the liberal society, which is what almost every hon. Member desires.

We need to work out the scenarios by which we can achieve an effective construct of non-production aids. We have a great deal of experience with relatively small-scale schemes, such as the environmentally sensitive areas and countryside stewardship. I know that in Wales there are schemes that work very effectively. We need a codification or a menu of those schemes, so that, before we take part in the GATT talks and consider the outcomes, we have an idea of the offers that we will be able to put before farmers. That might help us to come out of the GATT round with a clear idea of how to use those schemes constructively. That is a proposal which the Select Committee could consider, but it will not be easy.

In the Yorkshire dales, in my constituency, it is obvious that we would want to preserve environmental assets such as stone walls, barn roofs, meadows and woodlands—and in Somerset, the water meadows—but it is less obvious in Cambridgeshire and parts of East Anglia. It is important to begin setting out what environmental aid farmers would be eligible for as we move towards greater dependence on that aid and away from production aid.

I am not an enthusiast for cross-compliance because it is too linked to output, and the two should be divorced. However, I understand that it has attractions as a transitional instrument.

There are implications for reform, and on that point I agree with the hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy). We shall inevitably see the development of more corporate agriculture, which, with the demand for agricultural investment, the possibility of expansion, the pressures on costs—including labour costs—and inputs, and the requirements to conform to quality standards, represents a push towards greater size in agriculture.

That development is occurring in the dairy sector, where about 11,000 producers now account for well over 50 per cent. of output, and in pig production, where 80 per cent. of pig meat is produced by 2,000 mainland British producers out of 10,000. It can also be seen in the continuing change in the arable sector: when a farm comes up for sale, the land is sold to the neighbouring farmer and the household to an individual.

Conversely, an expansion of part-time farming is also likely. That trend is already occurring on farms where the income depends on a second source that is not identified with production. We need to sustain and support such agriculture. Agriculture should not be viewed as an activity unto itself, divorced from the wider needs of the rural economy, or as a religious practice, separate from the wider rural community.

The long-term future must depend on market orientation for agricultural output and, therefore, the ability of farmers to bid into programmes. I would not object if we experimented with competitive programmes to deliver environmental and other assets. Indeed, I should be interested to examine—I know that this idea is being discussed in Wales—the possibility of developing social assets, such as farmers' employment and housing, to be capable of being delivered or safeguarded as part of the wider reform of agriculture. I wanted to focus on the long term because I thought that much of the debate would necessarily focus on the immediate concerns.

In the short term, we need for agriculture, as for much of business, a clear path to the single currency set out by the Government. We have a pound that is too high and volatile. We have five tests set by the Chancellor—only one matters, but getting five ducks in a row is not possible for anybody at any time. We have an uneasy triangle between the Prime Minister, the Chancellor and Mr. Murdoch. We have doubts over the period of exchange rate stability before we are eligible to join a single currency.

We desperately need clarification and an indication to the market of the Government's intentions, because the market takes note and deals with the currency in the light of those. At the moment, the market does not know what intentions to attribute to the Government. That is a major problem for everybody in the United Kingdom, and farmers suffer most immediately because of the green pound effects. Change is inescapable, but the present coruscating crisis can be alleviated only by the Government accepting their responsibilities.

Mr. Paul Marsden (Shrewsbury and Atcham): When I read the official Opposition's amendment to the motion, I wondered who had written it because it is misleading and full of errors. I then listened to the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) and realised that he must have had a hand in it because his tub-thumping speech—which was completely devoid of reality—was meant simply to rouse farmers and farming communities by rhetoric, not fact.

I was also amazed at the Opposition's proclamation that the common agricultural policy should be brought under stricter financial control. I agree with that, but I found it a little strange coming from the right hon. Member for Fylde, because, over the 18 years of Tory Government, the UK contribution to the CAP rose by 79 per cent., which meant a net outflow of £2.1 billion from this country. Obviously the right hon. Gentleman has a short memory. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister can start correcting some of the horrendous mistakes in those finances that date from the Tory past.

Under Agenda 2000, I shall focus on the plight of the rural areas. That, too, has been caused by the Tory Government. Rural areas have been left with 29 per cent. of parishes not having a village hall, while 43 per cent. have no post office. Under the Tory Government, who withdrew investment from local authorities and did not care, post offices, shops and schools closed, and the bus route network collapsed. The Labour Government are now trying to turn that situation round, and I urge the Minister to continue with his endeavours towards an integrated rural policy within Agenda 2000.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Marsden: No, I would like to make some headway first.

As things stand, only about 4 per cent. of the budget proposed under Agenda 2000 will go towards rural development. That is not good enough. We must take a more holistic approach to rural development, and include social, economic and environmental factors as well as agricultural factors. That is vital if our rural communities are to survive.

I make a special plea for greater investment. I welcomed the news in the Budget that there would be £50 million for rural transport, and I hope that we can find even more money for that purpose, because access, especially to jobs, is so important for young people. They can be stranded in rural areas, with few job opportunities. I welcome, too, the Government's ventures into IT, and their attempts to open some of the village halls and provide more facilities for young people in rural areas.

Mr. Hayes: I agree with much of what the hon. Gentleman is saying about the need for an integrated rural policy, but how does he square that idea with the savage cuts to shire counties in the local government settlement? The settlement does not even enable the shires to maintain their level of services in rural areas, let alone to improve them as the hon. Gentleman suggests.

Mr. Marsden: Absolutely, and the answer is simple: it was the Tory party that saddled the Government with the spending plans by which we had to abide. We agreed at the election that we would abide by those plans, so the fault lies fairly and squarely with the Tory Government. [Interruption.] They are your spending plans.

Mr. Peter Bradley (The Wrekin): I make no secret of the fact that this year Shropshire, the county that my hon. Friend and I have the honour to represent, did not get the deal that we hope it will get next year. However, Shropshire's problem is the fact that this year's settlement came on top of four successive years of settlements under the previous Government, and the cumulative impact was a bridge too far for the county.

Is my hon. Friend aware that because of the Tory Government's deregulation of buses, 86 per cent. of parishes in rural Shropshire have no daily service? Fortunately, the Government are providing £700,000 for Shropshire's transport system to be improved, but, until we can reconnect people to employment, to schools, to health care, to training—[HON. MEMBERS: "Speech."]—to family, to friends and to shopping, we shall get nowhere in the rural areas.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. Interventions must be brief.

Mr. Marsden: I thank my hon. Friend for that interesting—[HON. MEMBERS: "Speech"]—set of points. I concur with what he said. Over the past five or six years, Shropshire has suffered cuts of about £40 million, thanks to the Conservative Government, and the sort of damage that that inflicted in terms of schools closing—

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow) rose—

Mr. Marsden: I have already given way. Time is short and I wish to press on now.

The Government have taken the right approach and I support their actions. They have new-found respect in Europe and are making great headway. In his absence, I put it to the right hon. Member for Fylde that, when he asks when the beef ban will be lifted, I remember the former Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) saying that it would be lifted six months after it was first imposed—in November 1996, I believe. I put the question straight back to the right hon. Member for Fylde: his right hon. Friend missed that deadline, did he not?

Labour Members firmly believe that the beef ban will be lifted. It is encouraging that it is to be lifted in Northern Ireland, and we now have a date that we can look forward to when exports from there will be allowed. I welcome the development of the cattle tracing system, the organic aid scheme, and improvements to animal welfare. Those are just some of the things that the Government have achieved in 12 short months, despite having had to pick up so many of the pieces left by the previous Government. I am confident that my constituents will bear with us while we continue to sort out the mess that we inherited.

I emphasise the need for a Ministry for rural affairs. We need a Department at Cabinet level that can adopt an integrated approach to rural affairs, which must embrace the socio-economic and environmental aspects as well as the agricultural aspects. It is important that those are all dealt with together, and rural communities will then have a clear focus and support at Cabinet level.

The Government have made great strides, and it is a bit rich when we hear from the Opposition Benches—

Mr. Paterson rose—

Mr. Marsden: I shall not give way, because my time is almost up.

It is a bit rich when Conservative Members try to seize the rural areas as their own. Rural areas do not belong to the Conservative Party; they did not at the general election, when far more Labour Members than Conservatives were returned for rural areas, and people clearly saw through the hypocrisy of the Tories' words.

We focus on the issues of health and education and on the importance of agriculture in those areas. That is what people want to hear, and that is what we shall deliver. Through my hon. Friend the Minister, we have made great progress in tackling CAP reform, and we are delivering on our promises—unlike the Tory Government, who repeatedly broke theirs.

6.57 pm

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire): As Chairman of the Agriculture Committee, I am tempted to respond to the words of the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Marsden) in a slightly more partisan way than I probably should. The hon. Gentleman is a fine Member of the Select Committee and I agreed with much of what he said. However, I have to say that this year's local government settlement really rigged things against the shire counties, for which Worcestershire is paying a heavy price.

I am sorry that there is so little time for the debate today. There will be time for only about eight Back-Bench contributions in what is probably one of the most important debates on agricultural issues that the House can have. It is also one of the most important debates in connection with the build-up to enlargement of the European Union, so it is a matter of regret that those on the Front Benches on both sides of the House agreed to allow only three hours for it. I hope that the usual channels will be able to arrange for another debate on agricultural issues to be held in the near future, to give the many Members on both sides of the House who would have liked to speak a chance to contribute on this important subject.

It is difficult to discuss reform of the common agricultural policy at a time when farm incomes have fallen so sharply. Inevitably, that will make farmers more nervous about the consequences of such reform. However, the House needs to send out a clear message that there is very broad cross-party consensus about the need for CAP reform, and also about the general shape of the reform needed.

No wonder farmers are concerned. My right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) has kindly shown me some of the questions sent to him by the readers of Farmers Weekly. Concern has been expressed by Mr. David Steed, from near Ramsgate, about the future of small farms; Mr. Robinson of Willow lodge, West Dereham, King's Lynn, has written about the possibility of a level playing field within the common agricultural policy. I understand and respect those concerns, but I think that we must press ahead with reform.

The Select Committee produced a report on CAP reform on 25 February. I am grateful to the Government for mentioning it in their motion and, indeed, for their response to it—there was no point of disagreement between the Committee and the Government, which is encouraging. It is also encouraging that the Committee was itself unanimous, despite comprising a broad range of views of European matters. The report said:

"The CAP, and its disproportionate spending, disfigures and discredits the European Union, turning an effort to build unity into unseemly horse-trading dominated by entrenched national and sectoral interests. The time has come for Europe to think radically and bring agriculture into the changed world. If the countries of Europe try to resist, they will be deluding themselves. The international pressure for freer trade and the consequences of enlargement are both irresistible."

I am grateful to members of the Select Committee for their hard work, and to our advisers, Professor Alan Buckwell of Wye college and Professor Alan Swinbank of Reading university. I think that our report made an important contribution to the debate on CAP reform.

The Committee made three background points in its report. First, we were concerned that the Government and their predecessor did not have a sufficiently clear strategy or vision for the future of United Kingdom agriculture, which inhibited their ability to negotiate effectively in the UK's interests. Secondly, we were deeply concerned that the Agenda 2000 proposals would increase, not reduce, CAP expenditure—we found that unacceptable. Thirdly, we found the Commission's outline proposals very timid. We felt that it should have taken a much more positive lead, forcing the Agriculture Council—which meets next week under the United Kingdom's presidency—to grasp more forcefully the nettle of CAP reform.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) said, the EU faces two huge challenges on CAP that cannot be ducked, no matter how much our colleagues on the mainland of Europe think that they can be. The first is the World Trade Organisation negotiations on agriculture, which are due to begin next year. The Commission's proposals are an inadequate basis for those discussions. The United States and the Cairns group will seize the moral high ground, whereas the Commission's proposals will give us little more than a base camp in the foothills.

Secondly, the proposals do nothing to deal with the problem of enlargement. How can there be two separate regimes for agriculture in a single market? There cannot possibly be two separate milk quota regimes, for example. Do we really believe that milk quotas can be imposed on Poland when Italy, as it freely acknowledges, found it very difficult to enforce them? The idea that the proposals will do anything to assist enlargement will, I fear, prove to be folly.

Mr. Hayes: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Luff: I should love to give way, but, as I have only 10 minutes, I do not have time, for which I apologise—I wish that we had more time for this debate.

I draw the attention of the House to some of the Committee's main recommendations. Direct compensatory payments are made to compensate farmers for reduced levels of price support, so we feel that, by definition, they cannot be permanent. They must be used to help farmers to adjust to new circumstances. Moreover, they must be time-limited and decrease over time—they must be, to use an ugly word, degressive. They must also be fully decoupled—they must provide no incentive to increase production.

The term modulation causes much confusion. In fact, two types of modulation are under discussion—differentiation and ceilings. I see the attraction of differentiation—varying the amount paid on the basis of a farm's characteristics—but, as we see no long-term role for the payments, we do not believe that that is the right way in which to deal with the concerns about the interests of smaller farms, for example. We believe that separate policy instruments are needed to deal with those concerns.

Similarly, what is the point of cross-compliance on environmental conditions to payments if the payments are to be stopped? If they are not to be stopped, we believe that conditions should be attached provided that they are satisfactory and can be imposed without requiring a huge new bureaucracy in the CAP. Better still, let us get rid of the payments.

The other form of modulation is the imposition of ceilings to limit payments to a farm. I think that that would have very adverse consequences for UK farmers, so I hope that the Government will strongly oppose the proposal, as they said they would.

I had hoped to speak in some detail about the individual commodity sectors, but I do not have time. I am grateful to the Government for agreeing with the Committee's views on the arable sector, on which the Commission proposes only partial decoupling, which does not go far enough, although it is a welcome step in the right direction.

I am also grateful for the Government's endorsement of the Committee's views on beef, but I draw the attention of the House to our third report, in which we highlighted the need for restructuring—another ugly word—the domestic beef sector, but only as part of EU-wide restructuring. There is no doubt that the British beef industry is taking too much of the pain of the necessary restructuring across Europe—we must ensure that that does not continue. There is overproduction in Europe, so Europe as a whole, not only this country, must face the consequences of that. That must be one of the Government's major negotiating objectives in the debate on Agenda 2000.

On dairy farming, the Committee believes that the Government are right to seek the abolition of milk quotas—we hope that that will be one of their principal objectives in the negotiations. I am glad that the Government are making progress in building a coalition of support for that proposal, including countries such as Italy, which was previously opposed to the abolition of quotas. Abolition will create problems for UK farmers; as has been said, quotas are the major capital asset of too many farmers. Currently, British farmers are producing milk close to world market prices, but they cannot produce as much as they want to; they have the worst of both worlds—low prices and lower production than they can manage. I hope that the Government succeed in ensuring that something is done.

I also hope that the Government are successful in their proposals to reform the tobacco regime, although I suspect that that will be a difficult objective, especially when it comes to building coalitions to secure our other objectives.

The future of the CAP clearly lies in agri-environmental and rural policy. It is a matter of great regret that Agenda 2000 is based not in rural policy proposals, but in agri-rural proposals, so to speak—it does not deal with the wider rural dimension. I hope that the Government will do something to correct that shortcoming. That is why, in the next stage of its examination of Agenda 2000, the Select Committee will consider rural development in detail. As the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham said, rural development will be one of the key components of the CAP in the future—which, incidentally, is a good reason for giving the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food a wider remit than agriculture alone, as MAFF Ministers will have to negotiate rural policy in the years ahead.

On CAP and the consumer, the Committee found it unacceptable that the Commission had failed to provide any estimate of the benefits that could accrue to consumers from reform—that was an extraordinary omission. It was left to the UK Government to make the assessment. They noted that, if lower market prices fed through to the consumer, there could be savings to consumers of up to £1 billion a year in the UK alone, and of up to 10 billion ecu—£6.77 billion—across Europe. I hope that the Government will keep the consumer firmly in mind. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon said, all interests, including the consumers, march together on this.

CAP reform holds the key to prosperous rural economies, EU enlargement and freer world trade. Much rides on it, and the whole House must wish the Minister every success in the negotiations.

7.7 pm

Mr. Mark Todd (South Derbyshire): I shall focus on the longer-term future of the UK's agriculture industries, but first I make an assumption: because of the changes imposed through the next World Trade Organisation round, the increasing ideological bias against market intervention, and declining consumer and taxpayer tolerance, I believe that, within a dozen years, British agriculture will have no—or almost no—production-based subsidies or quotas from either United Kingdom or European sources. Any support will have to be based on other public policy criteria—care for the environment, higher standards of animal welfare than the global market demands, or employment and rural development goals.

Given the varied nature of UK agriculture, its future will be diverse. In mapping our futures, we need to understand the present, but we badly neglect research on it. We need a proper understanding of the strengths and weaknesses of our agricultural economy. I compliment the National Farmers Union on its initial report on the competitiveness of the UK farming sector, but much more needs to be done.

We must answer questions such as in what sectors we are already competitive in continental and global terms, and how those strengths and weaknesses are evidenced in our regional economies. We need far stronger research on how our food chain industries fit together to produce a competitive economy for the export sector.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the ways in which farmers can achieve success is by the localisation of supply, especially through the consequent reduction in transport costs, but also through initiatives such as organic farming? Could British agriculture get back on the world stage in that way?

Mr. Todd: Yes, I agree entirely.

Some sectors, such as horticulture, poultry and pigs—industries which are substantial contributors to the South Derbyshire economy—already compete without support. We have heard tales of gloom and woe, and I do not doubt their truth, but we should also talk about our successes: industries that thrive and prosper in a competitive market.

Some larger producers in the protected sectors could survive without protection. Smaller producers and those in less-favoured areas will face the prospect of radical change, towards niche production, in which quality and added value are critical, volume is less important and extensive methods are viable; environmental maintenance and protection; merger with larger, more competitive producers; diversification into other compatible industries; supported departure from the land, with the land returning to a managed nature; or a combination of those.

Government should ensure that our farming communities have genuine choices. We need to identify the role of Government in the process. In most industries, restructuring would be driven by the market alone, but the historical role of the United Kingdom Government before the common agricultural policy and the European Union came on to the scene, distorting the market and managing much of our agricultural decision making, means that there is a legitimate demand for Government assistance for change.

That assistance can be won only if there is a clear strategy, a clear methodology for implementing it, and an exit point for Government, leaving its role confined to the public policy objective that I set out earlier. Government assistance can then focus on transitional support and initial risk sharing; skills development; international marketing assistance to regain markets that we may have lost; ensuring that public policy concerns do not impinge unduly on competitiveness; and backing all that up with appropriate research.

That is all made far more challenging by our obligation to act in step with our European partners, but that is not an excuse for failure to progress the agenda. We can persuade others only when we are clear about our own goals and strategies, and we can negotiate competently only within a coherent, long-term policy framework, which we currently lack. Our farming policies are, understandably, too much driven by short-term crisis management, and, less justifiably, by a peculiar British delight in the beauties of bureaucracy.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North): Does my hon. Friend agree that the new genetic technologies give us a great opportunity to produce good-quality foods, with good regulation? If we do not do that on a European basis, the Americans will be well ahead of the game, so European co-operation and CAP reform are very much part of producing new quality food.

Mr. Todd: I agree entirely.

We must concentrate on reform of the CAP on the basis that I have set out. The EU reforms are extremely disappointing and limited: tariff measures remain; there is a substantially increased role for national determination that may lead to inconsistency in the implementation of the measures in individual member states; compensation for price cuts appears to have no time limit or phase-out; continued price support and quotas are inconsistent with likely World Trade Organisation directions; capping may work against the most market-oriented producers and discourage farm mergers; further complexities have been added to an already arcane and bureaucratic system; milk quota increases are targeted at the most marginal producers or new entrants; and continued bureaucratic intervention stifles innovation in a sector that desperately needs it.

There has been useful recognition of environmental obligations, rural development goals and job creation measures, but it is predictable that we will fail in the WTO round to occupy an area that we can defend adequately.

It would have been far better to have a range of agri-environmental and rural development measures that were accessible to some degree to most, if not all, farmers; a focus on area payments rather than price supports or quotas; much more active support for diversification, training and early retirement, perhaps with subsidised insurance and marketing support to aid transition; and an identification of the best in European agriculture, using policy tools to support the transition to a free market. Instead, some reforms foster the least efficient forms of farming. It seems likely that the reforms will have a short life span, perhaps taking us up to the WTO round.

We all subscribe to the protection of the rural environment, without even knowing what we mean by it. In most places in Britain, we have to combine our aspirations for the environment with the need to earn a living and feed our people from the land. When society places those obligations on a farmer, beyond the norm of good practice—I recognise that most UK farmers care deeply about the environment—society should pay the costs.

We must accept that there may be some areas in which it is no longer appropriate to attempt commercial farming; define where they are; and devise measures to allow farmers to withdraw or to transfer to environmental maintenance. We must define what we are seeking to protect in our farmed environment; how we will measure the achievement of that protection; and how policy tools can be devised to secure that protection.

To me, the opportunity is great. We already have, overall, the most competitive farming concerns in Europe. Demand for quality food is growing world wide as economies mature. Every year, we commit about £4 billion as taxpayers, and a further £3 billion or so as consumers, to a byzantine bureaucracy and subsidy process, controlling individual entrepreneurs at micro-level, in a way not attempted in much of the former Soviet bloc. Poland, which is about to be admitted to the European Union, had a private sector agricultural system throughout the time of Soviet domination. It probably had, and has, a less controlled agricultural sector than the European Union.

Could we not spend the money better and achieve far superior outcomes for both producers and consumers? Few politicians welcome the idea of drip feeding an industry into the future. I have set out an exit strategy that I think will work, and I commend it to the House.

Mrs. Caroline Spelman (Meriden): I want to demonstrate accurately the full scale of the crisis that faces British farming. Agenda 2000 ought to have been a bold expression of what the Commission set out to do in 1995 in reforming and moving towards greater trade liberalisation in agriculture, but I agree that the proposals are timid.

I cannot agree with the Minister, who described the beginning of the negotiations as a powerful start. Several members of the European Union have already rejected the proposals, so it is difficult to understand how that could be called a powerful start. While Europe delays, our competitors make hay—to use an agricultural analogy—and the United States in particular is exploiting the opportunity of greater liberalisation and the decoupling of agricultural support to take advantage of its greater farm size; of its economies of scale; and of better public acceptance of technology that delivers greater productivity in farming.

The tragedy is that, on the face of it, British agriculture, with its large farm structures by comparison with the rest of Europe, would be well placed to take advantage of such decoupling and reform. Despite those advantages, no other member state in the European Union goes into the Agenda 2000 negotiations from such a poor base.

The damage caused by the high pound, the ban on beef exports and the industry's loss of confidence in its Minister have produced a state of despair. Without over-dramatising the situation, I had a letter only last week from the National Farmers Union county secretary noting that one of my constituents, a small dairy farmer, had taken his life because he could see no way forward.

We know that the Minister questions why agriculture should be treated differently from any other industry. No one in private business expects to be bailed out, but politicians have set the framework within which these businesses try to thrive. The framework has many constraints, quotas and regulations. It is only right that farmers should hold us politicians to account if they find that the framework is not serving them well. It is not only the straitjacket of the CAP that is causing problems. They are within their rights to call their Minister to account when our domestic economic policy is making it even more difficult for them to compete and secure livelihoods from their farms.

Part of our effective opposition must be to try accurately to assess the scale of the crisis. We have conducted a comprehensive survey of all parts of the

[Mrs. Caroline Spelman]

United Kingdom, which reveals that every farm sector and region is affected by the crisis. The answers that we received from our correspondence identify the most serious impact of any decision by the new Government that has adversely affected farming and related industries as that of the Government's refusal to act against the high pound.

Export companies are obviously the most seriously affected. The cereal sales of Ellingham Grain Ltd. in Suffolk are down 80 per cent. Its sales of beans have been halved. A less obvious, but telling, example involves a company affected by imports sucked in by the high pound. A small family mushroom supplier on the Leckford estate in Hampshire is finding it difficult to remain in business because of mushroom imports.

Another telling example was given to me by my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe). A Kentish hop grower is struggling to survive in the international marketplace with the high pound. He stored hops on his farm for two years, receiving no income from them. Meanwhile, cheap imports of hops are flooding into the UK from the United States and former eastern bloc countries. There has been a slight weakening of the pound in recent weeks, but the short to medium-term prospect is of continuing difficulty for British farmers. They are deeply frustrated because they know that the Minister has a tool at his disposal to compensate under the CAP, but it lies idle on his desk.

How is the industry responding to that cold shoulder? Like the good business men they are, they are forced to tighten their belts. Milton Mills engineering in Dorset has frozen pay, made one mechanic redundant, and stopped donating time charitably. Agropharm in High Wycombe has not replaced retiring staff, and has reduced overheads to contain erosion of its profitability. Many farmers are considering amalgamating into larger units to survive the crisis, reducing the number of the traditional family farms to whose support the Government pay lip service.

For others, it is already too late. My hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Townend) told me of the Agrisystems company in Boroughbridge, which has gone into receivership. Knight Farm Machinery has shed 11 jobs. Robert D Webster is closing a depot, and John Wood and Son is closing a branch. Those are examples from the real world. It is not only farms but the companies on which agriculture depends that are badly affected.

It does not matter where one goes—north, south, east, west, livestock, arable or horticulture—the picture is the same. The full extent of the problem can be appreciated only when we consider businesses that serve agriculture. Philip Moss and Son in Cheshire told me that farmers do not have the finance to buy even second-hand farm machinery from it. When we asked those businesses whether they felt optimistic or pessimistic about the future, a classic MORI-type question, the answer was overwhelmingly the latter.

The general manager of Milton Mills in Dorset wrote:

"The current Government seems increasingly reluctant to take note of the very strong farming voice which has been expressed and I believe it is evident by their apparent reluctance to approach the EU for special consideration and strong economic support for British Agriculture."

We only get one chance a year to debate price fixing and the future of the CAP. We should have before us a set of radical proposals to reform the CAP. Instead, we have a tame document that offers little of relevance or comfort to British agriculture in crisis. The Government hide behind platitudes to protect inactivity and apparent indifference. With only this one chance, we have no choice but to speak up for the serious needs of rural Britain.

Mr. Cynog Dafis (Ceredigion): I wish to speak briefly from a Welsh perspective. We have been provided with documentation of various sorts for this debate, but it is important to remember another report, which was published yesterday: the Welsh Affairs Committee report entitled, "The present crisis in the Welsh livestock industry". I shall give three quotations from it to emphasise the extreme gravity of the situation.

The report states:

"It is no exaggeration to suggest that much of Welsh agriculture will be destroyed within a decade unless urgent action is taken to reverse the decline."

It also says:

"The collapse of Welsh family farming would be a disaster for Wales as a whole—culturally, environmentally and socially, as well as economically."

Thirdly, it states:

"unless immediate action is taken to assist farmers, there will not be a livestock industry in Wales left to develop."

There will be nothing left to build on, to change or to make more competitive—to use the language that has been used commonly tonight. I hope that the Government note carefully what the report says and recognise that their credibility is on the line in Wales. They need to think hard about that.

The Welsh view of CAP reform is, in many ways, different from the positions of the UK Government, of the Conservative Front-Bench spokesman and of the Select Committee report. There are two points. First, there is the idea that too much is being spent on agricultural support in Europe. Less than 1 per cent. of European GDP is being spent. If much of that is being spent inefficiently and untargeted—as it is—and on persuading rich farmers not to grow corn, that is unacceptable and must be changed. We agree that there must be radical reform. If that sum were spent to guarantee food security by maintaining Europe's capacity to be self-sufficient in food, which is an issue for the longer term, to provide wholesome food and high animal welfare standards, to maintain the natural environment, the landscape and the richness of natural habitats and biodiversity, and to strengthen rural communities and create a lively rural economy and culture, it would be well spent. That range of benefits, for both rural and urban dwellers, is well worth paying substantially for. It would be irresponsible not to pay substantial sums for such benefits.

Secondly, the Welsh view of modulation is different from that expressed in many quarters tonight. The Farmers Union of Wales supports the Commission's proposal to vary direct payments according to the amount of labour employed on the farm, on the understanding that moneys released in that way would be allocated within the member state for agri-environmental schemes. Modulation within a member state and according to that state's priorities, but within the framework of common European rules, is an appropriate way to proceed. The flexibility in the Commission's proposals overcomes the issue of discrepancy in farm sizes between different countries, of which much has been made.

Modulation to strengthen family farms is justified; it is not a way to prop up the weak and uncompetitive, which is the language commonly used. In many ways, small farms are not weak and uncompetitive, and they are certainly not inefficient. Such modulation is justified to maintain adequate human resources in the countryside to deliver the benefits that I have mentioned. I strongly dissent from the view of the Select Committee that modulation based on labour units is contrary to promoting competitiveness.

The documents that we have been given emphasise integrated rural development—linking food production, processing and marketing. That is very much in keeping with the analysis of the Welsh Affairs Select Committee report, which emphasises not only the severity of the present crisis, but the opportunities for Welsh agriculture—in common with other sectors of British agriculture—to meet consumer demand for quality, traceability and sustainable methods of production. The right kind of CAP reform, with an attractive agri-environmental scheme, could assist strongly in that.

In the short term, the crucial issue is whether Wales will get what it undoubtedly qualifies for under the European structural funds from 1999 onwards. Objective 1 status for western Wales could deliver as much as £2 billion between 2000 and 2006. That status is absolutely crucial at this time for the viability of our economy and our communities. There is no doubt about the eligibility of the region or the appropriateness of the payment. What has to be decided is whether the British Government are seriously committed to that at this time. On objective 1 status, as in negotiating CAP reform, it is reasonable for us in Wales to expect the Government to represent our views and our interests—along with those of others, of course—and if they fail to do that, they cannot expect to have political support in Wales.

7.30 pm

Mr. Steve McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green): If there is one European policy that is designed to undermine confidence in the European Union, surely it must be the complex, expensive, fraud-ridden and inefficient support systems of the common agricultural policy. That is why the Government are right to press for reform of the CAP.

We have heard a lot about farmers in this debate, but is it not the case that British consumers are the losers under the present policy? Should we not be at least as concerned about them as we are about farmers? Is it not also the case, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) pointed out, that reform of the CAP is now essential because an expanded European Union simply could not afford it?

As we have heard, the current reform proposals could save British consumers as much as £1 billion a year, and I welcome that. Surely after years of butter mountains and wine lakes, any sane person must welcome a shift from the current system of production-related support. Is it not much better that we move to environmental subsidies, which encourage protection of the land and safety for consumers?

I welcome the idea that member states should be allowed to withhold up to 20 per cent. of payments from farmers who fail to meet proper environmental standards. I hope, particularly in the light of the BSE scandal, that we might use some of that money to encourage grass-reared beef.

If there is a criticism of the Agenda 2000 proposals, it is that they do not go far enough. We must press for a steady reduction in the level of subsidy paid through the CAP. We must move to income support compatible with the requirements of the World Trade Organisation, which will encourage exports as world markets grow. Of course, no system of support can be totally cost free, but a policy based on lower prices and income support is in the interests of the British consumer.

I am somewhat concerned at the suggestions by Commissioner Fischler that present member countries should continue to receive support, but that new entrants should not. That could lead to the situation in which two farmers grow an identical crop on the same number of hectares, but one receives a subsidy and the other does not. That is a recipe for discord and for continual difficulties as the European Union expands.

The right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) called for more agrimonetary compensation for farmers. I am sure that he knows that 70 per cent. of that money must come from the British taxpayer, which means that we have a choice. We can have more handouts for farmers, but at the expense of pensioners, hospital patients, school children and many other people in our society. Is that what he wants? Is that fair?

Mr. Jack rose—

Mr. McCabe: I will not give way on this occasion because in a similar debate in 1995, the right hon. Gentleman told the House:

"I . . . have first-hand experience of what it is like to operate in a sector that . . . has no direct intervention. I know what it is like to live on my wits to serve the needs of customers."—[Official Report, 21 March 1995; Vol. 257, c. 237.]

The Conservatives are now calling for compensation for farmers which they never once applied for when they were in government. Should we not also recognise that, far from being hard done by, farmers are receiving £85 million of agrimonetary compensation from the Government and can expect to receive about £3 billion in subsidies this year?

I recognise that some small-scale farmers have problems, but I am simply not convinced that the majority of farmers are that hard done by. They may shout about the strength of the pound now, but did they not enjoy tremendous gains during the early 1990s as CAP payments increased rapidly to compensate for weak sterling? Also, is it not the case that, after 1992, EU farmers continued to receive price compensation even though world grain prices had risen rather than fallen? Is it not also true that the Conservative Government's intervention in the 1992 reforms of the CAP, far from producing a fairer system, allowed a small number of fat cat farmers to receive arable area payments ranging from £500,000 to more than £2 million per year?

Mr. Drew: Does my hon. Friend agree that the way in which that Government set up the milk market, so that dairy processors had a vested interest in driving down the price of milk, was a recipe for disaster? Thank goodness that the Monopolies and Mergers Commission is now looking into that case.

Mr. McCabe: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Can anyone seriously argue that the behaviour of the previous Government with respect to the CAP benefited the British consumer, either in terms of prices or food safety? Should we not today support the motion and encourage the Government to negotiate a deal that, although it might have some in-built costs at the outset, could lead to a progressive reduction in the overall size of CAP subsidies? Should we not support the Government in seeking a deal that will encourage a simpler and more efficient system, recognise the rights of consumers, help to create a sustainable rural development policy and protect our environment?

7.37 pm

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire): First, I must declare an interest as I have a small acreage of land and, therefore, would be affected by Agenda 2000.

Dr. John Cunningham: How many acres?

Mr. Paice: Ten. We must consider the Agenda 2000 proposals against a clear picture of what we expect of British farmers and the British countryside. Do we want British agriculture to become a corporate activity, with no regard to the community or the environment? Or do we, as some do, want not merely to stop the clock but to turn it back and to use public money to support a rural way of life and a rural community in some sort of yokel agriculture, immune to the changing needs of consumers and, inevitably, with a constantly increasing cost to the taxpayer?

Or is there a third way—the Government seek to find one in other ways—of encouraging our farmers to be efficient by removing the constraints on their production, stimulating enterprise and making targeted payments for specific activities, whether they be environmental or social, but payments that are decoupled from production, transparent about their intention and, at the same time, reflect our genuine concern for family farms in our farming communities? In its report of 12 November, the Select Committee on European Legislation asked:

> "Is the primary purpose of the CAP to ensure a fair standard of living for the agricultural community, or as Article 39 of the Treaty says 'to increase agricultural production by promoting technical progress and by ensuring the rational development of agricultural production and the optimum utilisation of the factors of production, particularly labour'?"

I find it difficult to square that article with some of the proposals before us, especially those for labour unit modulation and the continuation of quotas.

In considering the whole issue of reform, we have to look back to the last round, which became known as the MacSharry reforms. My right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), who was Minister at that time, fought hard to ensure that British farmers were not disadvantaged by those reforms—indeed, the idea of modulation was proposed then. If the Minister today does half as good a job of defending the interests of Britain's farmers, taxpayers and consumers as did my right hon. Friend, he will do well.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) spoke about enlargement and the requirements of the World Trade Organisation. Both expressed concern about whether the Agenda 2000 proposals are enough. It is important that compensation should be degressive, but it is also important to distinguish between payments that are compensation and those that are made for specific activities, whether environmental or anything else. There is clearly considerable confusion, not only inside the House, but in the wider world of agriculture, about those two issues.

My hon. Friend the Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman) spoke well about the wider implications of farming economics and the pressures on farmers' welfare and the welfare of many businesses.

On structural funds, we welcome the clearer rural objective described by Agenda 2000 and the bringing together of measures under one heading. We welcome the fact that money will be shifted from the guarantee part of the budget towards rural development, but, like my hon. Friend the Mid-Worcestershire, we do not believe that the proposals fulfil that laudable objective. There is little doubt that, under the new objective 2, rural areas will receive less money than they currently get under objective 5b; and even the new objective, which is sometimes called objective zero, may not be enough, especially given that less-favoured area payments are to be included. We have reservations about whether the proposals will meet the challenges of the WTO or of other objectives, such as diversification for job creation, which is so important. Those elements of the package are necessary if we are to create opportunities for farmers to earn income from non-farming activities.

The issue is not only one of resources; it involves the attitude of the many officials whom farmers encounter and who affect their businesses. The officials responsible for planning and for the many different regulations, such as those on health and safety, have to understand that the development of a different enterprise may mean the difference between survival or bankruptcy.

I ask the Government to examine the issue of business rates, because, if they want to stimulate enterprise in rural areas, they have to look at the way in which, as soon as a farmer develops an enterprise that is not classified as pure agriculture, he immediately gets clouted by business rates. Even providing a few stables can lead to a huge rates bill. It was the previous Conservative Government who introduced the rate relief for village shops, for which the current Government sought to obtain the credit. Has not the time come to consider applying that principle more widely to help farmers?

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) said, the Opposition are not calling for huge increases in public expenditure—indeed, one of our criticisms of Agenda 2000 is that it does not reduce the cost to the taxpayer. We believe that the Government have a duty to help farmers to adjust to the new world. Small sums of money to help new marketing initiatives, or an increase in research into non-food uses of crops, or, as the hon. Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) said, developing and identifying those areas where we can compete more effectively in a free market could help that adjustment.

Will the Minister tell us how we will address the issue of cross-compliance and environmental assistance? Do the Government support the principle of cross-compliance? Will he assure the House that, as the House of Lords report said, any aid for environmental measures should be available for all farmers, including those in the fens of East Anglia, which I partly represent? Does he agree with the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, which said:

"There is no clear connection between economic or physical size of a farm and its environmental sensitivity"?

There are many examples of large farms that achieve significant environmental benefits along with efficient farming. However, as any farmer knows, conservation costs money. Loss of income and land area, and development and maintenance costs can be justified only against a profitable farming enterprise, or by specific targeted payments.

Some hon. Members referred to removing support from agriculture, but it is important to differentiate agriculture from all other industries, simply because it is British farmers who manage about 75 per cent. of the land area of this country. Our landscape has been fashioned by agriculture over the millennia, and our people value it as a leisure resource. It is a matter of regret that the Government did not take the opportunity of the debate to lay out their views on the future of agriculture in the United Kingdom. We have heard a little of their views, and we agree with and will support some of them, especially their opposition to the capping of support for individual farms. However, we heard nothing about a vision for agriculture.

Farmers in this country do not want handouts and do not want to be seen as seeking handouts. They repeatedly tell me that they want fair treatment compared with farmers in other countries whose products are coming into this country and with whom they have to compete. Do the Government want no public money to be spent on agriculture? What is the Government's policy toward marginal areas of the country? Do they want vast areas of marginal land to revert to wasteland and moorland and the communities of people living there to fade and die? Do they have a vision for revitalising those rural communities with new policies and continuing public support to keep people living in those fragile areas and to maintain the landscape that millions of people value?

We have not been told the Government's policy towards the idea of labour unit-based modulation within a national envelope—indeed, the Ministers remarks on that issue were somewhat vague. Nor have we heard about their view on livestock quotas, although I hope that the Minister will adopt the same view on those as on milk quotas. The Minister has proclaimed that he will not accept any policy that discriminates against British farmers, yet, on 22 December, he stated that in future there would be fewer producers, but a more viable beef industry in the United Kingdom. Beef farmers throughout the country now believe that they are to be sacrificed by the Government to reduce the supply of beef; but reducing the number of producers does not necessarily reduce production.

We have had a good debate, even though the Labour party has yet again paraded its belief that it represents rural areas. If Labour represents the countryside, why has not a single one of the 180-odd new Labour Members of Parliament registered agriculture as a special interest? That demonstrates the paucity of Labour's argument and the tragedy facing the British countryside, which is now governed by an urban party.

Conservative Members believe that agriculture has a strong and prosperous future, operating in a marketplace, producing what the customer wants and playing a major role in rural communities and the rural economy. The Agenda 2000 proposals will have to be changed significantly if they are to help, rather than hinder, British agriculture's efforts to face up to the future. They go a certain distance in the right direction, but I ask the Government to be resolute in ensuring that Britain's farmers, taxpayers and consumers are properly defended.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Jeff Rooker): By and large, the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) made an excellent speech. [Interruption.] I mean that. It was extremely thoughtful, especially at the start. Admittedly, later we got to the third way, but we could wholly agree with the requirements that he set out. I was not so sure that I could agree with him when he got on to the subject of rates, which has long been contentious. I remind him that agricultural land is not rated—an exemption which, one assumes, no one has ever costed. Nevertheless, it was an excellent speech.

That speech was in marked contrast to the opening speech by the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack), but we all know that today he was the prize in a magazine contest. That was the result of his speech today. There was a litany of questions. Did anyone read last week's competition in Farmers Weekly? The winner of the competition received a speech from the right hon. Gentleman. He was first prize in a competition. It was not a fairly structured speech. The second prize would have been a winding-up speech by the right hon. Gentleman.

It has been an interesting debate. The occupants of the two Front Benches are not responsible for the time constraints—the usual channels and business managers agreed them—but we have had a fascinating debate. At one time, four hon. Members representing Shropshire were on their feet at once—two from each side of the House. At another time, no fewer than four hon. Members representing Cumbria were on their feet at once—two from each side of the House. Obviously, the idea that there is a monopoly of provision for, and representation of, rural areas is nonsense. That was the only remark by the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire to which I took exception.

On Tuesday night—my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and my hon. Friend the Member for Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley), the Parliamentary Secretary, were there—there was hardly any room in the Committee Room when we met the rural group of Labour Members of Parliament. The Room was packed to the gunwales with people with an interest in the rural economy, who believe that the rural economy extends beyond agriculture. That is a key factor.

Many hon. Members have made important points tonight. I shall try to respond to some of them, but it would be impossible to cover them all. My hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) kicked off by drawing attention to overgrazing on the fells. That behaviour contrasts with that of the people who, over the millennia, have left us a massive, beautiful landscape, apparently managed and cultured to great success. As my hon. Friend said, obviously that is not the case throughout the country.

My hon. Friend was also the first person to raise the issue of animal welfare. It is impossible to divorce the issues of the CAP and its reform from the incredibly important but narrow issues of simple price support—including animal welfare issues.

The hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy) demanded to know—unfairly, I thought—the decisions taken at the informal meeting of Agriculture Ministers at Newcastle last week, where, by definition, no decisions are reached. Like him, we do not, as a matter of policy, want a diminution of family farms—which is the way that some people would wish to drive it. He also, very fairly, pointed out that not all problems started in May 1997. We accept that farmers are going through a difficult time, but one must be absolutely realistic about the history of the problems that confront us today.

The right hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) made a measured speech—in contrast to the bawling and shouting. He rightly pointed out that farmers were affected more than most by the strength of the pound because they were affected earlier than anyone else. I would be the first to say that all manufacturing industry is affected—I know that from constituency experience in Birmingham—but farmers are affected first, because of the operation of the green pound.

If I were to reply to all the points made in the speeches by my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Marsden) and the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) I would take up all the remaining time, because they raised important issues on a range of CAP policy issues, including the cattle-tracing system, about which I shall say a few words. My hon. Friend said that we need to look at rural affairs in the round, not only from an agricultural perspective but from an environmental and social one.

I was on a farm yesterday—and indeed last week—and met not just farmers and country landowners, but those involved in the wider rural economy. My fellow Ministers and I visit farms regularly. We are in contact with, and listen to, people at the sharp end, not just in our Whitehall offices. We are very conscious that those people are keen to discuss wider rural affairs, not just the narrow agricultural aspects.

The hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire, as Chairman of the Select Committee on Agriculture, referred to the valuable report that had been produced. This is not a love-in. The Government were able to respond because the Committee had produced a report that we did not wholly support but which was a credit to the Select Committee system. That is not to say that the Committee will produce such a good report every time, but it was a valuable contribution. I wish that forced reading of that report had been a requirement for speaking in the debate.

Many hon. Members mentioned the cattle industry, especially regarding the beef ban. The myth persists that this Government are responsible for the beef ban. We are responsible for legislating it, because the previous Government forgot to do so. There are aspects of the beef industry, however, to which we must pay special attention, because any problem in our food industry, especially the beef industry, affects our capability to negotiate our way out of the ban.

Confidence in food is affected in many ways. In negotiating our way out of the ban, we have been affected by questions of quality in the slaughter industry and meat-cutting plants. We now have higher levels of inspection by the Meat Hygiene Service, and that confidence must be communicated to the European regulators. In addition, we now publish the hygiene scores of more than 1,000 red and white meat slaughterhouses.

The staff on that vital inspection work do it on behalf of the public as well as the industry, but I regret that there are continued instances of intimidation of meat hygiene staff to prevent them from carrying out their duties to protect public health. We—I hope that I speak for the whole House—will not tolerate the intimidation of veterinary surgeons and meat hygiene inspectors, carrying out their work in the slaughterhouses of this country.

We recently had the first successful prosecution for intimidation and assault on an official veterinary surgeon, carried out by Mr. R.B. Crowther at the plant of D.S. Cooper of Shelley Bank abattoir in Huddersfield against a female official veterinary surgeon in pursuance of her duties. We shall expose and prosecute on every possible occasion when intimidation of the people doing those jobs, in defence of the beef industry and food safety, is brought to the notice of the authorities. I give that pledge on behalf of—

It being three hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Order [18 May].

Main Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 7073/98 relating to reform of the Common Market Organisations for beef, cereals and milk and for the development of rural development policy in the European Union, and the Second Report from the Agriculture Committee, Session 1997–98, 'CAP Reform: Agenda 2000' (HC 311) and the Government response thereto (HC 719); and supports the Government's intention to negotiate an outcome which takes account of the interests of UK producers, consumers and taxpayers alike and of developing countries and to press for a reformed Common Agricultural Policy with substantially reduced overall costs, which is more economically rational, which reduces the bureaucratic burden on farmers, which provides a better framework for targeted environmental and rural development support, which contains fair and common rules to ensure that the UK's farm and food industries can exploit their competitive advantage in European and world markets, which facilitates the accession of associated countries and which offers the medium-term prospect of benefits to developing countries.

Arnos Vale Cemetery

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Pope.]

8.23 pm

Ms Jean Corston (Bristol, East): I am grateful for the opportunity to debate the future of Arnos Vale cemetery in my constituency. It was established by a private Act of Parliament in 1837, and is—and has always been—owned by the Bristol General Cemetery Company. It comprises 45 acres in the city, was planned as a Greek necropolis, and has been described as an Arcadian garden. It is of unique ecological importance, in that it has changed from being mediaeval countryside to a Georgian estate to a Victorian cemetery without the use of chemical pesticides or insecticides.

The cemetery provides a fascinating insight into the history of Bristol, as it contains the graves of the Victorian well-to-do, a survivor of the charge of the Light Brigade, a police officer who was murdered in Old Market while trying to intervene in a fight over the ill treatment of a donkey, and the notorious Mary "Princess Cariboo" Baker, who managed to persuade the squire of Almondsbury that she was an eastern princess.

There are also the unmarked mounds of the common graves of the Victorian poor and the markers of the "guinea" graves of those whose friends and relatives had managed to put up the required 21 shillings and so avoid a pauper's funeral. There are many Commonwealth war graves, and last—but by no means least—the mausoleum of Raja Rammohun Roy, who is internationally revered as a humanist and social reformer, and whose statue stands outside the Council House in Bristol.

The income of the cemetery obviously declined as it filled up, and the costs of upkeep rose as burials continued to the present day. In 1987, Mr. Tony Towner took over as the new owner, and he and his wife became the principal shareholders in the Bristol General Cemetery Company. He made no secret of the fact that he was effectively given the cemetery in lieu of a professional debt. Mr. Towner is a barrister.

After my election in 1992, Mr. Towner contacted me to discuss the state of the cemetery. Such was my concern that, on 6 December 1992, I convened a meeting at the Council House in Bristol, which I chaired. It was attended by representatives of Bristol city council, Mr. and Mrs. Towner, the Victorian Society and representatives of the Association for the Preservation of Arnos Vale Cemetery, known as APAC. We discussed all the issues that arose from the private ownership of the cemetery, which was facing decline. At that stage, there was already considerable dereliction in the cemetery.

There was a further meeting on 12 February 1993, which I also chaired, when we discussed issues relating to the records of the cemetery, because Mr. Towner had made it clear that he did not think that they were safe as the property was subject to vandalism. An offer was made to microfiche or film the cemetery records, and it was made clear that the cost would not be borne by the cemetery company. However, there was no co-operation from Mr. Towner, not just on this issue but on any other issue raised at the meeting in December 1992. I found that puzzling, in view of the fact that he had approached me to help resolve the issue.

[Ms Jean Corston]

As to APAC, which is now known as the Friends of Arnos Vale Cemetery, I must say that I have never come across a more responsible and committed group of individuals. I believe that they have only the upkeep and the best interests of the cemetery at heart. They offered to provide a cut-and-clear service for the cemetery and, after Mr. Towner objected to insurance indemnity, had discussions with the National Federation of Cemetery Friends and agreed to provide their own insurance cover for any accident or mishap arising from their activities.

Their reward was rudeness, intimidation and repeated threats of legal action—once when the then chairman was recovering from a serious illness—from Mr. Towner and his solicitors. I also have copies of threatening and intimidating letters from Mr. Towner to constituents who expressed distress at the state of the cemetery.

I referred to the Raja Rammohun Roy. He has a unique importance for the Indian community, in the United Kingdom and world wide. A centre promoting his work is located in Delhi. The High Commission has made strenuous efforts over many years to restore the mausoleum. There are regular pilgrimages to the cemetery, and one visit every year—which is usually attended by the high commissioner—to mark the date of the Raja's death.

The high commissioner has been locked out on that day at least once. The spectacle of a representative of a friendly country and fellow member of the Commonwealth visiting this country, only to be locked out of the premises to which he had asked for access, and having to leave flowers at the gate, was disgraceful. There was a gross discourtesy, and, to its credit, the high commission is still patiently trying to resolve the issue.

The site is also unique in heritage terms, which is where its future lies. A letter to me from English Heritage on 14 January 1993 states:

"Cemetery contains 16 listed structures of which the 1830's Bath Road entrance lodges, gates and screen walls, 2 mortuary chapels of 1840 and retrospective commemoration of Raja Rammohun of 1843 are all listed Grade II*; the Cemetery Road gates, 1914-18 war memorial, 1866 obelisk and five further memorials are listed Grade II. All these structures have been on the statutory list for at least 30 years."

On 19 May, the 1998 buildings-at-risk register listed the entrance lodge gates and mortuary chapel of Arnos Vale cemetery.

Mr. Towner's failure to disclose his financial situation meant that it was difficult for English Heritage to give grant, because he could not demonstrate need for financial assistance. He knew that in 1992. The south-west team of English Heritage made it clear that there was no possibility of a grant to him, that he was unable to accept the grant conditions, and that it would not communicate further with him on the matter. I formed the view then that a trust for the people of Bristol was the only answer.

Bristol city council's responsibility has generally been confined to environmental matters, principally the crematorium. It was built in 1928, when cremation was not common. Mr. Towner's accusation that the council built crematoria to put Arnos Vale out of business is manifestly absurd. Canford crematorium opened in 1957, and Bedminster Down in 1971, as cremation became more acceptable and popular. That was long before Mr. Towner knew where Arnos Vale was. He took it over in the full knowledge that there were local authority crematoria in Bristol.

Arnos Vale crematorium is at the end of its useful life. Bristol city council has served notice under the Environmental Protection Act 1990, ordering the company to meet certain conditions and bring the crematorium up to standard. Mr. Towner appealed against a previous notice, and I was astonished when he succeeded. He was given until 31 March 1998 to bring the crematorium up to the standards laid down by the 1990 Act.

I do not often read the Investors' Chronicle, but I am pleased that I read the 7 January 1994 issue, because I saw an advertisement for "Arnos Village Cemetery Operator". It continued:

"Arnos owns and operates a 45-acre cemetery in Bristol less than half a mile from Temple Meads station. It has retained Hambros to advise it on developing up to 30 acres of the site. If negotiations over the new Bristol City development plan go well, Arnos calculates that up to 400 houses could be built on land where graves have been moved. Meanwhile it looks an attractive shell."

It is important to remember the case of the Westminster cemeteries. In January 1987, three were sold by Westminster borough council for 15p—or 5p each. The cemeteries—at Mill Hill, East Finchley and Hanwell—were outside the boundaries of Westminster borough, and so were thought to be a waste of Westminster ratepayers' money. According to Lady Porter, in an Evening Standard article on 8 March 1989, the cemeteries were offered to the appropriate local authorities for nothing and were refused, so it was decided to sell them to eliminate the £300,000 a year maintenance costs. Valuable land was also given away with the cemeteries—12 acres at Mill Hill. The purchaser, who paid 15p, sold them on for £1.25 million.

When I saw the advertisement, I immediately contacted Bristol city council. I am pleased that the result was that conservation area status was conferred by the council in July 1996. In a way, that made sense of the previous few years and of Mr. Towner's refusal to co-operate in guaranteeing the future of Arnos Vale. My opinion is that his objective was always to sell the site for development.

Matters came to a head earlier this year, with a newsletter from the company headed: "Exhumation—a sad necessity?" It says:

"An uncertain future for our famous Arnos Vale Cemetery now needs you to consider how best to continue your respect for your relatives and loved ones graves.

If the grave of your loved one or friend is in the top part stretching between the Cemetery Road gates and the Park where the distress and dereliction is at its greatest (and will be unaffected by Heritage funded improvements to the original Arcadian Gardens) you may wish to consider exhuming the remains for re-burial in the original Victorian Arcadian Gardens (which whatever happens must surely be preserved) near the chapels or for cremation with the ashes to be buried in a cremation plot in the same area, or to be scattered here, or if you wish, to be re-interred in another cemetery of your choice.

How has this come about?

One simple answer—No money.

Why not?

Two main reasons—competition for cremations from Council owned crematoria installed despite our company having sufficient capacity, at that time, for the whole of Bristol and the costs of compliance with environmental legislation."

The newsletter invites readers to apply for an

"information pack on the future of Arnos Vale and how exhumations are arranged."

I immediately contacted the Home Office, and asked that no decision be taken on the granting of licences for exhumation.

That notice must be unprecedented, and the public reaction was what any right-minded person would expect: extreme distress, revulsion and anger. The culmination was Mr. Towner's announcement that he was closing the cemetery permanently, as from 31 March 1998. I cannot describe the grief and distress that that caused, but the people of Bristol decided they would have none of it. They took over, drew up a rota for locking and unlocking the gates, and set about a clean-up. The cemetery looks better than it has for years. Mr. Towner's reaction was to call those people "vigilantes", who were involved in "mob-rule", in a letter to me. I can only describe the use of such language in respect of bereaved people as despicable.

The Bristol Evening Post has helped to keep up the pressure, with coverage virtually every day. There are now 1,500 people in its Arnos Vale army. That coverage has been vital in keeping the issue at the forefront of public attention.

Bristol's planning, transport and development committee considered Arnos Vale cemetery at its meeting on 23 April 1998. It welcomed the report, and agreed that a regeneration study, looking at the historic buildings, landscape and future management of the cemetery, should be commissioned. Subsequently, the policy and resources committee agreed to underwrite the cost of the study, until money becomes available.

The regeneration study is expected to cost about £40,000. The council hopes to set up a joint project, funded by English Partnerships, English Heritage and the Bristol Preservation Trust. A brief for the study is being put together, and it is hoped that it will be commissioned in June and that there will be a report in September. The council is about to write to Mr. Towner, requesting urgent works to listed buildings. If he fails to carry them out, the city council will undertake them and put a charge on the property. A petition of about 18,000 signatures will be submitted to the city council any day now.

The leisure services committee is satisfied that the quality landscape is being well cared for by volunteers, and it looks forward to a landscape plan as part of the regeneration study. The Commonwealth War Graves Commission recently took on landscape maintenance around its graves.

There are marvellous opportunities for community involvement in regeneration and to tie in with Government projects, such as the environmental task force. There is also the possibility of a local employment and training project for work on walls and buildings, as well as landscape maintenance and enhancement. The site may be beneficially used as a local social history resource outlet for schoolchildren and others who are interested in local history.

Mr. Towner charges £25 for every letter or fax that he sends in connection with funerals, and £15 for each phone call. A private burial takes three weeks to set up, and that was described by a Bristol undertaker as "extortionate and without justification."

I am delighted that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport will reply to the debate, and I call upon him to use any powers that are open to his Department to secure the cemetery as a precious asset to our heritage and as a haven for remembrance, contemplation and conservation. I understand that his Department has reserved powers to serve a repair notice on a site owner specifying work that is to be carried out, but that those powers would be used only in exceptional circumstances. I cannot think of any circumstances that are more exceptional than these.

There are other issues, such as the granting of exhumation licences by the Home Office. I hope that the Minister will be able to speak about the Home Office's response. There is also the issue of the way in which exhumation licences are granted. I agree with the Commonwealth War Graves Commission that licences should be granted only if there is "an overriding public necessity."

My central argument is that no one should be allowed to profit from the bones of the dead or from the bereavement or remembrance of the living. Mr. Towner may have been able to play cat and mouse with me and with Bristol city council, the Friends of Arnos Vale Cemetery, the Indian high commission and English Heritage, but he did not reckon with the force of public opinion in Bristol. He should accept that there is no future for Arnos Vale as a business, and that his procrastination has brought disrepute to the city of Bristol and distress to people whose only concern is to provide a fit and proper resting place for loved ones and ancestors. If he is not prepared to co-operate in the setting up a trust for the people of Bristol, he should go back to Oxford, and let us get on with it.

8.42 pm

Valerie Davey (Bristol, West): I endorse what my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East (Ms Corston) has said, and I echo her concern for the people of Bristol and those further afield who, in their distress, have been writing to us. Tomorrow is the 226th anniversary of the birth of Raja Rammohun Roy, the Indian philosopher, and in his memory, people may wish to visit the cemetery. However, every day is an anniversary to some family who have loved ones in that cemetery. Every day draws people not just from the Bristol area, but from much further afield, because there are 40,000 graves in that cemetery.

We are debating a human tragedy, and the dignity with which the people of Bristol have responded is to their great credit. We seek the Government's help in redressing the despicable situation of one person trying to make a profit at the expense of the majority of people in that area who wish to maintain the cemetery. They display great dignity, and bring to bear a great deal of endeavour and hard work. I trust that the Minister can offer some help in that endeavour.

8.44 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Mr. Tony Banks): It seems that this is my week for Adjournment debates. The one last night was about church bells, and I suppose tonight's debate is about those for whom the bells have already tolled.

I congratulate my hon. Friends the Members for Bristol, East (Ms Corston) and for Bristol, West (Valerie Davey) on drawing this important matter to the House's attention.

[Mr. Tony Banks]

I listened carefully to the concerns about the future of Arnos Vale cemetery, and I can understand why the matter has aroused anger, not only in Bristol but further afield. The Government understand those concerns, and wish to secure the future of this important and historic cemetery. I hope that I can reassure my hon. Friends that initiatives are in hand to do that.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East said, the cemetery was laid out in 1836 to 1840 with buildings by Charles Underwood, who was Bristol's leading neo-classical architect of the early 19th century. It is a fine and early example of what was a new concept in cemetery design, and it was influenced by the great pictures of 18th-century landscape gardens and the romantic ideals of the time. Its historic importance has been recognised in many ways.

In 1996, the efforts of my hon. Friend led to Bristol city council including the cemetery within the Arnos Vale conservation area. Such areas are of special architectural or historic interest, the character or appearance of which it is desirable to preserve or enhance. They are designated by local planning authorities in the light of their local knowledge.

More recently, the cemetery has been listed grade II in English Heritage's "Register of Historic Parks and Gardens". In addition, the cemetery contains 14 grade II and grade II* listed buildings. As we have heard, they include the grade II* tomb of Raja Rammohun Roy, who died in Bristol in 1833. He is described by the Indian high commissioner

"as one of the most significant figures in the social, cultural and intellectual history of India during the last two hundred years."

The tomb is regarded as a shrine for all Indians, and I was appalled to hear from my hon. Friend that, in the past, pilgrims to the tomb were locked out. That is a disgrace, and one can only apologise to the Indian Government and to the followers of Raja Rammohun Roy for that insult. His tomb, like some other unlisted and listed buildings in the cemetery, is in poor condition.

The Indian high commissioner met my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to express his concern that the tomb may deteriorate beyond rescue, and be lost for good. He is also worried about access to the tomb for pilgrims who come to pay their respects. High commission officials have discussed those problems with Mr. Towner of the Bristol General Cemetery Company, which owns the cemetery. However, I am afraid that the parties have so far been unable to agree on how the matter should be resolved. That seems to be a common story when one tries to make arrangements with Mr. Towner.

In many ways, the problems surrounding the tomb of Raja Rammohun Roy encapsulate the difficulties that face the cemetery as a whole. Many of the tombs and vaults are in a dangerous condition, due to neglect by those who own them, and the grounds have become dangerous, raising public liability issues. The entrance lodge and gates and the mortuary chapel, which is listed grade II* are in the highest category of risk in English Heritage's new "Register of Buildings At Risk" which was published on Tuesday.

I understand that the long-term financial viability of the cemetery company to manage the cemetery effectively and safely has been in doubt for some years because of declining revenues from burials and cremations. In addition, we understand that the company's crematorium has been closed because of insufficient funds to upgrade the cremators as required to ensure compliance with environmental protection legislation.

Understandably, these matters have raised widespread local concern that the cemetery may be forced to close. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East said, the cemetery was closed for a time last month, but public pressure forced the company to reopen it.

The attitude of Mr. Towner was mentioned several times by my hon. Friend. I noted her criticism of the way in which he manages the cemetery, and the difficulties that the city council, local residents and others have had in trying to discuss with him how to secure the cemetery's long-term future. I well understand local anger. The recent history of cemeteries being sold off or passed on to unsuitable persons is sad and depressing. We all remember well the scandal of the Westminster cemetery sale.

I should make it clear that English Heritage has always stood ready to consider any request for grant aid support in respect of listed buildings in the cemetery, and remains willing to do so. I confirm that it remains ready to consider assisting the city council with both professional advice and grant aid in the event that the city council decides to use its statutory powers for listed buildings in disrepair.

It may be helpful at this point if I outline legislative provisions that may have some relevance in respect of the cemetery. On guaranteed access to the cemetery, little can be done. As my hon. Friend has said, Arnos Vale is a private cemetery, established by a private Act of Parliament of 1837 and run by a private company. Beyond what is contained in that and subsequent private Acts relating to the cemetery, the activities of the Bristol General Cemetery Company are not subject to regulation. Other than in relation to any requirements of the Burial and Cremation Acts, and to limited Home Office powers of intervention, the company is largely free to conduct its business on its terms.

Nevertheless, the company will have a contractual relationship with people who have bought burial rights in the cemetery, and any infringement of the rights thus acquired will be subject to the provisions of civil law. Individual families with concerns about their burial rights may wish to consider taking legal advice.

I said that the Home Office had limited powers of intervention. It has an interest in ensuring that any relevant regulations relating to burial grounds are observed, and that such grounds are not allowed to become a health risk or to offend public decency. To that end, it has powers to undertake inspections of all burial grounds. In extreme cases, it is open to the Home Office to seek an Order in Council to require certain works to be carried out, or to close the site to further burials.

I can inform the House that the Home Office is considering whether it would be helpful and appropriate to undertake an inspection of the cemetery. My noble Friend Lord Williams of Mostyn has arranged to meet my hon. Friend to discuss the matter, and how far the Home Office may be able to help.

The legal powers relating to the protection of listed buildings are set out in the Planning (Listed Buildings and Conservation Areas) Act 1990. The primary responsibility for the upkeep of a listed building rests with the owner, but sanctions can be imposed by the local planning authority when a listed building is in a poor state of repair. In the case of Arnos Vale, ownership of listed tombs and other buildings will rest with either the cemetery owner or private individuals.

Where the authority considers that a listed building is in need of repair, it can serve a repairs notice on the owner, specifying the works that are considered necessary for the building's preservation. If no action is taken in response to the notice, the authority can begin compulsory purchase proceedings. In addition, in the case of an unoccupied listed building, a local authority can serve an urgent works notice requiring the owner to carry out emergency repairs. If the owner fails to carry out the works, the authority can do so, and recover expenses from the owner.

The legislation also gives the Secretary of State powers that are broadly similar to those of local authorities. However, it is the Government's policy to treat them as reserve powers for use only in exceptional circumstances. I assure my hon. Friends that we will use the powers if we have to.

I understand that Bristol city council has considered serving an urgent works notice on the Bristol General Cemetery Company in respect of the listed buildings in disrepair for which the company is responsible. However, the city council has been reluctant to take that step, because of the potential costs. It considers that the company is not in a position to reimburse the council for the costs of any urgent works that are undertaken. That option remains open, and, if pursued, it may be possible for English Heritage to underwrite some of the risk as part of its buildings-at-risk programme. That programme includes advice to local authorities on how they can use their statutory powers effectively.

Following his meeting with the Indian high commissioner, the Secretary of State asked English Heritage to produce a report on the condition of the Raja Rammohun Roy tomb. It has become clear, however, that that particular matter needs to be looked at in the context of wider issues concerning the present state and future options of the cemetery as a whole. The English Heritage report will therefore now look at all those issues. That is a sensible step, because individual problems of access, maintenance responsibility and public safety are closely interlinked, and cannot be dealt with in isolation. Any solutions to them must fit in as part of an overall package.

English Heritage is still producing its report, but I am pleased to say that it has indicated to us that good progress has already been made in dealing with a number of issues. It has held meetings with all interested parties, including Mr. Towner, and has discovered that the parties share a lot of common ground. As a result, it has agreed that a sensible first step would be to commission a conservation and regeneration study into the cemetery's future. That will include an appraisal of its heritage assets, its role as a local amenity and preparation of a business plan.

Clearly, any business plan will need to address several options. For example, I understand that there may be scope for some limited development, combined with increased public access to the open spaces, restoration and regeneration of the historic core of the cemetery—perhaps by a trust—and the retention of part as an active cemetery for conventional burials. A number of buildings on the site have viable reuse potential.

Bristol city council is prepared to underwrite part of the conservation and regeneration study, and other potential funding partners, both public and private, have declared a readiness to support that. English Heritage is also considering what financial support it can offer. The Indian high commission has also informally offered help in the restoration of the Raja Rammohun Roy tomb.

I know that the Heritage Lottery Fund has been approached by the city council to support the conservation and regeneration study. The fund has made it clear, however, that it normally requires applications to be made by the eligible owner. I hope that, in the light of recent developments, the company will be persuaded to co-operate with the city council to allow a proper application to be considered as quickly as possible.

However, the fund has assured me that it is aware of the urgency surrounding the case, and it is meeting shortly officials from the city council to review matters. My hon. Friends will appreciate that the Government have no role in the decision-making process of lottery applications. Decisions are made independently of Government by the trustees of the National Heritage Memorial Fund, the body which is responsible for the Heritage Lottery Fund.

As a next step, English Heritage envisages that a wider meeting should be held, involving itself, the company, potential trust members, local politicians, officials from the city council and my Department and other agencies. It is hoped that such a meeting will be arranged in late June or July, and will reach agreement on the steps to be taken. English Heritage will then present its report and recommendations, which it is hoped will have the full support of all interested parties.

If agreement is reached on the way forward, the wider public will be consulted on what is being proposed. With good will and co-operation from all parties involved, it should be possible to agree a workable solution, which will not only regenerate the cemetery as a local amenity, but develop it into something that has a viable future. However, if it is not possible to reach agreement, the statutory procedures that I have referred to can be implemented.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East for giving the House the opportunity to debate this important matter. I hope that she is able to take some reassurance from my comments. I am sure that I speak for everyone when I say that I hope that the discussions that are taking place will result in the long-term future of Arnos Vale cemetery being secured. The people of Bristol have a right to expect nothing less.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at three minutes to Nine o'clock.

PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Drugs

Mr. Green: To ask the President of the Council what is the budget under the direct control of the United Kingdom Anti-Drugs Co-ordinator. [40262]

Mrs. Ann Taylor: The UK Anti-Drugs Co-ordinator, Keith Hellawell, is a special adviser to the Government, and as such has no budget to spend. As part of the Government's Comprehensive Spending Review, he has overseen a review of existing drug resources. This has informed the Government's new anti-drugs strategy, 'Tackling Drugs to Build a Better Britain', launched last month. This estimated that the Government currently spend about £1.4 billion a year on anti-drugs activity within departmental programmes. An announcement on funding from 1999–2000 will be made later in the year, following the outcome of the Comprehensive Spending Review.

DEFENCE

Nuclear Submarines

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which SSNs are presently undergoing refit; when the work commenced; and when they are expected to be rededicated. [40868]

Mr. Spellar: The following submarines are currently in refit with the dates of commencement and rededication as shown:

Submarine	Date of commencement	Rededication
HMS Tireless	June 1996	January 1999
HMS Torbay	January 1998	Estimated February 2001
HMS Superb	August 1994	April 1998
HMS Sceptre	May 1997	June 2000

Weapon Diagnostic Division, Aldermaston

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the Weapon Diagnostic Division at the Atomic Weapons Establishment, Aldermaston, was set up; what is the purpose of this division; how many series of technical papers or reports are currently being produced by this division; and what are the names of each series. [40754]

Mr. Spellar: The Weapon Diagnostic Division of the Atomic Weapons Establishment, Aldermaston was created in 1979 and disbanded in 1994. Its function was to diagnose underground test programme results. As it no longer exists, there are no documents currently being produced by the Weapon Diagnostic Division.

Atomic Weapons Establishment

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 21 April 1998, Official Report, columns 552–53, on the Atomic Weapons Establishment, how many audit reports have been produced by the Directorate of Quality Assurance since 1 January 1995; and how many of these reports are unclassified. [40768]

Mr. Spellar: The Directorate of Quality Assurance has produced over 1,200 audit reports since 1 January 1995. Of these, only one was classified.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 21 April 1998, Official Report, column 553, on the Atomic Weapons Establishment, if he will list the unclassified reports in the untitled series of papers produced by the Warhead Engineering Division, indicating the title of each paper and the date on which each paper was produced. [40753]

Mr. Spellar: I am today placing a list in the Library of the House.

Computers (Hacking)

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what monitoring his Department conducts on the extent to which outside individuals have attempted to hack into his Department's computer system; how often reports are made on this matter; and what is the current security classification of such reports. [40755]

Mr. Spellar: Ministry of Defence policy on the connection of computer systems to external data networks, such as the Internet, is that the computer system should be dedicated to the purpose and, unless the system processes only unclassified data, be protected by a security architecture which includes firewall technology that monitors attempts at hacking. There is no evidence of a successful intrusion from an external source to any MOD computer system.

The MOD is a contributing Department to the Government-wide Unified Incident Reporting and Alert Scheme, UNIRAS, run by the Security Service. Security incidents, including attempts at hacking, are reported to UNIRAS and an annual report, classified RESTRICTED, is produced by the Security Service.

Strategic Defence Review

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many authors of submissions by outside organisations and individuals to the Strategic Defence Review have consented to their submissions being made public; and by what means members of the public may view these submissions. [40668]

Mr. George Robertson: 486 authors of submissions by outside organisations and individuals to the Strategic Defence Review have consented to their submissions being made public. We are offering to supply copies of the submissions on microfiche to libraries in London, Belfast, Edinburgh, Cardiff, Cambridge, Manchester, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Birmingham, Bath, Exeter and Oxford. These copies are currently in production.

Tank Regiments

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what additional opportunities for training tank regiments are likely to occur with the proposed expansion of NATO to include Poland and Hungary. [41224]

Mr. George Robertson: Extensive facilities for brigade-level armoured training in Poland are already available for use by other nations, and the United Kingdom makes regular use of them. The enlargement of NATO is unlikely in itself to result in additional opportunities for armoured training in Poland, Hungary or the Czech Republic.

NATO Enlargement

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will place in the Library a copy of the NATO study on the costs of enlargement. [41543]

Mr. George Robertson: The NATO study on the costs of enlargement is a classified document, and I am therefore withholding it under exemption 1 (defence, security and international relations) of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information and do not propose to publish it. I have however provided a copy of the study to the Defence Select Committee, whose Third Report of Session 1997–98 (HC 469) reproduces the unclassified information provided to it.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Pre-school Care

Mr. Dawson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how he will ensure that the needs of three year old children are appropriately met in pre-school care. [41660]

Ms Estelle Morris: The pre-school needs of children up to the age of eight are safeguarded by statute under the Children Act 1989. This requires every local authority to keep a register of persons who act as childminders on domestic premises and also of persons who provide day care in non-domestic premises. The local authority has to be satisfied that those registered are suitable to be looking after children up to this age and have adequate regard to the needs of all children. The Department published, on 27 March 1998, a Consultation Paper on the Regulation of Early Education and Day Care.

Pathfinder Areas

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much public money each New Deal Pathfinder area received from the Government between 1 January and 6 April; and if he will make a statement. [40825]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Although approximately £3.2 million was earmarked to meet the cost of operating the New Deal Pathfinders in 1997–98, with £5m programme expenditure held centrally, it is not possible to give actual expenditure figures at this stage.

Mature Students

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what percentage change has taken place in the numbers of (a) mature students entering higher education and (b) lone parents entering higher education as mature students in the last year over the previous year. [40823]

Dr. Howells: The number of mature students entering higher education courses in higher education institutions in the UK rose by 1 per cent. between 1996–97 and 1997–98, from 339,100 to 342,900. Mature students are defined as postgraduates aged 25 and over, and undergraduates aged 21 and over. Information on the numbers of lone parents entering higher education as mature students is not held centrally. However, data from the Labour Force Survey show that the number of lone parents aged 21 or over in full-time higher or further education rose from 207,000 in 1996–97 to 222,000 in 1997–98, representing an increase of 7 per cent.

Public Bodies

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many and what proportion of his Department's appointees to non-departmental public bodies are (i) aged under 25, (ii) aged 25 to 30 and (iii) aged 31 to 35 years. [40742]

Dr. Howells: The number of appointees to Non-Departmental Public Bodies sponsored by this Department, within the specified age ranges, is as follows:

(i) aged under 25—nil;

(ii) aged 24 to 30—nil;

(iii) aged 31 to 35—one.

This one appointee under 35 years of age, represents 0.6% of the 160 current appointees.

The Government are committed to encouraging a wide range of candidates to apply for positions on the boards of public bodies, reflecting the diverse society in which we live. This includes encouraging more young people to put themselves forward as potential candidates for public appointments. All appointments are made on merit, and candidates must demonstrate that they have the necessary skills and experience to match the needs of the public body on which they wish to serve.

Long-term Unemployment

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when his Department will publish the design of the new deal for the long-term unemployed; when he expects the new deal to begin; and if he will make a statement. [40665]

Mr. Andrew Smith: I will publish this month the design document for the New Deal for people aged 25 and over. The New Deal for people aged 25 and over will begin on 29 June.

Departmental Energy Use

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proportion of the Department's energy usage was from (a) renewable energy and (b) combined heating in each year since 1989–90. [40410]

Dr. Howells: The Department does not, at present, utilise any renewable energy. Since 1995–96, some of the Department's energy has been supplied by combined heat and power. The proportions in each year since 1995–96 are as follows:

Year	Percentage
1995–96	7.53
1996–97	8.14
1997–98	[1]8.76

[1] End of year figures for 1997–98 are not yet available. Therefore, the figure has been estimated against the projected outturn

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what quantity of (a) oil, (b) gas and (c) electricity, was purchased for the heating, lighting and powering of all accommodation occupied by his Department in each year since 1989–90; and what was the total cost in real terms for (a) to (c) in each year. [40413]

Dr. Howells: The following table details the information which is available on DfEE consumption and costs for each financial year from 1990–91 to 1997–98. Central records were not held prior to 1990–91; therefore, information for 1989–90 is not included.

Local Authority Youth Services

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the establishment of a statutory base for local authority youth services. [40136]

Dr. Howells: Local authorities have an existing duty under the Education Act 1996 to secure provision of adequate facilities for further education, of which the youth service forms a part. The Green Paper The Learning Age reaffirmed the Government's commitment to placing the youth service on a stronger footing. A consultation paper on the future of the youth service will be issued later this year.

Dentists (Training)

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the average cost to public funds of training an NHS dentist in the last year for which figures are available. [40104]

Dr. Howells: The average cost to public funds of training a dentist over five years on the basis of 1996/97 figures was some £120,000 per student, including the costs to the NHS of providing clinical placements but excluding the cost of student support.

Higher Education Funding

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will ensure that higher education funding is not reduced following the introduction of tuition fees. [41228]

Dr. Howells: As my right hon. Friend said in the House on 23 July 1997, Official Report, column 951, the Government will ensure that savings promised from the new funding arrangements for higher education are used to improve quality, standards and opportunities for all in further and higher education. As evidence of our intention, the funding package announced by my right hon. Friend on 23 September 1997 will allow an extra £165 million to be spent on higher education in 1998–99.

Graduate Earnings

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the earnings of graduates relative to those of non-graduates; and what assessment he has made of the impact of gender on the earnings of graduates. [41593]

Dr. Howells: Compared with those who obtain the qualifications to go to university but choose not to do so, graduates on average see their earnings rise by broadly a fifth by their early 30s as a direct result of their higher qualifications.

Comparing the gross weekly earnings of people whose highest qualification is a degree with the gross weekly earnings of people whose highest qualification is 2 or more A levels shows that both male and female graduates earn more than male and female non-graduates throughout their working life.

The pattern of earnings for young women graduates is broadly similar to men, but diverges after the age of 30. Women's earnings are lower than men's on average, reflecting a greater likelihood of part-time work or time out of the labour force. However, after allowing for this, the earnings of graduates compared with non-graduates remains greater for women than men.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Sport (Lottery Funding)

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what representations he has received in favour of making the care and repair of existing sports facilities eligible for lottery funding; and if he will make a statement. [41134]

Mr. Banks: I have received several representations calling for Lottery funding to be made available for the care and repair of existing sporting facilities.

The English Sports Council, who are responsible for the distribution in England of the Lottery Sports Fund, are in constant dialogue with the Local Government Association, Chief Leisure Officers and Governing Bodies of Sport about the need for the funding of existing sports facilities.

The Bill to reform the National Lottery will widen access to the benefits of the Lottery and allow a more strategic and co-ordinated approach to distribution to reflect identified needs. As part of this new approach, I hope the English Sports Council will plan to introduce in future a suitable programme under which existing sporting facilities can apply for funding from the Lottery.

Television Advertising

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will take action to reduce the average number of minutes of advertising per hour on commercial television. [41461]

Mr. Fisher: Under the Broadcasting Act 1990 it is for the Independent Television Commission to determine the maximum amount of time to be given to advertisements on licensed television services.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Radioactive Materials (Dumping at Sea)

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions he has held concerning the early release of files containing information on the historic dumping of radioactive materials at sea. [40871]

Angela Eagle: Representatives of the Committee of Nuclear Free Local Authorities raised questions about the availability of information on historic dumping of radioactive material at sea when they met the Minister for the Environment on 8 April. The Minister is writing to the Committee in response to the points raised.

Journey Lengths

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what percentage of all journeys made in Britain are (a) under one mile and (b) under four miles in length. [41131]

Ms Glenda Jackson: 29 per cent. of journeys made by residents of Great Britain are under 1 mile in length, and 63 per cent. are under four miles. (Data from the National Travel Survey, averaged over the years 1994–96.)

MV Rema

Mr. Prosser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many times the merchant vessel Rema was inspected under port state control arrangements in the past five years; and if he will make a statement on the loss of the vessel. [40350]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Four port state inspections were carried out on the merchant vessel REMA in the UK in the past five years. An additional five inspections were carried out in other countries within the region of the Paris Memorandum of Understanding in the period since 20 August 1996. The Marine Accident Investigation Branch will be investigating the loss of the REMA on behalf of the Belize Authorities. A report detailing their findings will be published in due course.

Mr. Prosser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what were the minimum certificate of competency requirements for the seafarers on the vessel Rema; what was the issuing authority of those certificates of competency; and if the vessel complied with these on the day of her loss. [40349]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The minimum certificate of competency requirements for the seafarers on the vessel REMA being registered in Belize are stipulated by the International Merchant Marine Registry of Belize in accordance with Regulation V/13(b) of SOLAS. The vessel's Minimum Safe Manning Certificate, issued 10 February 1998, specifies One Master, One First Mate and One Engineer Officer. These were the only personnel required to hold certificates of competency. When the vessel was inspected in February 1998, the certificates of competency were issued by the International Merchant Marine Registry of Belize. It is not possible to say if the vessel complied with the requirements of the Minimum Safe Manning Certificate on the day of her loss.

Mr. Prosser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will provide details of the last port state control inspection of the vessel Rema, listing the areas of deficiency; and what actions were taken by the vessel's owners to remedy the deficiencies. [40354]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The last port State inspection of the vessel REMA in Montrose, UK, on 9 February 1998 resulted in detention of the vessel. It was released on 13 February 1998, after all detainable deficiencies had been rectified.

Deficiencies	Action taken by owners
Detainable deficiencies
Captain unable to produce certificate of competency	Rectified
No personnel on board able to produce radio certificate	Rectified
Various navigation charts out of date	Rectified
Various nautical publications out of date	Rectified
No fire fighting system in paint locker	Rectified

Navigation (NUC) white light without appropriate bulb and shade	Rectified
Lifebuoy light not working	Rectified
Light out in engine room	Rectified
Mate's ticket has no STCW endorsement	Flag state/consul Informed by MCA
MF/HF wire antenna insulation readings very low—lead in insulator to be cleaned. Master instructed to rectify before departure.	Not recorded
MF/HF wire antenna connector to be re-made. Master instructed to rectify before departure.	Not recorded

Mr. Prosser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what the minimum manning requirements were for the vessel Rema; and if the ship complied with these on the date of her loss. [40352]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The minimum manning requirement for the vessel REMA, being registered in Belize, is as stipulated by the International Merchant Marine Register of Belize in the vessel's Minimum Safe Manning Certificate. When the vessel was inspected in Montrose in February 1998, the minimum safe manning required by Belize was four and it was noted that there was no Engineer Officer aboard. When this was queried, Belize responded by producing a Minimum Safe Manning Certificate for seven, including an Engineer officer, but the ship had life-saving appliances and accommodation for only five. As this was approximately the manning that could be reasonably expected on a vessel of this size and type, the REMA was released from detention with a crew of five, including an Engineer Officer, on the condition that the discrepancy between the Safe Manning Document and life saving appliance was rectified, by Belize, before departure from the next port after release from detention. Once again we cannot say whether there were five aboard the vessel at the time of her loss.

Mr. Prosser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions on how many occasions the vessel Rema was detained following port state control inspections in the past five years; and if he will list the dates of and reasons for the detentions. [40351]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The vessel REMA was detained once following port state inspections in the UK in the past five years, and once by another member of the Paris Memorandum of Understanding in the period since 20 August 1996.

Date	Reasons for detention
9 February 1998 UK	Captain unable to produce certificate of competency No personnel on board able to produce a radio certificate Various navigation charts out of date Various nautical publications out of date No fire fighting system in paint locker Fire hose leaking No lifeboats or equivalent on board as required by SOLAS 60 Radio batteries found dry and in need of replacement

Note:

Date	Areas of deficiencies
14 March 1997 Germany	Hull damage impairing seaworthiness Decks cracking Railing cat walks Ventilator air pipes Anchoring devices Musters and drills Minimum safe manning certificates Charts Auxiliary engines Steering gear Certificates of competency

Yvette Cooper: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if she will publish the report of the investigation into the loss of the 'Rema' vessel by the Marine Accident Investigation Branch. [41000]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The MAIB will be investigating the loss of the REMA on behalf of the Belize authorities. A report detailing their findings will be published in due course.

Port State Controls

Yvette Cooper: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the reasons for the detention of all Belize-registered vessels under Port State Control arrangements in the past five years. [40998]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The table gives details on the 23 Belize-flag vessels detained by the UK from April 1993 to March 1998.

Belize-flag vessels detained by United Kingdom: 1993–31 March 1998

Name of vessel	Ship type	GT	Date detained	Date released	Place of detention	Reasons for detention

Yvette Cooper: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (a) how many and (b) what percentage of vessels passing through British ports have been inspected under Port State Control arrangements (i) in the past year, (ii) in the past two years and (iii) in the past five years. [40999]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The number inspected during the periods requested is as follows:

PSC inspections by UK

	Number inspected	% inspected
April 1997–March 1998	1,890	27.6
April 1996–March 1998	3,770	27.5
April 1993–March 1998	10,239	30.4

Yvette Cooper: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (a) how many and (b) what percentage of vessels that have been inspected by Port State Control arrangements have subsequently been detained (i) in the past year, (ii) in the past two years and (iii) in the past five years. [41007]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The number inspected and detained during the periods requested is as follows:

	Number detained	% detained
April 1997–March 1998	179	9.4
April 1996–March 1998	336	8.9
April 1993–March 1998	963	9.4

Yvette Cooper: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (a) how many and (b) what percentage of vessels that have been detained following an inspection by the Port State Control (i) in the past year, (ii) in the past two years and (iii) in the past five years had (a) a British port of registry and (b) a Belize port of registry. [41009]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The number detained as figures and percentages of total detentions during the periods requested is given in the table. These figures are based on inspections conducted under the Paris Memorandum of Understanding on Port State Control. The British-flag vessels include those registered in overseas Territories.

Detention of British and Belize-flag vessels

Millennium Experience (Contaminated Soil)

Sir Raymond Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 8 April 1998, Official Report, column 294, if he will list (a) the names and locations of licensed landfill sites used in the disposal of contaminated soil from the area of the Greenwich Peninsula which is to be leased to the New Millennium Experience Company, (b) the names of contractors used for the disposal, (c) the statutory provisions under which consultations were carried out with local residents at selected licensed landfill sites, (d) the total cost of removal and (e) the cost to Government funds of the disposal. [40599]

Angela Eagle: The information requested is:

(a) the names and location of licensed landfill sites used, by owner are:

Shanks and McEwan (Southern Waste Services) Ltd.:

Calvert Landfill Site, Brackley Lane, Calvert, Buckinghamshire MK18 2EN

"L" Field Landfill Site, Green Lane, Stewartby, Bedfordshire MK43 9LZ

Brogborough Landfill Site, Woburn Road, Brogborough, Bedfordshire MK43 0TN

Hales Waste Control Ltd.:

Kilsby Landfill Site, Daventry Road, Kilsbury, Rugby, Warwickshire CV23 8XF

Thames Waste Management:

Norlands Lane, Thorpe, Egham, Surrey, TW20 8SS.

(b) the names of the main waste haulage firms who were employed as sub-contractors to the main contractors are:

Erith Haulage Group

Shanks and McEwan (Southern Waste Services) Ltd.

McArdle.

(c) The statutory provisions relating to consultation on applications for waste management licences, or applications to modify the conditions of licences, are set out in sections 36(4) and 37(5) of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 (as amended following the establishment of the Environment Agency). There is no statutory requirement for consultation with local residents. The objective of the licensing system is to ensure that waste is disposed of without harming the environment or human health and the Environment Agency has a statutory duty to supervise licensed sites. It is a criminal offence to dispose of waste in breach of licence conditions or in a manner likely to cause pollution of the environment or harm to human health.

(d) and (e) Separate figures are not maintained on the cost of removal which forms part of larger contracts. It is estimated that £8.2m was spent on removal and disposal of which an estimated £6m was a cost to Government funds.

Toxic Waste

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what agreements have been reached in respect of the importation of toxic waste from South Africa for disposal by Rechem in South Wales; what quantities are involved; and if he will make a statement. [41196]

Angela Eagle [holding answer 8 May 1998]: No agreements have been reached in respect of the import of toxic waste from South Africa. In March 1998, the Environment Agency received a request from the Government of the Republic of South Africa to export 5,550 tonnes of wastes into the United Kingdom over a three year period. The wastes in question were a mixture of polychlorinated biphenyls, pesticides and hexachlorobenzene, destined for disposal by high temperature incineration. This request was technically deficient and contained unacceptable caveats. It was therefore refused.

On 24 April 1998, a revised request was received from the Republic of South Africa for an increased total of 5,850 tonnes of wastes. The Agency is currently considering this request.

The Agency is obliged to consider each such "duly motivated request" on its own merits, within the terms of the policies set out in the United Kingdom Management Plan for Exports and Imports of Waste. It is Agency policy to determine a completed request within two months of receipt.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement in respect of the importation of toxic waste for incineration. [41195]

Angela Eagle [holding answer 8 May 1998]: The importation of waste into the UK is governed by Council Regulation EEC 259/93 on the supervision and control of shipments of waste within, into and out of the European Community (the Waste Shipment Regulation). The UK's policy is set out in the United Kingdom Management Plan for Exports and Imports of Waste, which came into effect on 1 June 1996. The Plan:

generally prohibits imports of waste from EC Member States for high temperature incineration in the UK after 1 June 1999. At present, imports are permitted on a reducing basis, to assist other Member States, pending completion of their own high temperature incineration facilities;

excepts Ireland and Portugal from this ban, as the Government accept that neither country produces sufficient hazardous wastes per year to make the provision of their own high temperature incinerators economically viable;

generally prohibits imports for high temperature incineration from OECD countries outside the EC, except in cases of emergency; allows imports from developing (non-OECD) countries, where the UK Government or its Environment Agency are satisfied that the exporting country does not have and cannot reasonably acquire the technical capacity and necessary facilities to deal with the waste in an environmentally sound manner.

Maritime Rescue Subcentre (Liverpool)

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will review the decision to close the Maritime Rescue Subcentre in Liverpool; [41573]

(2) for what reason no operational reasons were given for the closure of the Maritime Rescue Subcentre in Liverpool; [41570]

(3) what estimate he has made of the saving resulting from the closure of the Maritime Rescue Subcentre in Liverpool. [41574]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Coastguard Agency (now part of the Maritime & Coastguard Agency) issued a consultation document on 19 January which set out a 5-year strategy for Her Majesty's Coastguard. The document included, among other things, operational aspects of the proposed closure of four Coastguard stations and the co-location of two others. Analysis of the consultation, including the proposed closure of the Liverpool Maritime Rescue Subcentre, is currently being considered and an announcement will be made shortly. During the life of the strategy, we expect there to be a major contribution to the cost of investment in the Service.

Correspondence

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the hon. Member for Walsall, North will receive a reply to his letter of 30 March concerning a constituent, Ref PT/AG/PSO 7452/98. [41462]

Ms Armstrong: I replied to my hon. Friend's letter on Friday 1 May.

Trawsfyndd Power Station

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on plans to decommission the nuclear power station at Trawsfyndd. [40872]

Mrs. Beckett: I have been asked to reply.

Subject to meeting the requirements of the Regulators, decommissioning of the Trawsfyndd nuclear power station is a matter for its operator, Magnox Electric plc, and I have asked the chairman to write to the hon. Member.

PRIME MINISTER

School Exclusions

Mr. Pound: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the work of the Social Exclusion Unit on school exclusions and truancy. [41752]

The Prime Minister: I launched the Social Exclusion Unit last December, with a remit to co-ordinate and improve Government action to reduce social exclusion. As one of its first priorities, I asked it to report by Easter on how to make a step change in the scale of truancy and exclusions from school, and to find better solutions for those who have to be excluded. The Unit has worked closely on this task with other Government Departments, drawing on outside expertise and research, as well as a wide programme of visits and meetings and a written consultation exercise.

The Government have now reached their conclusions. These decisions, and the underlying analysis, are set out in the Unit's report Truancy and School Exclusions, published today. Copies of the report are available in the Libraries.

The report sets out what we know about the scale of truancy and exclusion.

Our information on both is imperfect. For truancy, figures compiled from registration statistics suggest that around 1 million pupils take at least one half day off without authority. But in confidential surveys pupils admit to much higher levels: one survey suggested nearly one in ten 15 year olds truanted at least once a week.

The numbers permanently excluded from school stand at around 13,000 a year and have been rising fast. Over 100,000 are excluded temporarily. 83 per cent. of excluded pupils are boys, and half are aged fourteen or fifteen. African Caribbean children are 6 times more likely than average to be excluded, and children in care 10 times more likely.

The causes of both problems are complex. Parents are responsible for ensuring that their children attend school, and poor parental supervision is often the cause of truancy. Peer group and community attitudes are also important, as are anxiety about exams, poor basic skills, fear of bullying or boredom with school.

The reasons for exclusions vary widely, from relatively minor issues which should not have warranted such a response, to serious, even criminal, behaviour. The rise in exclusion has been attributed to a wide mix of factors, including poor basic skills, limited aspirations and opportunities, high levels of family stress, as well as lack of training and support in schools, and pressures on academic standards.

More often than not, excluded children do not get reintegrated into school quickly, Those who are educated outside school rarely receive a full timetable and many get little more than a few hours tuition per week, and are otherwise left to their own devices.

Both truancy and exclusion are strongly associated with a range of other problems including unemployment and homelessness, but above all with crime. An Audit Commission study showed that nearly half of all school age offenders have been excluded from school and a quarter truanted significantly. The problems cut across departments and agencies and therefore require coherent solutions that involve not only schools, but also the police and social services, as well as parents.

There is much good practice to learn from. Where it is followed, exclusion and truancy have been greatly reduced. As a result, there are wide variations in the levels of exclusion and truancy between regions and between schools with similar intakes and results.

The report published today draws on the lessons of what works. It commits the Government to the goal of cutting levels of both exclusions and truancy by a third by 2002. The measure to deliver this span a range of departments and local agencies, as well as schools, parents and pupils, reflecting the multi-dimensional nature of the problem.

The national target will be underpinned by local authority level targets for truancy and exclusion reductions. The Government will consult on the detail of how targets should be set. The Secretary of State for Education and Employment will introduce an amendment to the Schools Standards and Framework Bill to permit school level targets for the worst performers on truancy.

The Crime and Disorder Bill introduces parenting orders for parents who fail to ensure their children attend school. The Home Secretary will introduce an amendment to the Bill to give the police a new power to pick up truants in areas where the local education authority has agreed with the Chief Constable designated places to where they may be taken.

To cut down on inappropriate exclusions, the Government will lay down clear rules on when exclusion is justified and give them legal force. There will be special Ofsted inspections for schools with particularly high levels of exclusions. Children excluded from school during the two GCSE years will stay in their original school for league table purposes, so there is no advantage in excluding poor performers.

The number of children from ethnic minorities who are excluded will be measured and reported at school level. The DfEE task group on raising achievement of ethnic minority pupils will look at what can be done to promote community mentoring in ethnic minority communities. There will be a major push to improve the school performance of children in local authority care, with more detailed proposals announced later this summer.

The Government will develop proposals to target more resources on preventive work with children at risk of exclusion. Local education authorities will also have incentives to provide more support to schools. There will be a requirement that all excluded pupils receive full time education so that their discipline or other problems are tackled in controlled environments and they are not abandoned to roam the streets. Decisions on the extra funding that is necessary, and on how funding will be organised, will be taken in the Comprehensive Spending Reviews. Full provision will be phased in over no more than three years.

In addition, Education Action Zones will have a special focus on areas with particularly high levels of exclusion and truancy, to give extra encouragement for innovative approaches to bringing them down.

A Ministerial Task Force under the Minister for School Standards will oversee the implementation of these policies.

Together, these measures will ensure that far fewer young people lose time from school. In the short-term, children themselves will benefit from keeping up with their education. The wider community will benefit from less crime. In the long-term there will be benefits as fewer young people leave school without qualifications.

These measures will require schools, police, and parents to play a part in ensuring that education is no longer optional, and they will end a situation where failure to attend school has been tolerated and sometimes even condoned.

Consultation Papers

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the consultation papers published since 1 May 1997, giving date of publication, closing date for submissions and, where relevant, the number of respondents. [39907]

The Prime Minister: The details requested by my hon. Friend are not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Lockerbie

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister what assessment Her Majesty's Government have made of the relevance of the evidence of Mr. James T. Thurman to the investigation into the Lockerbie bombing; and if he will discuss that evidence with the relatives of the victims. [41577]

The Prime Minister: My noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate gave his assurance in another place on 25 June 1997, Official Report, House of Lords, column 1572, that he was satisfied on the information available to him that there was no reason not to proceed with the petition warrants issued in respect of the two Libyan accused. On 6 October 1995, the then Lord Advocate wrote to my hon. Friend confirming that proof of the case against the two Libyan accused does not depend on evidence which Mr. Thurman might give. That remains the position. The evidence available to the prosecuting and investigation authorities cannot be discussed while criminal proceedings are pending for fear of prejudicing the prospects of a criminal trial.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Montserrat

Sir Alastair Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what representations she has made to the Governments of Caribbean and other countries where Montserrat citizens rendered homeless by volcanic activity are resident about their eligibility for social security and other benefits; and if she will make a statement. [40921]

Mr. Foulkes: Department for International Development (DFID) officials have raised this matter in discussions with the Governments in the region and in North America who have received the largest number of evacuees. These have indicated their willingness to allow Montserratian evacuees who are legally resident to have equal access to their education, health and social services as afforded to their own citizens. The United Nations Children Fund (UNICEF) survey will provide information on whether evacuees are experiencing any difficulties in this area.

Sir Alastair Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development (1) when she will establish a charitable fund for Montserratian refugees in the Caribbean who are unable to become independent because of age or disability; what will be its size and scope; and if she will take a statement; [41026]

(2) what will be the cost to her Department of the Hardship Fund for Montserratian refugees in the Caribbean region; how many people will benefit; and if she will make a statement. [41031]

Mr. Foulkes: A Special Needs Fund (previously called the Hardship and Charitable Fund) is being established to support Non-Governmental Organisations assisting these groups. We have advertised, seeking expressions of interest from NGOs in the region. The size of the Fund will depend upon the initial response.

Sir Alastair Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will publish the six month scientific re-assessment of volcanic risks in Montserrat. [41035]

Mr. Foulkes: A summary of the latest scientific reassessment of volcanic risks was published by a joint committee of scientists from the British Geological Survey and the University of the West Indies on Montserrat on Tuesday 5 May. Copies are being made available to Montserratian community groups in the UK and in the region. I have today laid a copy in the Library of the House.

The full report will be available shortly.

Sir Alastair Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what discussions her officials have conducted with officers of the Montserrat Building Society; and if she will make a statement. [40916]

Mr. Foulkes: Discussions have been limited to a brief presentation by Montserrat Building Society officers to Department for International Development (DFID) officials in January 1998. My officials passed on their comments to officials at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, which is responsible for co-ordinating HMG's policy towards Montserrat, at the subsequent Montserrat Action group.

HMG has decided that we cannot support the Montserrat Building Society, a private institution, which is insolvent, only partially liquid and not commercially viable. This decision has been conveyed to the Government of Montserrat.

Sir Alastair Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what discussions she has had with the (a) Red Cross and (b) other agencies about the future of food vouchers for citizens of Montserrat rendered homeless by volcanic activity; and if she will make a statement. [40920]

Mr. Foulkes: The Department for International Development (DFID) officials have regular contact with the Red Cross and other agencies about a range of matters concerning Montserratian citizens. We will shortly appoint Consultants to review the social welfare system on the island.

Sir Alastair Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will introduce a soft mortgage scheme for citizens of Montserrat. [41033]

Mr. Foulkes: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development has previously said that she is prepared to provide funding for a soft mortgage facility. We have engaged consultants to identify regional financial institutions which might be interested in co-financing the project. We hope that it will be possible to reach agreement with such an institution by June.

Sir Alastair Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development when she will publish the report by UNICEF into the needs of Montserratian evacuees in the Caribbean region. [41028]

Mr. Foulkes: We expect to receive UNICEF's report by the end of July and will discuss with them how the report's findings can be made publicly available.

Sir Alastair Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development when she will publish the results of the feasibility study for an airstrip in Montserrat. [41034]

Mr. Foulkes: A draft airstrip feasibility study is currently under discussion between the consultants, HMG and the Government of Montserrat. We expect to receive a final report in June. The results of the study will be made known shortly thereafter.

Sir Alastair Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many people in Montserrat are currently living in shelters; and when they will be rehoused. [41036]

Mr. Foulkes: There are currently some 512 people living in shelters. The vast majority of individuals with special needs and families currently in shelters will be re-housed by the end of this year.

Sir Alastair Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what requests for assistance she has received from Governments other than Antigua who have received Montserratian refugees; and what has been her response. [41032]

Mr. Foulkes: The Government of St. Kitts and Nevis has requested assistance to cover additional costs related to providing Montserratian evacuees access to health, education and social services. We have told them we are not prepared to reimburse them directly for such costs, but would consider assistance for specific additional education or health facilities if there is an established need. No requests for assistance have been received from other Governments. Antigua has received a much larger number of Montserratian evacuees than any other country in the region.

Sir Alastair Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development when she will publish the sustainable development plan for Montserrat. [40931]

Mr. Foulkes: We are currently considering a draft sustainable development plan with the Government of Montserrat. Assuming that agreement can be reached on the outstanding points this month, a draft will be made available to the public in June.

Sir Alastair Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what proposals she has to assist the improvement of police accommodation in Montserrat. [41027]

Mr. Foulkes: We have just received outline proposals from the Government of Montserrat for the improvement of police accommodation on the island. These are under consideration and an announcement will be made in due course.

Sir Alastair Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what proposals she has for future financial support for Montserrat citizens rendered homeless by volcanic activity; and if she will make a statement. [40929]

Mr. Foulkes: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development has previously said that she is prepared to fund the servicing of additional land required to meet the needs of those remaining on Montserrat. The Department for International Development (DFID) and Government of Montserrat officials are discussing the amount of land required and the location. The Secretary of State has also indicated her willingness to provide funding for a soft mortgage facility.

When added to the housing we, and other donors, are already providing, these projects should meet the housing needs of the current population in shelters.

Sir Alastair Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the employment prospects of Montserratians rendered homeless by volcanic activity who are resident in (a) Montserrat, (b) Antigua and (c) elsewhere; and if she will make a statement. [40915]

Mr. Foulkes: An assessment of Montserratians' employment projects was undertaken for the development of the small enterprise initiatives for Montserrat and Antigua. The conclusion was that assistance was required to improve employment and income earning potential: arrangements are now in place on Montserrat and planned to be later this month, on Antigua. The United Nations Children Fund (UNICEF) survey currently underway will provide the information on the employment prospects of those evacuees located elsewhere in the region.

Sir Alastair Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will provide a breakdown of how the funds so far spent on helping Montserrat deal with the volcanic crisis have been applied; and how the further £14 million committed will be applied. [41025]

Mr. Foulkes: Since the start of the crisis, the Department for International Development (DFID) has committed £62 million in assistance to Montserrat of which about £50 million has been spent: £16 million of budgetary aid and £34 million of emergency and development aid. Of the remaining £12 million, £7 million is additional budgetary support for 1998 with the balance being primarily allocated for housing.

Sir Alastair Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many businesses have been started in Antigua by Montserratian evacuees with support from her Department; and at what cost. [41029]

Mr. Foulkes: A project to assist those Montserratian evacuees in Antigua wishing to start their own business is currently being developed with the assistance of regional consultants. We hope that the project will start by the end of May.

Sir Alastair Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what will be the cost of the Community Empowerment Project for Montserratian evacuees in the Caribbean region; how many will benefit; and if she will make a statement. [41030]

Mr. Foulkes: Up to £250,000 has been allocated for the Community Empowerment Project. It is intended that the project will help Montserratian evacuees to become financially independent. All Montserratian evacuees in the region will be able to seek advice from the organisations supported by the project and to improve their access to host Government social services.

Environmental Resources Management

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the findings of the Environmental Resources Management report of March 1997, Evaluation of Environmental Performance of EC Programmes in Developing Countries. [41108]

Mr. Foulkes: The report, entitled Evaluation of the Environmental Performance of EC Programmes in Developing Countries, was recently published and distributed by the European Commission. The evaluation is acknowledged within and outside the Commission to have been a very useful exercise, which presents detailed findings and recommendations on aspects of policy and practice.

We are waiting for the Commission's response to the report. We then intend to monitor follow-up work and examine ways in which we can assist the Commission in their efforts. However, the Commission is reorganising its foreign policy services in order to rationalise and streamline policy formulation and implementation. This reorganisation can be expected to address many issues raised by the report. In particular, the Commission's capacity to implement recommendations should be strengthened as manpower and technical resource deficiencies are addressed. The Commission is also in the process of substantially revising its Environment Manual for development assistance. We welcome this positive action and would urge the commission to continue in this direction.

Development Assistance

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what steps she has taken to ensure that European Commission development assistance is spent in an effective and efficient way and that environmental and social procedures are improved and implemented. [41109]

Mr. Foulkes: We continue to seek to ensure resources are spent effectively and efficiently through dialogue with Commission officials in Brussels and in delegations, and through our active participation in the Commission's management committees. We have also seconded 13 staff to work in the external development Directorates-General to use their expertise to assist the Commission. Amongst those seconded are a social development adviser and a forestry specialist.

Although the European Commission's own internal project cycle management guidance stresses the importance of cross cutting issues such as environmental and social issues in the project cycle, continuing efforts are required to ensure this is always fully reflected in the design and implementation of projects and programmes.

This is why one of DFID's priorities during the UK Presidency has been to try and improve the poverty focus and effectiveness of the Community's aid programmes. This has involved reviewing the implementation of important previous policy resolutions, on poverty and gender, to see how effective we have been and consider what more needs to be done to improve performance and impact in these key areas. We expect conclusions on this work to be adopted at the Development Council on 18 May.

In addition, we are seeking to promote the integration of environmental and social issues into the programme and project cycle through: our participation on the Commission's Scientific Environmental Monitoring Group and the forestry and water expert groups; providing a project leader to prepare an EC/Member States strategy for bio-diversity conservation; working closely with the European Commission to develop procedural guidelines on the integration of social and environmental issues into development projects.

TREASURY

Inward Investment

Mr. Alan Campbell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the inward investment projects located in intermediate status areas for which his Department permitted the higher development areas job subsidy limit to apply in each of the years from 1987 to 1992. [39723]

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: From 1987 to 1992, the Treasury approved two offers of Regional Selective Assistance for inward investment into an intermediate status area where the cost per job ceiling for intermediate status areas was exceeded. Approval was granted in 1991 for Heller Machine Tools (UK) Ltd for a project in the West Midlands, and in 1989 for Koya Bearings (Europe) Ltd for a project in Yorkshire and Humberside.

Scottish Parliament

Mr. Tyrie: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will ensure that the National Audit Office retains the necessary powers to audit the Scottish block, following the establishment of the Scottish Parliament. [40930]

Mr. Darling: The National Audit Office will retain the powers to audit the expenditure of the Secretary of State for Scotland, including the payment of grant into the Scottish Consolidated Fund. Expenditure out of the Scottish Consolidated Fund will be audited by an independent auditor or auditors reporting to the Scottish Parliament as provided for in clause 66(1)(c) of the Scotland Bill.

SCOTLAND

Public Appointments

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many and what proportion of his Department's appointees to non-departmental public bodies are (i) aged under 25, (ii) aged 25 to 30 and (iii) aged 31 to 35 years. [40739]

Mr. Dewar: The information is as follows: (i) 32, 1.0%; (ii) 123, 3.7%; (iii) 212, 6.4%.

Fisheries

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the criteria used by the Scottish Fisheries Protection Agency in drawing up their list of ports proposed for designation. [41353]

Mr. Macdonald: Proposals to introduce designated ports for vessels of 20 metres overall length or above landing non-pelagic fish into the UK were announced by the Parliamentary Secretary, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, my hon. Friend the Member for Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) on 3 March 1998, Official Report, column 593. The proposed designated landing ports in Scotland are essentially those where the Scottish Fisheries Protection Agency currently has a Sea Fisheries Inspectorate office and where there is a recognised auction market. There are, however, two exceptions. Excluded from the list is the port of Arbroath where the local office will be closed on 1 July 1998 following a decrease of whitefish landings into the port. Scalloway has no SFI office, but has been included in recognition of the scale of landings made there. Additionally, the Scottish ports listed in the consultation paper account for approximately 90% of all non-pelagic landings in terms of tonnage and value made by the vessels to be included in the proposed scheme.

The proposed arrangements are currently the subject of a consultation exercise with the industry and harbour authorities. Careful consideration will be given to all comments received, including those relating to the list of ports which are to be designated.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Beef Exports

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if exports of beef to the European Union have recommenced; what support she is giving to the Northern Ireland beef industry to regain their markets in Europe; and if she will make a statement about the prospects of the Northern Ireland beef industry. [40861]

Mr. Paul Murphy: While the Export Certified Herds Scheme has been approved, exports of Northern Ireland beef cannot resume until the European Commission sets a date for the lifting of the ban. That will depend on the outcome of the recent visit to Northern Ireland by European Commission Inspectors.

The industry has submitted a case for Government assistance towards regaining export markets as part of an overall redmeat development strategy agreed by the relevant industry interest. The case for Government support is being considered.

The Government recognise the importance of the beef sector to the Northern Ireland agricultural industry and is aware of the serious difficulties which it has faced since March 1996. Within the context of the declining long-term trend in consumption of beef and the direction of reform of the beef regime set out by the European Commission in Agenda 2000, the Government would wish to see the Northern Ireland beef industry re-establish itself as a significant force in export markets.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Cocoa

Mr. Dawson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action he is taking to (a) support Ivory Coast cocoa producers in efforts to deal with black pod disease and (b) support Brazilian cocoa producers in efforts to suppress the witches broom fungus and to preserve rainforests in which cacao trees grow; and if he will make a statement on the threatened world shortage of chocolate. [41370]

Mr. Rooker: Despite the recent reports in the press, there is no evidence that black pod disease is adversely affecting cocoa production in the Ivory Coast. Nevertheless, a wide range of cocoa diseases are being tackled by the world-wide research programmes. The International Cocoa Organisation, of which the UK Government are an active member, is co-ordinating various projects aimed at combating cocoa diseases and addressing other difficulties affecting cocoa production. There is a specific project to fight witches broom disease in Brazil.

Quarantine

Mr. Evans: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has for consultation over any proposed changes to the quarantine laws. [41001]

Mr. Rooker: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Sir R. Powell) on 20 April 1998, Official Report, column 488.

Departmental Research

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what percentage of applications, in relation to his Department's research budget, were from women, for (a) project grants, (b) programme grants, (c) special grants intended for new investigators, (d) studentships and (e) fellowships, in 1997 and each of the two previous years; [40885]

(2) what percentage of applications from women, in relation to his Department's research budget, were successful for (a) project grants, (b) programme grants, (c) special grants intended for new investigators, (d) studentships and (e) fellowships, in 1997 and each of the two previous years. [40884]

Mr. Rooker: The Ministry places its R and D work, through contracts and commissions, with research establishments and universities rather than individuals. I regret, therefore, that the information sought in these questions is not available to us.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Lone Parents

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if she will ensure that the Child Support Agency updates the common inquiry system when there are changes in the level of child maintenance owing to a lone parent receiving income support; and if she will make a statement; [40207]

(2) what is the average time taken between an application by the Benefits Agency to the Child Support Agency for child maintenance to be paid direct to a lone parent following a move off income support and implementation of that request; and if she will make a statement. [40211]

Mr. Keith Bradley: Regular payments of maintenance can transform the lives of lone mothers and their children, providing a stable income that can help them off Income Support and into work. We expect the Child Support Agency to provide a consistent, fair and efficient service to all its clients.

The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the Chief Executive, Mrs. Faith Boardman. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Faith Boardman to Mr. Steve Webb, dated 8 May 1998:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Questions to the Secretary of State for Social Security about maintenance due to parents with care who are receiving or moving off Income Support.

In cases where the parent with care is receiving Income Support and the maintenance liability changes, the Child Support Agency notifies the Benefits Agency to advise them of the change. Benefits Agency staff then access the Income Support Computer System and input the revised amount of maintenance liability, and Income Support is adjusted accordingly. This revised information will then be available via Common Enquiry Services.

Where the parent with care is moving off Income Support, the Benefit Agency notify the Child Support Agency of the date from which Income Support is no longer payable so that maintenance payments can be passed onto the parent with care.

Statistics are not collated on the time between the notification and payment as these details would not prove very informative due to the several factors that have an influence on when a payment is due and in turn actually made. The length of time is influenced by the complexity of the change, the payment preferences of the parent with care and the absent parent, and also the absent parent's pay frequency. It is therefore difficult to estimate an average length of time for this process.

The Agency is very aware of the need to deal with changes and ensure payments are passed on to the parent with care as quickly as possible. Where the change is straightforward all aspects can be dealt with in 2 weeks; in more involved cases (e.g., where a deduction from earnings order is in place) the change can take 8 weeks. During 1997–98, the Agency exceeded its Secretary of State target which required that 97% of payments be passed to the parent with care within ten days of receipt from the absent parent.

We are constantly looking at how we can adapt and improve our procedures to speed up the time taken. The timescales achieved for many cases have shortened over the last 2 years. Such an example is that the Agency is building more pro-active use of the telephone into its procedures between assessment and first payment to ensure that timescales are shortened wherever possible. The vast majority of payment advice is now conducted by telephone.

As part of the Welfare to Work programme, the Agency is committed to ensuring that the disincentives and barriers to entering employment are minimised, and that obstacles are removed which jeopardise the prospect of lone parents moving from welfare dependency to work. The Agency has agreed to process as a priority cases where the parent with care has signed up to a New Deal for Lone Parents Action Plan. Also the Agency has agreed to answer straightforward inquiries from New Deal for Lone Parents Personal Advisers on behalf of lone parents immediately, and more complex ones within five working days.

As the Department moves towards a more Active Modern Service, one of the key elements is to provide staff with a system which cuts across all Agencies where they will have access to information regarding payments and records of other Social Security systems. This should alleviate problems encountered by staff acting in ignorance of information held by other Agencies.

I hope this is helpful.

Focus Group Research

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to her answer to the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb), of 21 April 1998, Official Report, columns 607–08, on focus group research, if she will list for each research project (a) the expected completion date and (b) the means by which the findings from the completed research projects will be made public. [40836]

Mr. Field: The expected completion dates of those projects which were commissioned as part of the Department's Research Programme, and which relate to the development and evaluation of policy, are as follows:

1998: April–June

Alan Hedges—Pensions and Retirement Planning.

Centre for Research in Social Policy, Loughborough University—Invalidity Benefit and the contributory principle.

Market Opinion Research International—Attitudes towards disability benefits.

Market Opinion Research International—Attitudes towards welfare reform.

1998: July–September

Social and Community Planning Research—Work Incentives and Intermediaries.

Social and Community Planning Research—Survey of Women; developmental work.

Newchurch and Company—Child Support Agency customer and compliance research.

British Market Research Bureau International—Attitudes towards housing benefits.

Institute for Employment Studies—People management in DSS Headquarters (summary report).

1998: October–December

Social and Community Planning Research—Take Up of Income Support amongst Older Citizens.

Social and Community Planning Research—Preparation for Women's Juries.

1999: January–March

Alan Hedges—Behavioural Response to the evidence requirements.

2000: Summer

Centre for Research in Social Policy, Loughborough University—Earnings Top Up Staff Panel.

The ongoing contract with Social and Community Planning Research for qualitative research on welfare reform issues allows us to commission small projects as required.

All studies within the Department's Research Programme will be published. Decisions on means of publication are not taken until the project has been completed.

As explained in my written answer to the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) on 29 April 1998, Official Report, columns 170–72, reports for those contracts commissioned to develop and evaluate publicity campaigns or to inform other presentational issues, would be published once the decision-making process is completed and/or the relevant publicity campaign has started. Two projects are nearing completion and will be placed in the Library by the end of July:

One World—New Deal for Lone Parents; development of publicity work

Cragg Ross Dawson—Creative Development Research for a New Deal for Lone Parents Newsletter.

Public Bodies

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many and what proportion of her Department's appointees to non-departmental public bodies are (i) aged under 25, (ii) aged 25 to 30 and (iii) aged 31 to 35 years. [40735]

Mr. Denham: The information is set out in the table.

Non-Departmental Public Body	Total number of appointees	Number and proportion of appointees aged under 25	aged 25–30	aged 31–35
Central Advisory Committee on War Pensions (CACWP)[1]	20	0	0	0
Child Support, Disability, Medical & Social Security Appeal Tribunals and Vaccine Damage Tribunals	5,929	0	15 (0.3%)	72 (1.2%)
Disability Living Allowance Advisory Board (DLAAB)[2]	20	0	0	0
Industrial Injuries Advisory Council (IIAC)[3]	15	0	0	2 (13%)
Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority	9	0	0	1 (11%)
Pensions Compensation Board	3	0	0	0
Pensions Ombudsman	1	0	0	0
Social Security Advisory Committee	13	0	0	0
Women's National Commission (WNC)[4]	52	—	—	—

[1] The legislation which governs CACWP and the WPCs requires there to be, among others, representatives of ex-service organisations or persons with ex-service experience. Many of the ex-service organisations, from which the appointees are drawn, have problems recruiting younger members which effects the scope of interested individuals from which suitable candidates can be selected.

[2] Members of DLAAB are required to be professionally qualified and/or experienced which makes it difficult to appoint people under 36.

[3] 50 per cent. of posts on IIAC are nominated by organisations representing employees and employers. These organisations are aware of the principles that should govern appointments to public bodies and additionally, have been sent Guidance produced by the Commissioner for Public Appointments on nominating people for public service. The other 50 per cent. need to come from experts in the field of occupational health and related fields. If their advice is to carry the required authority and weight these appointees need to be drawn from the top of their profession. People who have reached a position of eminence in their professional field will tend to be at the higher end of the age scale.

[4] The WNC membership is determined by the individual member organisations and therefore no records concerning the appointees are kept by this Department.

The Government are committed to encouraging a wide range of candidates to apply for positions on the boards of public bodies, reflecting the diverse society in which we live. This includes encouraging more young people to put themselves forward as potential candidates for public appointments. All appointments are made on merit and candidates must demonstrate that they have the necessary skills and experience to match the needs of the public body on which they wish to serve.

Benefit Integrity Project

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security on what dates each of the monthly statistics for the Benefit Integrity Project for each month since November 1997 were placed in the Library; and when the next monthly statistics will be available. [41504]

Mr. Denham: A full set of Benefit Integrity Project statistics up to the end of March 1998 was placed in the Library on 8 May 1998. Owing to an error, statistics relating to earlier months were not previously placed in the Library.

The release of statistics for February and March was delayed as work was undertaken to improve presentation of the data. The Disability Benefits Consortium have been invited to comment on the revised format. Their comments and suggestions will be reflected in the presentation of statistics relating to May 1998 and beyond.

Any comments Members may have on the new format would also be welcome.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Plutonium Dispersal

Mr. Baker: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will adopt a plutonium dispersal strategy. [40329]

Mrs. Beckett [holding answer 7 May 1998]: All civil plutonium in the United Kingdom, whether separated or in spent fuel, is stored safely and securely under relevant national and international regulations. It is for the owners of spent nuclear fuel and plutonium to choose their preferred management options subject to meeting the necessary environmental and regulatory requirements.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans she has to review current policy on the reprocessing of nuclear waste. [41167]

Mr. Battle: Almost all spent nuclear fuel can be recycled to provide further energy supplies, and accordingly is not classified as waste. The Government have no plans to review their current policy on the management of spent nuclear fuel, which was set out most recently in the policy document entitled "United Kingdom Civil Nuclear Policy including Plutonium", a copy of which was placed in the Library of the House on 30 January.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment she has made of (a) the economic benefits and (b) the safety implications of (i) dry storage and (ii) reprocessing of nuclear waste. [41168]

Mr. Battle: Almost all spent nuclear fuel can be recycled to provide further energy supplies and accordingly is not classified as waste. Government policy is that it is for the owner of spent nuclear fuel to determine the economic aspects of the various options for its management. The Health and Safety Executive will ensure that no option is carried out unless it meets adequate standards of safety.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what quantities of spent fuel have been reprocessed to date through the Thorp Plant at Sellafield; and if she will list the throughput targets provided to her Department by BNFL before active commissioning of the plant in March 1994. [40637]

Mrs. Beckett: I understand from BNFL that, as at the end of March 1998, the Thorp plant had sheared some 1,450 tonnes of spent fuel since the plant was actively commissioned in March 1994.

In July 1993 BNFL published a document entitled 'The Economic & Commercial Justification for Thorp'. That document stated that the expected throughput for the first ten years of Thorp's operation would be 7,000 tonnes.

I understand that there are currently no plans to change this target.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the current estimated cost of refurbishment of the reprocessing facility at Dounreay to be used to process the uranium fuel recently received from Georgia; when the plant is expected to be ready; and what further foreign customers she expects to use the plant. [40670]

Mr. Battle: The unirradiated fuel, which amounts to eighty per cent of the uranium fuel received from Georgia, will be processed in existing equipment at Dounreay which does not require refurbishment. It is likely to be two years before the remaining twenty per cent., which has been irradiated, will be reprocessed. This could be done in one of a number of different plants and a decision has yet to be made about which one to use. As the plant used will also be used to reprocess other material, it is not possible to say at this stage what share of the refurbishment cost will fall to the irradiated Georgian fuel.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what arrangements currently govern the period over which radioactive waste arising from reprocessing foreign fuel at Dounreay may be stored at the site before it is repatriated to the country of origin; and if he will place in the Library a specimen contract covering such arrangements. [40641]

Mrs. Beckett: All waste arising from reprocessing activities at Dounreay will continue to be stored in accordance with the regulatory requirements in force at the time. UKAEA contracts for reprocessing foreign nuclear materials are commercially confidential but they all comply with Government policy on nuclear waste repatriation (in force since 1976) by including a clause stipulating that waste will be returned. In all such cases this return of waste condition is backed by a Government to Government agreement. The Georgian highly enriched uranium (HEU) was recently transferred to Dounreay to improve international security. In this case, an exception to the general policy on return of waste was agreed because the Georgians do not have the capability to deal with the small quantity of waste involved.

Engineering Design

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what initiatives the Government are taking to promote United Kingdom engineering design during their Presidency of the EU. [41104]

Mr. Battle: As well as the on-going promotion of design by the Design Council and Business Link, during the term of the UK Presidency the Government have promoted the best use of design, including engineering. Most recently, on 2 April my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister launched the 'powerhouse::uk' exhibition in London. Funded by DTI as a showcase of British design and creativity, the exhibition was timed to coincide with the second ASEM Summit, attracting some 20,000 visitors over a two-week period, and included examples of world class UK engineering.

In addition, last September, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister launched the Millennium Products project which is managed by the Design Council. The project aims to identify up to 2,000 successful products and services that have been created in the United Kingdom and which exemplify our creativity and innovation. The first 200 products to receive the accolade 'Millennium Product' were announced in April.

International Trade

Ms Drown: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will make a statement on the values of imports to the United Kingdom from and exports from the United Kingdom to (a) Malaysia, (b) Thailand, (c) Argentina, (d) Brazil, (e) Venezuela, (f) Peru, (g) Zambia, (h) Tanzania and (i) Egypt in each of the years between 1987 and 1997. [39681]

Mrs. Beckett: The available information is given in the table:

Notes:

Figures for trade in goods are on an Overseas Trade Statistics (OTS) basis. Figures for trade in services are on a Balance of Payments (BOP) basis.

Figures for trade in services are available only for approximately forty of the UK's largest trading partners and generally only from 1988. Information for many of the countries requested is not available. Services data for 1997 will be available in August 1998.

Exploration Wells

Mr. Page: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many exploration oil and gas wells were drilled in the first quarter of (i) 1997 and (ii) 1998. [40348]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 6 May 1998]: Twenty-one exploration wells for oil and gas commenced drilling in the first quarter of 1997. In the same period of 1998, thirteen exploration wells were started.

Petrol Consumption

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the annual per capita petrol consumption in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) Germany, (c) Holland, (d) Sweden and (e) the USA. [41133]

Mr. Battle: The latest full year for which data for all five countries are available is 1996, and are given in the table:

UKAEA Constabulary

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1), pursuant to the oral answer of 27 April 1998, Official Report, column 21, what is the current force establishment of the UKAEA Constabulary; and what is the planned establishment for each of the next three years; [41084]

(2) if she will list the sites policed by the UKAEA Constabulary in each of the last five years, indicating (a) when they first assumed responsibility and (b) when they ceased to have responsibility; [41088]

(3) pursuant to the oral answer of 27 April 1998, Official Report, column 21, over what period of time the Chief Constable had raised his concerns about police numbers at (a) Dounreay and (b) other nuclear installations; [41090]

(4) pursuant to her answer of 30 April 1998, Official Report, column 237, what reviews have been commissioned which have still to report; what sites these relate to; and if she will make a statement; [41092]

(5) pursuant to her answer of 30 April 1998, Official Report, column 237, if she will list the two sites referred to; what was the increase in staff; for what period of time the increases were agreed; and what was the consequential effect on the overall police establishment; [41083]

(6) if she will list the category of each site for which the UKAEA Constabulary had responsibility over the last five years indicating when category changes took place and the associated change in police establishments; [41089]

(7) pursuant to the oral answer of 27 April 1998, Official Report, column 21, what conditions were attached to the agreement for an increase in police numbers at Dounreay; [41091]

(8) pursuant to the oral answer of 27 April 1998, Official Report, column 21, for which sites in each of the last three years the Chief Constable has requested extra police staffing; on what dates; and with what outcome; [41087]

(9) pursuant to the oral answer of 27 April 1998, Official Report, column 21, on what occasions the Chief Constable has made representations on UKAEA police numbers to ministers in the past five years; in relation to which sites; and with what outcome. [41082]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 6 May 1998]: The UKAEA Constabulary polices sites at Chapelcross, Risley, Sellafield, Springfields, Capenhurst, Dounreay, Harwell, and Winfrith. It assumed responsibility for policing these sites in 1955, with the exception of Chapelcross and Winfrith, where the relevant dates are 1956 and 1957 respectively.

The current force establishment of the UKAEA Constabulary is 471. Police numbers at all sites are subject to a continuing process of review and are approved as necessary by the Police Authority in the light of developing requirements. It is normal security practice not to reveal details relating to the police establishment at particular sites, or the security category of those sites, because this information is of potential use to criminals. The Chief Constable's requests for extra staffing in the past three years have been met in full. He has made no representations to Ministers on UKAEA Constabulary numbers.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to the oral answer of 27 April 1998, Official Report, column 21, if she will list the membership of the UKAEA Police Authority, indicating for each member their current employment. [41085]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 6 May 1998]: The members of the Police Authority are Mr. J. Bretherton, Director Corporate Services, UKAEA; Dr. R. L. Nelson OBE, Director of Dounreay, UKAEA; Dr. E. Drage, Director Euratom, Nuclear Safety, Security and Emergency Planning, Department of Trade and Industry (advised by the Director of Civil Nuclear Security); Dr. R. Howsley, Head, Security and International Safeguards, British Nuclear Fuels plc (BNFL); Mr. G. R. Smith, Head of Sellafield site, BNFL; and Dr. P. Upson, Managing Director Technical, Urenco Limited. Sir John Woodcock CBE QPM, Police adviser to the UKAEA Police Authority, also attends Police Authority meetings.

Energy Sources

Sir Raymond Powell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when she expects the review of energy sources for power generation to be completed. [38826]

Mr. Battle: The review is expected to reach conclusions before 30 June.

Chernobyl

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what has been the total cost to (a) the European Union and (b) the United Kingdom of work done at the Chernobyl site since the accident on 26 April 1986. [40634]

Mr. Battle: At the 1992 Summit in Munich, G7 leaders launched a programme of nuclear safety assistance for the countries of Eastern Europe and the Former Soviet Union. Although the EU was providing some help in identifying options for dealing with the sarcophagus, Chernobyl was not a target for nuclear safety assistance as Ukraine planned to close the plant by the end of 1993. Following the Ukrainian Parliament's reversal of that decision in late 1993, the EU at the 1994 Corfu Summit offered Ukraine an action plan leading, amongst other things, to the closure of Chernobyl. After extensive negotiations, the G7 countries, European Commission, and Ukraine signed a Memorandum of Understanding in 1995 which provided for support for Ukraine's energy sector, including help with nuclear safety at Chernobyl and the decommissioning of the plant. The MOU commits Ukraine to close the plant by the year 2000. Of the 100 mecu Tacis assistance offered by the EU at Corfu, 60 mecu has been allocated for work on site. This includes a site survey (0.5 mecu), development of a plan for dealing with the sarcophagus (2.5 mecu) and turnkey projects for three decommissioning facilities (38.5 mecu). An on-site assistance team is now in place primarily to help with the procurement of these facilities.

In 1993, the UK's Know How Fund supported completion on a £217,000 land remediation study for the benefit of Ukraine's Ministry of Chernobyl Affairs. The EU has financed a number of studies linked to the development of an optimal management route for dealing with the different types of contamination around the site.

The EU has also contributed 20 mecu to the EBRD-managed Nuclear Safety Account. Of the UK's £18.25 million contribution to that account, £10 million has been specifically scheduled for the Ukraine. The commitments to this fund stand at 270 mecu and the 118 mecu project for Chernobyl includes safety upgrades for Unit 3, as well as a liquid radwaste treatment plant and a spent fuel interim storage facility to assist with decommissioning.

The G7 and the Ukraine have now agreed on a Shelter Implementation Plan to ensure that the sarcophagus is transformed into a safe and environmentally stable condition. The EU has pledged $100 million to the fund which has been set up to finance this plan. The UK is making a separate bilateral donation of $16.8 million. A project management team has now been appointed and tendering will shortly begin for the first stage of the work. A £20,000 UK Government-financed study into the options for treating the water trapped in the sarcophagus is shortly to be made available to the project management team.

Arms Exports

Ann Clwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what human rights considerations were taken into account when (a) refusing and (b) granting the ML1 licences to Indonesia. [40389]

Mr. Fatchett: I have been asked to reply.

All applications for licences to export goods entered in Part III of Schedule 1 to the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1994 to Indonesia or any other country, are considered against the criteria announced by the Foreign Secretary on 28 July 1997, Official Report, columns 26–29. The criteria are also used for considering applications for the export of dual-use goods where there are grounds for believing that the end-user would be the armed forces or the internal security forces of the recipient country. The criteria include consideration of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms in the recipient country and the risk of the proposed export being used for internal repression.

Vehicle Licensing

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will list the costs for each year since 1987 of posting licensing reminders to all licensed vehicle owners. [41048]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I have been asked to reply.

Following are the postage costs, for financial years 1987–88 onwards, of vehicle licensing reminders:

£ million

Year	Vehicle reminder postage costs
1987–88	2.6
1988–89	2.7
1989–90	2.9
1990–91	3.3
1991–92	3.7
1992–93	3.8
1993–94	3.9
1994–95	3.9
1995–96	4.2
1996–97	4.3
1997–98	4.5

HEALTH

EC Workshop on Sexuality

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 3 July 1997, Official Report, column 229, when he expects to give a substantive reply to the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness relating to the EC Workshop on Sexuality. [31232]

Ms Jowell: I wrote to the hon. Member on 6 May 1998. Copies of this letter have been placed in the Library.

In my answer of 3 July 1997, Official Report, column 229, I indicated that I was providing the hon. Member with information available to me at the time about the European Community funded workshop on sexuality. There is now some doubt about whether the workshops were ever held in the United Kingdom, and my letter of 6 May sets out the latest information in full.

Silicone Breast Implants

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many women have received silicone breast implants in each of the last five years on the NHS; and if he will estimate the number of women who have received such implants privately; [23010]

(2) how many women have had their silicone breast implants removed on the NHS due to rupturing in each of the past five years; and if he will estimate the equivalent figure for private health care. [23011]

Mr. Boateng: The available information for the National Health Service is in the table. We record the number of episodes in which a breast implant was inserted, the number of implants removed and the number of revision operations. Whether the implants were filled with silicone-gel or another material is not known. There are no equivalent figures for the private sector.

Number of episodes by primary operation; ordinary admissions and day cases combined, NHS hospitals, England

Hepatitis C

Judy Mallaber: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to be able to make an announcement on the claim for recompense by haemophiliacs infected with hepatitis C as a result of treatment with contaminated blood products; and when he will be writing to the Haemophilia Society on this matter. [41008]

Mr. Boateng: We fully recognise that those who have made representations on this subject are disappointed that we have not as yet announced our conclusions on the matter. This is, however, a very complex issue which we are still considering. We will announce the outcome of our deliberations, and write to the Haemophilia Society, as soon as we are in a position to do so.

Children's Rights Commission

Mr. Dawson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions he has had about the office of Children's Rights Commissioner as part of the work leading up to the United Kingdom's response to the United Nations Committee on Children's Rights; and if he will make a statement. [41369]

Mr. Boateng: On 12 January 1998, I met a delegation to discuss possible ways of assessing the potential value of a Children's Rights Commissioner for England. We asked officials to prepare an initial assessment of the progress made by other countries who have established a Children's Rights Commissioner or similar office. We expect that report by the end of June. Thereafter, we will consider whether further work should be initiated and within what timetable. The preparation of the United Kingdom's second report on the implementation of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child is expected to be concluded by the end of 1998 and the report will be published early in 1999. Copies will be placed in the Library.

Civil Service Rebuttal Officer

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has appointed a civil service rebuttal officer in his Department; and if he will make a statement. [41165]

Mr. Dobson: The Department's communications planning unit includes a rebuttal officer whose job is to make more systematic and orderly the process of responding to criticism of Government policy, and in particular to inaccurate or misleading allegations. This role complies with the official Civil Service "Guidelines on the Work of the Government Information Service" and the person appointed is a career civil servant who reports to a career civil servant.

Communications Planning Unit

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list (a) the cost of establishing and (b) the annual running cost of his communications planning unit; for what reason the unit is to be financed from public funds; and if he will make a statement. [41164]

Mr. Dobson: As endorsed in the Report of the Working Group on the Government Information Service (Mountfield Report), the Department's communications planning unit was set up to provide better co-ordination of news handling. The total basic staff cost of the unit is estimated at £86,000, which is from existing running costs. All the staff involved were already employed by the Department.

Teaching Hospitals (London)

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what financial transitional support was available to London teaching hospitals in 1994–95, 995–96, 1996–97 and 1997–98. [41571]

Mr. Milburn: The information requested is provided in the table.

Transitional support to London teaching hospitals 1994/95–1997/98

£000

Year	Total
1994–95	61,892
1995–96	51,823
1996–97	41,716
1997–98	48,869

Notes:
(i) Trusts included in total are: King's College, Guy's & St. Thomas', St. George's, Royal Hospitals, University College Hospital London, Hammersmith, St. Mary's, Chelsea and Westminster
(ii) In addition to the above, financial transitional support has been made available over the period to other London trusts and to London health authorities. The total central funding for London was included in the Turnberg Report

Waiting Lists

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will publish the next set of quarterly waiting lists statistics; and if he will make a statement. [41166]

Mr. Milburn: The next set of quarterly waiting list statistics for England will be published in week commencing 18 May 1998. The figures will be based on provisional information from health authorities and trusts and will show the position on 31 March 1998.

NHS Finances (London)

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the weighted capitation formula, and the market forces factor, will be reviewed for London. [41572]

Mr. Milburn: The national standing Advisory Committee on Resource Allocation is looking at how resources are distributed across both secondary and primary care to ensure that these fully reflect local population needs and operate as fairly as possible.

One of the Committee's tasks is to undertake a review of the staff market forces factor which has important implications for London.

The aim is to complete this review in time to inform health authority allocations for 1999–2000.

NHS (50th Anniversary)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much money (a) his Department and (b) the NHS plan to spend on marking the 50th anniversary of the NHS. [40951]

Mr. Milburn: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) on 19 December 1997, Official Report, columns 389–90. In accordance with the principles that the activity will be decentralised and devolved, will promote core National Health Service aims, and that money is not diverted from patient care, it is for individual NHS organisations to consider what funds they are able to use or generate for local activities, and it is not possible to estimate the likely cost to the NHS.

The costs of central support for the NHS's aims during anniversary year are met from within the Department's publicity and communications budget. In 1997–98, the gross forecast outturn for this element is £1,122,252. In 1998–99, we estimate that the gross contribution will be around £550,000. We intend that this expenditure will be offset by sponsorship wherever possible.

NHS Nurses

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance he has given to NHS trusts on the procedures they should follow in order to check that all applicants for nursing posts are registered nurses. [41116]

Mr. Milburn: On 6 May 1998, the Department published guidance (HSC(98)64 "The Management of Health, Safety and Welfare Issues for National Health Service Staff") which reminds managers of their responsibility for taking up references from previous employers and making registration checks with the appropriate regulatory body. Earlier guidance (EL(92)84) advised employers to check registration before applicants take up post and to designate this as the responsibility of a single named officer.

Psychotherapists

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what steps he intends to take to ensure that those practising as psychotherapists subscribe to a recognised code of practice and ethics; [41118]

(2) what action he intends to take to ensure that those practising as psychotherapists are trained by, and registered with, a reputable body. [41117]

Mr. Milburn: Counselling and psychotherapy services are provided by a wide diversity of professionals. A large number of professional bodies and organisations exist to provide guidance on training, professional practice, ethics and conduct. It is for those professional bodies to agree on matters concerning training and standards of psychotherapists.

We have required National Health Service employers to satisfy themselves that all staff, including those practising as psychotherapists, have the skills and training appropriate to the roles they are required to carry out.

Health Care Assistants

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to prevent nurses who are struck off the register from obtaining posts as health care assistants. [41119]

Mr. Milburn: It is a matter for employers to check that all prospective employees are suitably qualified and experienced for the post to be filled, and to take up references.

Alcohol

Mrs. Roe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to take forward the strategy set out in the green paper, Our Healthier Nation, on alcohol; and what is his Department's timetable for producing this strategy. [41508]

Ms Jowell: We intend to produce a coherent strategy which reinforces our messages about sensible drinking and provides an effective framework for action to tackle alcohol misuse in all its forms. It will need to reflect all of the issues of major concern about alcohol across Government, as well as for other interested parties, including the alcohol industry. Much new co-ordinated work on alcohol is already taking place, for example through the Ministerial group on under-age drinking; the Department of Environment, Transport and the Regions' consultation exercise on drink-driving and the Home Office's recently announced review of liquor licensing. But that work will be more successful if it can take place within the context of a clearer framework for activity. Alcohol Concern have secured private sector support to carry out an extensive consultation exercise by the end of 1998 on what form an alcohol strategy might take. All interests should be reflected in this process and we will await its results before taking further action.

Ritalin

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list by health authority the levels of prescribing of Ritalin (methylphenidate) in terms of (a) numbers of people and (b) cost in (i) 1993–94, (ii) 1994–95, (iii) 1995–96 and (iv) 1996–97. [41203]

Mr. Milburn [holding answer 8 May 1998]: Information on the number of people receiving Ritalin is not available. Information on prescriptions dispensed for individual products such as Ritalin is not released at health authority level. This is in order to preserve patient, contractor and commercial confidentiality.

The net ingredient cost of prescription items dispensed for Ritalin in the community in England from 1993–94 to 1996–97 is shown in the table. Data on prescriptions dispensed in hospital are not available.

The net ingredient cost of prescription items for Ritalin (methylphenidate hydrochloride) dispensed in the community, 1993–94 to 1996–97 in England

£000

Year	Net ingredient cost
1993–94	30.6
1994–95	61.2
1995–96	365.6
1996–97	998.7

Notes:
1. The data cover all prescriptions dispensed in the community, i.e. by community pharmacists and appliance contractors, dispensing doctors, and prescriptions submitted by prescribing doctors for items personally administered in England
2. The net ingredient cost refers to the cost of the drug before discounts and does not include any dispensing costs or fees. It does not include any adjustment for income obtained where a prescription charge is paid at the time the prescription is dispensed or where the patient has purchased a pre-payment certificate

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Sierra Leone

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action was taken by Ministers following publication of the article, "Britain holds talks with hired killers", in The Observer on 8 March. [41576]

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) how many officials or diplomats in his Department have been cited in allegations that at least one official or diplomat had dealings with Sandline International in connection with the supply of arms and aid to Sierra Leone in contravention of a United Nations embargo; [41243]

(2) if he will list all the meetings that have taken place between Lieutenant-Colonel Tim Spicer and (a) the current British High Commissioner to Sierra Leone, (b) himself or other ministers and (c) other officials or diplomats of his Department, stating (i) the dates when they took place, (ii) who was present, (iii) at whose request the meetings took place, (iv) where they took place and (v) what was discussed; [41229]

(3) what contacts (a) he, (b) his ministers and (c) his officials or diplomats have had with Sandline International concerning the supply by that company of arms and aid to Sierra Leone; [41238]

(4) on what date (a) he and (b) his ministers were told about the allegations that at least one diplomat had had dealings with Sandline International in connection with the supply of arms and aid to Sierra Leone in contravention of a United Nations embargo; [41242]

(5) on what date officials in his Department first became aware of allegations that at least one official or diplomat had had dealings with Sandline International in connection with the supply of arms and aid to Sierra Leone in contravention of a United Nations embargo; [41245]

(6) if the provision of arms and aid to Sierra Leone by Sandline International was contrary to United Nations resolution 1132; [41230]

(7) if he will list all the meetings that have taken place between Sandline International and (a) the current British High Commissioner to Sierra Leone, (b) himself or other ministers and (c) other officials or diplomats of his Department, stating (i) the dates when they took place, (ii) who was present, (iii) at whose request the meetings took place, (iv) where they took place and (v) what was discussed; [41235]

(8) what are the terms of reference of his departmental inquiry into the allegations that at least one diplomat had dealings with Sandline International in connection with the supply of arms and aid to Sierra Leone in contravention of a United Nations embargo; who will be conducting it; when it will start work; and when will it finish; [41237]

(9) what (a) formal and (b) informal approaches were made by Sandline International to (i) him, (ii) his ministers and (iii) officials or diplomats in his Department regarding the supply of arms and aid to Sierra Leone; [41239]

(10) on what date (a) he and (b) his ministers were first told that the allegations that at least one diplomat had had dealings with Sandline International in connection with the supply of arms and aid to Sierra Leone in contravention of a United Nations embargo had been referred to HM Customs and Excise; [41241]

(11) on what date officials in his Department referred the allegation that at least one official or diplomat had had dealings with Sandline International in connection with the supply of arms and aid to Sierra Leone in contravention of a United Nations embargo to HM Customs and Excise; [41244]

(12) on what date and for what reasons he decided to hold an internal departmental inquiry into the allegations that at least one diplomat had had dealings with Sandline International in connection with the supply of arms and aid to Sierra Leone in contravention of a United Nations embargo; [41231]

(13) if he will make it his policy to publish the report and findings of the internal departmental inquiry into the allegations that at least one diplomat had dealings with Sandline International in connection with the supply of arms and aid to Sierra Leone in contravention of a United Nations embargo; [41236]

(14) when (a) he and (b) his ministers were first told of the allegations made in The Observer in March that at least one diplomat had had dealings with Sandline

International in connection with the supply of arms and aid to Sierra Leone in contravention of a United Nations embargo; and what action he or they then took, and when. [41240]

Mr. Robin Cook: I refer the right hon. and hon. Members to the answer I gave to the Private Notice Question tabled by the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) on 6 May 1998, Official Report, columns 721–31.

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what help given by the current British High Commissioner in respect of the successful counter-coup in Sierra Leone led him to congratulate the High Commissioner to Sierra Leone on giving such help. [41234]

Mr. Robin Cook: I congratulated the British High Commissioner in June 1997 on his role in the evacuation of British citizens and others from Sierra Leone during the coup in May. I have sent no message since.

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the use of a picture of the current British High Commissioner to Sierra Leone on T-shirts being sold in that country. [41232]

Mr. Robin Cook: We are not selling any such T-shirts, and have no stake in any commercial enterprise that is.

Soviet Union (Nuclear Reactors)

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what data he has collated on the risks in respect of nuclear reactors in the former Soviet Union. [40903]

Mrs. Beckett: I have been asked to reply.

The International Atomic Energy Agency has published a series of technical documents on the Soviet-designed WER and RBMK (Chernobyl types) reactor types. A major European Union-financed report on the safety of the RBMK reactors has also been completed. These identify and prioritise the main safety issues which need to be addressed. These documents are being used by the countries concerned and international donors, to help shape safety upgrading programmes. The UK continues to work with our G7 and European Union partners to improve nuclear safety in the countries concerned and to encourage them to develop viable energy sector strategies that enable alternative generating capacity to be brought on line, allowing the older, less safe, reactors to close.

Berlin Airlift

Mr. Howard: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what events the Government are planning to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the Berlin airlift. [40639]

Mr. Spellar: I have been asked to reply.

The Berlin Airlift was a remarkable expression of Allied cooperation and it is fitting that our commemoration of this event should also reflect that spirit.

The annual wreath laying ceremony in Berlin is to take place on 12 May 1998, and will be supported by the RAF Western Band. The British Ambassador to Germany will lay a wreath on behalf of the nation.

The Queen's Colour Squadron of the RAF, the RAF Western Band, RAF aircraft and the Battle of Britain Memorial Flight Dakota will participate in various ceremonies marking the 50th Anniversary of the start of the Airlift. These will include those at the former RAF Airlift base at Gatow, the Tempelhof Airbridge Open Days and the opening celebrations for the Allied Museum Berlin which my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Defence, has accepted an invitation to attend. The RAF will also be represented at the Berlin Air Show in May which has been dedicated to the Airlift and at a military history symposium in Berlin during July.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Organised Crime

2. Mr. Stephen Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on European Union initiatives to combat organised crime. [40264]

Mr. Straw: This has been a major priority for the United Kingdom Presidency.

We have made good progress in implementing the Action Plans on organised crime and drugs, which have included: negotiation of a Pre-Accession Pact with the countries of central and eastern Europe and Cyprus; a new funding programme [to support further action against organised crime]; the new convention on mutual legal assistance.

And we have resolved most of the outstanding difficulties to allow Europol to become fully functional in the autumn.

23. Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to ensure effective responses to evidence of sophisticated syndicates of organised criminals operating across national borders. [40285]

Mr. Michael: The Government have used the opportunity of the Presidency of the European Union to drive forward the fight against transnational organised crime and the menace it poses. The National Criminal Intelligence Service and the National Crime Squad provide a focus for operational activity which contributes to efficient and effective international co-operation.

Sex Offenders

7. Miss Kirkbride: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to implement the powers for the supervision of sex offenders contained in the Crime (Sentences) Act 1997. [40269]

Mr. Michael: The provisions for the extended supervision of sex offenders in the Crime (Sentences) Act 1997 were not implemented as they were linked to other provisions on release and post-release supervision which were unnecessarily complicated. Instead, we have brought forward fresh provisions for extended supervision of sexual and violent offenders, which are contained in the Crime and Disorder Bill.

Racial Violence

22. Dr. Ladyman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to introduce measures to combat racial violence. [40284]

Mr. Michael: The lives of far too many people have been damaged or destroyed by racial violence and harassment. In our manifesto, Labour promised to crack down on mindless, racist thuggery and the Crime and Disorder Bill introduces new offences of racial violence, harassment and criminal damage. These will send out a strong message to society that racist crime is unacceptable, while the inquiry into the death of Stephen Lawrence will identify the lessons to be learnt for the investigation and prosecution of racially motivated crime.

Drug Misuse

24. Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to encourage the extension of arrest referral schemes by the police as a means of combating drug use. [40286]

Mr. George Howarth: One of the four key aims of the Government's recently published drugs strategy is to protect communities from drug-related crime. Action planned in support of this aim will include promotion of arrest referral schemes. Currently, just over half the police forces in England and Wales have arrest referral schemes.

29. Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent research he has commissioned into the link between drugs and crime. [40291]

Mr. George Howarth: Research currently in progress includes work on the criminal lifestyles of crack addicts, on the effects of treatment of addicts' criminality, and on developing performance indicators for police anti-drugs strategies. Consideration is also being given to extending a project on drug testing and interviewing arrestees, the first results of which were published last month.

32. Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of people arrested by the police are addicted to heroin and other opiates. [40294]

Mr. Michael: Information on what proportion of people arrested by the police are addicted to heroin and other opiates is not available. However, a study conducted for the Home Office by the University of Cambridge of drug use by samples of people arrested by the police in various English cities was published recently, and a copy is in the Library.

Urine tests showed high levels of recent drug consumption among arrestees—61 per cent. had taken at least one illegal drug. Comparatively high proportions of arrestees across all sample areas tested positive for heroin/opiates (18 per cent.). The proportion of interviewees who said they were dependent on heroin was 11 per cent.; 9 per cent. admitted dependency on methadone; and a further 2 per cent. on dipipanone (Diconal). It should be noted that the proportions admitting drug dependence varied from one sample to another.

33. Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will visit the drugs awareness scheme in Bethnal Green and Bow to discuss community-based projects to tackle drug abuse among young people. [40295]

Mr. George Howarth: I am happy to receive information about the scheme but have no plans to visit.

36. Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the priorities of his Department for the UK presidency of the European Union in respect of drug abuse. [40298]

Mr. George Howarth: The United Kingdom Presidency has given priority to action against drug trafficking and drugs misuse, in particular by building on the wide range of work already underway across the three pillars of the European Union, which covers the responsibilities of a number of Government Departments. A main objective for the Home Office, in addition to ongoing practical activity, such as implementation of the Joint Actions on new synthetic drugs and approximation of drugs laws and practices, has been to launch consideration of a new five-year European Union drugs strategy, which would take effect from 2000. We have tabled detailed proposals of the key aims and goals of the new strategy.

We have also played a significant part in ensuring an effective input to European Union co-ordination in the preparatory process for the United Nations General Assembly Special Session on Drugs, being held in New York in June, particularly in areas of direct interest to the Home Office, such as precursor chemicals, amphetamine-type stimulants, judicial co-operation, money laundering and drugs demand reduction.

Paedophiles

25. Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received about the length of sentences given to paedophiles. [40287]

Mr. Michael: Since the beginning of the year, my right hon. Friend and I have received 76 representations from hon. Members relating to sex offenders, and the Criminal Policy Directorate has received over 400 letters and petitions from members of the public.

Women Prisoners

26. Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the custody of women prisoners. [40288]

Ms Quin: Following the very helpful report published last year by Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons, a new Directorate of Regimes has been established with an Assistant Director who has direct responsibility for women in prison. Within that framework, the needs of women prisoners are being re-examined, with particular attention to the development of constructive regimes and programmes to address offending behaviour.

Prisoners' Paid Employment

27. Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what regulations govern paid employment for a person serving a custodial sentence. [40289]

Ms Quin: Regulations governing prisoners' pay and earning are set out in Prison Service Standing Order 6 and the Prisoners' Pay Manual which was introduced in 1992, copies of which are in the Library.

The manual sets out a framework within which prisoners can be rewarded for taking part in purposeful activities. Properly balanced incentives encourage sustained effort from prisoners engaging in those activities. We are looking again at this to see whether further changes need to be made.

Computer Pornography

28. Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received regarding control of pornography in computer magazines. [40290]

Mr. Michael: Since December 1997, seven representations about computer magazines have been received, three from hon. Members, one from a Member of another place and three from members of the public. None of them specifically concerned explicit sexual material.

Human Rights Bill

30. Mr. Bradshaw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received from the churches about measures contained in the Human Rights Bill [Lords]. [40292]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: My right hon. Friend has had meetings with representatives of a number of churches, and my noble Friend has met a delegation from the group "Christians for Human Rights". We have also received a good deal of correspondence. We are taking account of all the various views expressed in considering how to respond to the amendments made to the Bill in another place.

Immigration

31. Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the impact of the Dublin convention on British control of the immigration of non-EU nationals from EU member states. [40293]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Dublin Convention has made it more difficult and time consuming to secure the return to other member states from the United Kingdom of non-European Union nationals who claim asylum on arrival here. Under our Presidency of the European Union, we are seeking agreement on a programme of action aimed at improving the operation of the Dublin Convention .

Protection for the Elderly

34. Mr. Bill O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has to give greater protection to older people in respect of (a) mugging, (b) burglary and (c) fear of crime; and if he will make a statement. [40296]

Mr. Michael: The well-being of elderly people is a very high priority for this Government. Crimes against the elderly are particularly shocking, and we are determined to ensure that they are effectively addressed. Measures in the Crime and Disorder Bill will help achieve this goal.

Under the Bill, the police and local authorities will be required to form partnerships to identify and to reduce crime and disorder. These partnerships will bring together many agencies and, importantly, will entail the full involvement of the local community. Implementation will involve local consultation, and guidance which we plan to issue in July will include specific reference to the need for public meetings and other forms of consultation to be accessible to all members of the community, including the elderly. The partnerships will be required to conduct an audit of current levels of crime and disorder and to devise a strategy to tackle specific local problems, including those affecting the elderly.

Fortunately, crime risks for the elderly are lower than they might appear from media coverage. The British Crime Survey found that, across a wide range of offence categories, risks for those aged 16 to 29 were at least treble the risks for the elderly. For assault, young people were 37 times more at risk.

Asylum Seekers

35. Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applicants for political asylum are currently detained in secure accommodation while their case is being investigated. [40297]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: As at 31 March 1998, the most recent date for which information is available, a total of 765 persons who had sought asylum at some stage were recorded as being detained solely under Immigration Act powers.

Prisoners' Meals

37. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to ensure prisoners receive varied and nutritious meals. [40299]

Ms Quin: All prison establishments offer multi-choice menus with about 50 per cent. offering prisoners the opportunity to pre-select their meals. These pre-select meals also incorporate information which allows prisoners to select healthy eating options.

Home Security

38. Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the Government's initiatives to increase the security of people in their homes. [40300]

Mr. Michael: The Crime and Disorder Bill includes a range of measures to reduce crime and disorder, and the fear of crime. Foremost of these is the proposal for the police and local authorities together to undertake a crime and disorder audit in the district, borough or unitary authority area, in consultation with other agencies and the wider community. They will then have to develop a local strategy to tackle the identified crime and disorder problems. The work of the partnerships created to implement the local strategies, which will include clear targets, will include action at a much more local level within the local authority area. I am confident that these measures will have a significant effect on local levels of crime and disorder, and that this will in turn help people to feel more secure both in their homes and their communities.

Animal Experiments

39. Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the number of animal experiments that will be carried out in 1998–99 under the terms of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986. [40301]

Mr. George Howarth: Statistics on animal use can be collated only in retrospect and this is done on a calendar year basis. We expect to publish the figures for 1997 in July. We do not expect a significant increase.

We cannot predict the number of procedures that will take place in the coming year. Although project licence applicants must estimate how many animals are to be used per year in each protocol, these figures are not collated centrally and, in practice, the number of animals actually used falls short of this estimate. We cannot predict the number of new project licence applications that we will receive during the year, or the number of animals that each will seek authority to use.

The Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 does not make provision for controlling the overall number of procedures; it requires that project licences be granted only if the benefits have been weighed against the costs and the purpose of the work cannot be achieved by other means. Whilst we can ensure that the number of animals used in each programme of work is minimised, we cannot dictate how many applications for new project licences will be submitted nor how many proposed programmes will satisfy the requirements of the Act, particularly the cost/benefit assessment. The number of scientific procedures involving animals is dependent on a number of factors, including the implications of scientific breakthroughs and the buoyancy of United Kingdom industry.

The primary purpose of the 1986 Act is to reduce suffering. In consequence, where there is a choice between one protocol involving a certain number of animals and a more severe protocol involving fewer animals, the former will, in many cases, be authorised. One of the roles played by the Home Office Animals (Scientific Procedures) Inspectorate is to ensure that applications to use animals have taken full account of the 3Rs concept of alternatives (refining procedures to minimise suffering; reducing the number of animals used; and replacing procedures with ones not involving protected animals), while ensuring that the scientific integrity and value of the work is not compromised.

The overall number of procedures is not a true indication of the effectiveness of the Act.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps are being taken to end the testing of cosmetics on animals; and if he will make a statement. [41097]

Mr. George Howarth: We have already announced an end to the testing of finished cosmetic products on animals in the United Kingdom and we are exploring the possibility of extending this ban to cover ingredients intended primarily for "vanity products". (The European definition of cosmetics includes sun screens, toothpastes and other products which may be considered to be pharmaceuticals in other countries).

European Directives require that new and, in certain circumstances, existing ingredients be tested to ensure that they are safe to use, manufacture and transport. For these purposes, animal tests are still required.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to reduce the number of experiments conducted on animals in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [41098]

Mr. George Howarth: The Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 does not make provision for controlling the overall number of procedures; it requires that project licences be granted only if the benefits have been weighed against the costs and the purpose of the work cannot be achieved by other means. We cannot dictate how many applications for new project licences will be submitted, or how many proposed programmes will satisfy the requirements of the Act, particularly the cost/benefit assessment.

We are promoting the development, validation and use of alternative methods which replace animal use, reduce the number of animals needed and refine procedures to minimise suffering (the 3Rs). To this end: we have announced our intention to explore, with the Animal Procedures Committee and the European Centre for the Validation of Alternative Methods (ECVAM), the possibility of promoting databases on alternative methods; we have increased the money made available to the Animal Procedures Committee to sponsor research on alternatives from £182,000 to £259,000; we will be requiring project licence applicants to state what consideration they have given to alternatives before a licence is granted; and we are discussing with regulators how best to apply the 3Rs to regulatory safety testing.

Air Guns

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to review the law controlling air guns. [41155]

Mr. Michael: It is illegal to carry a loaded air weapon in a public place, to discharge an air weapon within 50 feet of a road or to use one to shoot birds or other protected animals.

The Government have no current plans to introduce further legislation on firearms controls, but will keep under close scrutiny the way in which air weapons are used. We shall consult widely with all interested parties if further steps are considered necessary.

Suicides

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many young people under the age of 21 years have committed suicide or attempted suicide while on remand awaiting trial, in each of the last three years; and if he will make a statement. [40025]

Ms Quin: Some of the information requested is shown in the table. It should be noted that the number of deaths shown are of self-inflicted deaths, a broader definition than that of suicide, particularly as the inquest into some deaths have yet to take place. The information requested on attempted suicides is not available in the format requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Probation Constables

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received about the proposal to relocate the District Training Centre for probationer constables in Durham away from the North East; what factors underlay this proposal; and if he will consult with local parties on this matter. [41467]

Mr. Michael: My right hon. Friend has received correspondence from Councillor George Gill, the Chairman of the Northumbria Police Authority and from eight right hon. or hon. Members who have written in support.

The future of probationer training in the North East is under examination in the light of the forthcoming expiry of the lease of the present site at Durham in December 1999 and against the background of the demand for probationer training places generally. A working group composed of representatives of the Association of Police Authorities, the Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO), the police staff associations, National Police Training (NPT) and the Home Office, has been set up to consider NPT's accommodation requirements in the North East and more generally, and to make recommendations. No final decision has been made and there is no preconceived view that probationer training should not take place in the North East. The working group, whose members include the Chief Constable of Durham Constabulary, will take full account of the views of the police authorities and forces in the North East. The correspondence from Councillor Gill has also been circulated to the working group.

In view of the approaching expiry of the lease for the site at Durham, it was considered right to make plans on the basis that the centre would then close. However, the working group will consider any proposals which may be made for an extension of the lease alongside any other options which may emerge. In doing so, they will take account of the shortcomings in the facilities at the centre and the cost of the premises compared to alternatives, including the possibility of a Public Private Partnership.

Children (Supervision)

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the extent of unsupervised gatherings of children aged under 10 years at night. [41210]

Mr. Michael: Research by the Home Office and others has shown that one of the strongest factors in relation to the commencement of offending by juveniles is poor parental supervision. One of the measures which the Government will introduce as part of their youth justice reform programme will be the local child curfew.

The Crime and Disorder Bill [Lords] will give local authorities a permissive power to introduce local child curfews for unsupervised children under 10 who are out on the streets late at night. The aim of such curfews is two-fold. They will address the need to protect young children from being drawn into anti-social or criminal behaviour, and they will protect communities from the misery and distress which can be caused by groups of unsupervised children.

Anti-social Behaviour Orders

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to ensure that anti-social behaviour orders are not used improperly. [41211]

Mr. Michael: The fact that only local authorities and the police, in consultation with one another, will be able to apply to the courts for orders will help to avoid any risk of improper use. It will be up to the courts to decide whether an anti-social behaviour order can be granted. We are producing detailed guidance to make clear the kind of circumstances in which applications should or should not be made.

We have already given an undertaking to Parliament to review the effectiveness of the provisions and report our findings. This review will cover the types of behaviour for which orders are sought.

Europol Convention

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list for (i) the Convention of the European Police Office (Europol Convention), European Communities No. 12 (1995) CM 3050 and (ii) the Protocol to that Convention concerning Privileges and Immunities of its Organs and Staff, European Communities No. 12 (1997) CM 3767 (a) which members of the European Union have ratified it and (b) when it came into force, and in respect of (ii) for what reasons privileges and immunities apply to its staff, members of its Management Board and Financial Committee, and its Financial Controller, when they have ceased serving in those capacities. [41233]

Mr. Michael: The Europol Convention has been ratified in Austria, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, Ireland, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Sweden and the United Kingdom. It will enter into force on the first day of the month following the expiry of a three-month period after ratification by the final member state.

The Protocol on Privileges and Immunities has been ratified in Denmark, Finland, Ireland, the Netherlands, Sweden and the United Kingdom. It will enter into force on the first day of the second month following ratification by the final member state.

Article 8 of the Protocol deals with the immunities which will apply to Europol staff and members of its organs

"in respect of words spoken or written, and acts performed by them, in the exercise of their official functions".

There may well be situations in which individuals would be obliged to fulfil such official functions (such as the giving of evidence in judicial proceedings) after they had ceased to serve in those capacities, and therefore the same Article goes on to provide that in those circumstances the immunities would still apply.

Cocoon Watch Scheme

Ms Shipley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to extend the Cocoon Watch Scheme. [40561]

Mr. Michael: Cocoon Watch is an approach which the police and other agencies may choose to adopt as part of local strategies, depending on local circumstances. The early indications of its success to combat domestic violence in Killingbeck are welcome and I am looking forward to seeing a further report on its use in the Killingbeck project later this year. Any wider adoption of this approach would be a matter for local decision.

Vulnerable and Intimidated Witnesses

Sir Raymond Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects the review on the treatment of vulnerable and intimidated witnesses to be complete. [41591]

Mr. Michael: In consultation with colleagues, my right hon. Friend and I are currently considering how to take forward the final report of the inter-departmental working group on vulnerable and intimidated witnesses, which we received recently.

Prisoners

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will discuss with the Lord Chancellor the possibility of denying prisoners serving custodial sentences access to civil justice in matters relating to the conduct of the Prison Service unless they have first exhausted all internal grievance procedures and taken their case to the Prisons Ombudsman; and if he will make a statement. [41023]

Ms Quin: I refer the hon. Member to the replies I gave to him on 20 April 1998, Official Report, columns 515–16, and 5 May 1998, Official Report, column 367. I shall ask Prison Service officials to advise on prisoners' access to civil justice generally at the same time as advising on their use of small claims court procedures.

Public Bodies

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many and what proportion of his Department's appointees to non-departmental public bodies are (i) aged under 25, (ii) aged 25 to 30 and (iii) aged 31 to 35 years. [40743]

Mr. Straw: Of the 526 appointees to my Department's non-departmental public bodies (NDPBs), one is aged under 25 years, one is aged between 25 and 30 and two are aged between 31 and 35 years. This includes appointments made by the Prime Minister to NDPBs sponsored by my Department.

The Government are committed to encouraging a wide range of candidates to apply for positions on the boards of public bodies, reflecting the diverse society in which we live. This includes encouraging more young people to put themselves forward as potential candidates for public appointments. All appointments are made on merit and candidates must demonstrate that they have the necessary skills and experience to match the needs of the public body on which they wish to serve.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Trust Ports

Mr. Benton: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made in relation to the Review of Trust Ports in Northern Ireland announced on 26 August 1997; and if she will make a statement. [41803]

Marjorie Mowlam: The Review of Trust Ports in Northern Ireland which I announced last year has now been concluded. In general, the review findings serve to reinforce the strategic importance of the commercial Trusts Ports in relation to the Northern Ireland economy. However the review has identified the need to broaden and extend the powers of the commercial Trust Ports and to ease the financial controls under which they currently operate, to enable them to meet the challenges of the future. Further detailed consideration will now be given to these recommendations with a view to bringing forward suitable legislation at the earliest opportunity.

During the course of the review, Belfast Harbour Commissioners submitted to the Department of the Environment (NI) a proposal for the future development of the Port of Belfast. This followed careful consideration by the Commissioners of a range of possible future options. BHC's preferred option envisaged the transfer of the Port to the private sector by means of a placed flotation and the establishment of a public/private partnership, through the retention by the Government of a golden share in the successor company.

The Harbour Commissioners consider that such a change to the status of the port is necessary to assure its long-term viability and competitive position, and offers the benefit of enabling the successor company to raise private equity and debt to finance its future development. The golden share arrangement is intended to ensure that the wider interests of the Northern Ireland economy are safeguarded.

The Department accepts that transfer of the port to the private sector and the establishment of a public/private partnership, as outlined in BHC's proposal, represents the best option for the future and will enable the port to realise its full commercial potential. Accordingly the Department has today conveyed to BHC its agreement, in principle, to the proposal (subject to certain conditions) and invited the Commissioners to further develop the proposal with a view to bringing forward a Scheme for the Department's detailed consideration. Under the Ports (NI) Order 1994, any such Scheme will be subject to public consultation.

There are no plans to change the current status of any other Trust Ports in Northern Ireland. However, following the review, in addition to widening the powers and easing the financial controls on the other commercial Trust ports, further consideration will now be given to improving their accountability by increasing District Council representation on the boards.

Crime and Disorder Legislation

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans she has to introduce legislation for Northern Ireland containing provisions similar to those of the Crime and Disorder Bill [Lords]. [40635]

Mr. Ingram: Different local administrative and legislative arrangements limit the applicability of much of the Crime and Disorder Bill to Northern Ireland. However, a small number of provisions will be introduced to Northern Ireland by means of a negative resolution clause in the Bill. These are the sex offender order, the drug treatment and testing order, TV links for pre-trial hearings, the abolition of doli incapax and powers for youth courts to deal with unrelated charges. In addition, should Parliament decide to retain the clause, introduced in the House of Lords, which abolishes the death penalty in respect of treason and piracy, then the relevant legislation in respect of Northern Ireland will be repealed by the Bill.

The potential impact of the remaining provisions will be assessed, taking account of experience in England and Wales, in order to determine whether similar measures should be incorporated in future Northern Ireland legislation.

Public Bodies

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many and what proportion of her Department's appointees to non-departmental public bodies are (i) aged under 25, (ii) aged 25 to 30 and (iii) aged 31 to 35 years. [40734]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The information requested is not available. Dates of birth of appointees were not recorded before 1 July 1996, the date on which the Guidance of the Commissioner for Public Appointments took effect. Details covering the period 1996–97 are available in the Secretary of State's First Annual Report on Public Appointments, copies of which have been placed in the Libraries of the House.

The Government are committed to encouraging a wide range of candidates, including young people, to apply for positions on public bodies. This includes encouraging more young people to put themselves forward as potential candidates for public appointments. All appointments are made on merit, and candidates must demonstrate that they have the necessary skills and experience to match the needs of the public body on which they wish to serve.

Inward Investment

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many visits to each district council area by potential inward investors were arranged by the Industrial Development Board between 1 April 1997 and 31 March 1998. [40927]

Mr. Ingram: The information requested is as follows:

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Countryside Access

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many grants have been made from the National Lottery (a) to encourage walking and footpath development and restoration and (b) to increase access to the countryside. [40431]

Mr. Banks: The Lottery distributors estimate they have awarded some £440 million to projects designed to encourage walking, footpath development and restoration, and access to the countryside. The distributors do not however record these awards separately. Details are set out in the table:

Distributor	Number of awards	Value of awards (£)

[1] ACE has made some 375 capital grants totalling £370 million to rural projects. Some of these will cover the areas specified but they cannot be precisely identified.

Football (Racism)

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what response he has made to the Football Task Force report into racism in football. [41866]

Mr. Banks: I welcome and fully support the practical recommendations made in the Task Force's report, which I believe can make a significant contribution to eliminating racism within the game. I have written today to the bodies identified in the report, asking them how they intend to take the measures relevant to them forward, and seeking a clear timetable for action.

There are two specific recommendations that fall to Government: that the Football Offences Act 1991 should be amended to make racist abuse by individual spectators an offence; and that schoolchildren should have access to playing fields on a regular basis.

The Government will be amending the Football Offences Act 1991 as soon as legislative priorities allow. There is no suitable legislative opportunity available at this time. In the meantime, the Home Office has written to all chief police officers in England and Wales reminding them of existing powers under the Public Order Act 1986, which makes it an offence to use threatening, abusive or insulting words or behaviour with the intention of causing harassment, alarm or distress to the person to whom such words or behaviour are directed.

The Government recognise that schoolchildren should have access to playing fields to enable them to participate in a range of sports. We recently announced how we will protect existing playing fields needed by schools and communities through new legislation requiring schools to seek consent for the sale of playing fields and by tightening planning controls.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Housing (Disabled Access)

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will require local authorities to build new housing which is funded by capital receipts to those standards for accessibility which are proposed to be included in an extension of Part M of the building regulations. [40336]

Mr. Raynsford: We announced on 9 March 1998, Official Report, columns 12–13, that Part M of the Building Regulations would be extended to include new dwellings. Part M will cover all new dwellings, including those built as a result of the additional resources released under the Capital Receipts Initiative. Amendment Regulations will be laid later this year and will come into force 12 months after publication.

New housing built by Registered Social Landlords has to meet standards prescribed by the Housing Corporation which already covers most of the requirements of Part M.

Diving

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will re-activate the Newcastle diving registry records as a basis for a comprehensive database of divers. [41128]

Angela Eagle: The Health and Safety Executive has no plans to re-activate the Newcastle diving registry, but is investigating whether the information collected in the registry can provide information which could be useful in the proposed research project into the long-term health effects associated with diving.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what action was taken by the Health and Safety Executive in response to the Offshore Technology report, OTO 94 009 Neurological and Cerebrovascular Abnormalities in Divers, issued in August 1994, in respect of its findings relating to damage caused to the central nervous system by diving. [41127]

Angela Eagle: In my written reply, given on 22 January 1998, Official Report, columns 614–15, to one of the hon. Friend's earlier questions, I explained that HSE was commissioning research into the long-term health effects associated with diving. This was, partly, in response to the report referred to.

The initial advertisement and tendering exercise for this research project was not concluded successfully and so the scope of the project is being reconsidered with a view to readvertising it.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many professional divers he estimates there were in each year since 1979; and how many have had their medical certificates revoked or not reissued due to medical conditions directly attributable to diving. [41130]

Angela Eagle: The best estimates of the numbers of active professional divers in Great Britain come from the numbers of medical examinations notified to the Health and Safety Executive by approved medical examiners of divers under the Diving Operations at Work Regulations 1981 and the Diving at Work Regulations 1997. These figures are readily available only from 1989 and are shown in the table. Information for the period between 1985 and 1989 could be obtained only at disproportionate expense.

The medical condition causing divers to fail their medicals is reported to the Health and Safety Executive, but not the cause of that condition. The conditions are often those prevalent in the general population, for example hypertension, which may, or may not, be attributable to diving. It is not, therefore, possible to state which of the failures were the result of conditions caused by diving. The numbers of divers failing their medicals from 1989 is shown in the table.

Since 1995, only one medical certificate has been revoked. The diver concerned had a serious medical condition, unrelated to diving, which was not disclosed to the examining doctor. This condition put the diver at a serious risk. Information on other revocations is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate expense.

Year	Medicals	Failures
1989–90	3,943	30
1990–91	4,746	33
1991–92	4,749	60
1992–93	5,054	43
1993–94	4,984	78
1994–95	4,911	23

Pipelines

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the Government's policy on the development of pipelines for the movement of fluids and freight in the United Kingdom. [41102]

Ms Glenda Jackson: There are a number of pipeline networks in the UK for the transport of gases and liquids such as oil and water. I am not aware of any major movements of freight by pipeline, but if my hon. Friend has a particular issue in mind, perhaps she could write to me.

Wildlife Sites

Sir Peter Emery: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what measures he plans to take to protect wildlife sites affected by abstraction and sewage effluent. [41201]

Angela Eagle: After consulting interested parties, my right hon. Friends the Deputy Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Wales will publish in July their guidance to the Director General of Water Services on the environmental obligations which they will expect the water companies to meet during the period covered by the Director's current water price review—that is, the years 2000 to 2005.

Roads (Warrington)

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment his Department has made of the effect on Warrington's economic development of (a) building and (b) not building a new Junction 8 on the M62. [40897]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 7 May 1998]: This scheme is being considered as part of the Government's strategic Roads Review. The economic impact of the scheme is being assessed as part of the new appraisal technique that has been developed as part of that Roads Review.

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what estimate he has made of the level of traffic-related pollutants on the A49 in Warrington over the next five years (a) if a new Junction 8 is built on the M62 and (b) if no new junction is constructed; [40896]

(2) what estimate he has made of traffic flows on the A49 in Warrington over the next five years (a) if a new Junction 8 is built on the M62 and (b) if no new junction is constructed. [40898]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 7 May 1998]: I have asked the Chief Executive of the Highways Agency, Mr. Lawrie Haynes, to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Helen Jones, dated 12 May 1998:

The Transport Minister, Glenda Jackson has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Questions about the effects of the proposed new Junction 8 on the M62 on the traffic flows and related pollutants on the A49 in Warrington. The proposal for a new junction is linked with that to widen the M62 between Junctions 8 to 9 and all the information given in this reply assumes that the full scheme is implemented.

We have carried out air quality assessments at two locations adjacent to the A49 in Warrington: Winwick Link junction, north of M62, and Forton Leisure Centre, south of the motorway.

At the northern location, traffic related pollutant concentrations are currently well within air quality standards and will remain so by the year 2003, with or without the construction of M62 New Junction 8.

Concentrations of particulates south of the motorway are within air quality standards but, because of the large volume of traffic on the A49, standards for carbon monoxide, benzene and oxides of nitrogen are already exceeded. However, by the year 2003, tighter emission controls which have already been introduced on new vehicles are expected to bring about an improvement, and traffic relief from the introduction of the new junction would mean that levels of all pollutants would be significantly lower than would otherwise be the case. Oxides of nitrogen are, however, still expected to exceed current standards with or without scheme.

Taking the busiest peak hour, and assuming high growth in order to present a worst case, the estimated traffic flows on the A49 in Warrington are:

On the A49 at Winwick Link, north of M62 Junction 9:

2381 vehicles/hour in 1998

(a) 2436 vehicles/hour in 2003 if Junction 8 is built

(b) 2534 vehicles/hour in 2003 if Junction 8 is not built

On the A49 Winwick Road, south of M62 Junction 9:

4645 vehicles/hour in 1998

(a) 3785 vehicles/hour in 2003 if Junction 8 is built

(b) 4793 vehicles/hour in 2003 if Junction 8 is not built

In the light of recent traffic surveys we are reviewing these forecasts for the forthcoming Public Inquiry into the Junction 8 proposals but we do not expect the level of traffic relief offered by the new junction to change significantly.

Electoral Arrangements (North Somerset)

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to give effect to the Local Government Commission's recommendations for electoral arrangements in North Somerset. [41527]

Mr. Raynsford: We are currently considering the representations which we have received on the Commission's recommendations, and intend to announce our preliminary response to those recommendations as soon as practicable.

Freight Transport

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the Government's policy towards the levels of freight transported internationally. [41457]

Ms Glenda Jackson: International freight movements are a reflection of economic activity. While growth in this area is evidence of a healthy economy, such traffic should take place efficiently and with regard to its environmental impact.

Bangladeshi-registered Airlines

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list air services operated by Bangladeshi-registered airlines operating to or from the United Kingdom. [41557]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Biman Bangladesh Airlines is the Bangladeshi-registered airline designated to operate scheduled services to and from the UK. It currently operates five passenger services per week between Dhaka and London Heathrow using DC-10 aircraft.

In addition, any airline registered in Bangladesh may apply to the Department for permission to operate ad-hoc charter services.

Cycle Routes

Sir Raymond Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many miles of cycle way have been introduced since May 1997; and what (a) encouragement and (b) support is given to local authorities to introduce cycle ways. [41589]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Information about the lengths of cycle tracks or cycle routes provided in local authority areas in England is not held centrally. We encourage all local authorities to respond to the National Cycling Strategy by establishing local cycling strategies, and by setting local targets for increases in cycle use. We support local authorities efforts with funding from the annual local transport budget, based on their Transport Policies and Programme submissions. This year, over 70 package bids are being supported, all containing cycling measures. We also provide technical support through an extensive range of Traffic Advisory Leaflets and other publications on cycling, and in response to day-to-day inquiries.

Housing (Disabled Conversions)

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the total level of grants made to convert housing to enable people with spinal cord injury to live in their own homes; and how many properties were converted in each year since 1990–91. [40865]

Mr. Raynsford: Information on the level of disabled facilities grants given to those suffering from spinal cord injuries, and the number of homes converted, is not collected by the Department. However, research published by the Department in 1996 estimates that in 1993–94, such grants were given to 1,141 people with spinal problems.

Roads (Litter Clearance)

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions which body is responsible under section 89 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 for the clearance of litter in Cambridgeshire on (a) the M11, (b) the A11, (c) the A14 and (d) the A10. [41604]

Angela Eagle: Under Section 89 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990, the Highways Agency are responsible for the clearance of litter on the M11. Responsibility for litter clearance on the A11, A14 and A10 falls to the relevant district councils along those routes.

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many applications were made under section 91 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 for the issue of litter abatement orders in (a) Cambridgeshire, (b) the Eastern Region and (c) England in the last year for which figures are available; and how many orders were made in each case. [41605]

Angela Eagle: These figures have not been collected centrally. However, the Tidy Britain Group will be requesting information on applications for litter abatement orders and the number that are issued when they carry out their local authority enforcement survey later this year.

Lifebelts

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he is taking to standardise the lifebelt regulations for inshore fishing boats which also operate as pleasure boats. [41606]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Inshore fishing boats which also operate as boats used commercially for sport or pleasure must comply with safety requirements depending on the distance they operate from a safe haven.

Boats operating more than 3 miles out to sea or more than 15 miles from a nominated departure point must comply with a Code of Practice—The Safety of Small Commercial Motor Vessels, which sets out the standard safety requirements including those relating to the carriage of life jackets and lifebuoys.

Boats operating less than 3 miles out to sea and less than 15 miles from a nominated departure point must comply with safety requirements laid down by local authorities. A draft safety code which will standardise safety requirements for these vessels has been developed, and Ministers have agreed that public consultation on this code may take place.

Freedom of Information

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish the HSE Working Party on Freedom of Information Memorandum on Persistent Inquirers for Information, Special Monitoring, dated 18 December 1997. [41601]

Angela Eagle: I have placed a copy of the memorandum in the library, anonymised to protect personal privacy. The purpose of the memorandum is to ensure that the named inquirers get all the information to which they are entitled in a consistent, fully explained and usable form.

Access Committee for England

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the future financial support from his Department for disabled persons and disability groups through the Access Committee for England. [40558]

Mr. Raynsford: The question is taken to refer to funding for the Access Committee for England (ACE), for which this Department's involvement has always been peripheral, confined normally to occasional research projects. In the event of the Department inviting ACE to bid, in accordance with the Department's specification, for any future project requirements, a bid from ACE would be considered on its merits alongside other bids invited for that work.

Environmental Impact Assessment Directive

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received on the Government's proposals for implementing the requirements of the amended Environmental Impact Assessment Directive (97/11/EC); and if he will make a statement. [41888]

Mr. Caborn: Following an initial consultation last Summer, a second consultation paper on the implementation of the amended EIA Directive was issued on 19 December 1997. It set out our detailed proposals for refining the way in which the need for EIA is determined in the UK. To date, 195 responses have been received from business, government and environmental organisations across the UK, as well as members of the public. In addition, one response was submitted on a confidential basis. A list of responses received has been placed in the Library of the House. Copies of the responses themselves have been placed in my Department's library.

Maritime and Coastguard Agency

Dr. Whitehead: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what targets he has set for the Maritime and Coastguard Agency. [41925]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The following key targets have been set for the Maritime and Coastguard Agency (MCA). The targets are set out in MCA's Business Plan, copies of which will be placed in the Library.

- ensure that at least 60 per cent. of operators and crew of UK registered fishing vessels are aware of the safety standards promulgated by MCA.
- follow up at least 95 per cent. of significant breaches of safety and environmental aspects of Merchant Shipping legislation to determine whether prosecution is appropriate.
- decide on the search and rescue (SAR) response to accidents and life-threatening situations, and to initiate action, if necessary, within 5 minutes of being alerted in at least 95 per cent. of cases.
- complete at least 90 per cent. of key tasks and also complete at least 95 per cent. of the agreed planned programme of inspections and surveys.

Environmental Protection

Mr. Leslie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans his Department has to expand on previous guidance on the application of Articles 6(3) and (4) of the Habitats Directive to sites which have been submitted to the European Commission as candidate special areas of conservation under the Habitats Directive and classified as special protection areas under the Birds Directive. [42065]

Mr. Meacher: I have today restated our commitment to carrying out our legal obligations to implement the EU Habitats and Wild Birds Directives and, as part of that process, to contribute to the Natura 2000 network by designating Special Areas of Conservation (SACs) and Special Protection Areas (SPAs) and provides further guidance to competent authorities on the application of Articles 6(3) and 6(4). I have given a clearer policy lead to local planning authorities on how issues should be resolved where obligations to review extant planning permissions arise under the Conservation (Natural Habitats, &c.) Regulations 1994 and guiding principles for all competent authorities on what might constitute overriding public interest.

A paper setting out the Government's outline position has been placed in the Library.

Inclusive Regeneration Report

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the research report on Inclusive Regeneration: Local Authorities' Corporate Strategies for Tackling Disadvantage will be published. [41889]

Mr. Caborn: I am today placing in the Libraries of the House copies of the research report by Sheffield Hallam University and the University of Lincolnshire and Humberside.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Common Fisheries Policy

Mr. Shaw: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he plans to implement measures to ensure that an economic link exists between UK-flagged vessels and the fishing communities in the UK intending to benefit from quotas allocated to the UK under the Common Fisheries Policy; and if he will make a statement. [41893]

Mr. Morley: There has been extensive consultation with the various interests affected and we have also been having detailed discussions with the European Commission on the basis of the guidance contained in the exchange of letters between the Prime Minister and the President of the Commission which took place at the Amsterdam meeting of the European Council last year.

Specific proposal by the UK are currently under consideration by the Commission and we expect to receive their advice on them shortly so that we can make early progress with implementation.

A copy of the UK proposals under current consideration by the Commission has been placed in the Library of the House.

Pesticides

Mr. Peter Bradley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to review approvals of pesticides; and if he will make a statement. [41892]

Mr. Rooker: As part of the national arrangements for the running review of past approvals of pesticides, I have agreed with my colleagues in the other regulatory Departments that there should be a review of those organophosphate pesticides approved for agricultural use under the Control of Pesticides Regulations 1986. The review will not extend to sheep dips and other veterinary medicines which are authorised and subject to scrutiny under separate legislation. On the advice of the Advisory Committee on Pesticides (ACP) the review will also cover carbamate pesticides as these have similar modes of action.

I welcome the ACP's intention that the review should be informed by all relevant sources of information.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Children's Rights Convention

Mr. David Heath: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department for what reason the United Kingdom has not ratified the European Convention on the Exercise of Children's Rights. [40371]

Mr. Hoon: The European Convention on the Exercise of Children's Rights was opened for signature on 25 January 1996 and has not yet been ratified by sufficient states to bring it into force. The Government will give this matter careful consideration as soon as their programme of business permits.

Patents (Great Seals)

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement on the public holding arrangements for the Great Seals for the period 1617 and 1831 concerning patents granted. [40133]

Mr. Hoon: Copies of letters patent issued over the great seal between 1617 and 1831 could be enrolled in the Chancery patent rolls. Under the Public Records Act 1958, these patent rolls are open for consultation by the public in the Public Records Office.

Not all letters patent were thus enrolled and the system of enrolment broke down between 1648 and 1659, for which period few rolls survive. Original letters patent over the great seal were issued to the person to whom the grant was made. They thus passed into private hands, and were not subject to public holdings arrangements.

The matrix for a new seal is cast at the beginning of the reign of each Sovereign or when the Seal wears out. In the past, the old Seal was broken into several pieces but more recently, it has been the custom for the Sovereign to 'damask' (deface) the old Seal by means of a special hammer, to render it unfit for use. The old Seal is then presented to the Lord Chancellor as a personal gift of the Sovereign.

Prisoners (Civil Justice)

Mr. Luff: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make it his policy to deny prisoners serving custodial sentences access to civil justice in matters relating to the conduct of the Prison Service unless they have first exhausted all internal grievance procedures and taken their case to the Prisons Ombudsman; and if he will make a statement. [41022]

Mr. Hoon: It is not legally possible to interfere with a person's right of access to the civil courts solely because they are in custody. Where alternative procedures exist, however, it is in order for these to be brought to the attention of the individual.

Contingency Fee Payments

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many representations he has received from interested parties which were supportive of his proposals for contingency fee payments to lawyers; and if he will make a statement. [40933]

Mr. Hoon: The Government have not made any proposals for contingency payments to lawyers. We have received 233 responses to the Consultation Paper Access to Justice with Conditional Fees by the closing date of 30 April 1998. These are currently being analysed.

Justices of the Peace

Mr. Beith: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department to what extent his Department uses political affiliation as a criterion in the selection of justices of the peace for advisory committees; and if he will make a statement. [40863]

Mr. Hoon: The Lord Chancellor requires that the composition of Advisory Committees should broadly reflect the communities which they serve and should include at least one acknowledged supporter of each of the main political parties. Both magistrate and non-magistrate members of committees are asked to declare their political affiliation when applying for appointments and this, together with age, gender, ethnic origin, place of residence and occupation, is taken into account in the appointment of suitable candidates.

Deaf Jurors

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what guidelines his Department has published for judges in respect of deaf jury members receiving communication support in (a) open court and (b) the jury room. [40819]

Mr. Hoon: Judicial training is the responsibility of the Judicial Studies Board (JSB) which is a non-departmental government body. The JSB has an advisory committee whose remit has recently been extended to cover all aspects of equal treatment training, including training on increasing awareness of the needs of people with hearing difficulties, including jury members. The Committee will be considering guidance for members of the judiciary on handling those with hearing difficulties.

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department on how many occasions in the last year a judge has permitted a deaf person carrying out jury service to receive communication support from (i) a palantypist and (ii) a sign language interpreter. [40818]

Mr. Hoon: Palantypists are not available in the Crown Court. Details of those jurors using the support of a sign language interpreter are not held centrally and could be obtained only at a disproportionate cost.

Public Bodies

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many and what proportion of his Department's appointees to non-departmental public bodies are (i) aged under 25, (ii) aged 25 to 30 and (iii) aged 31 to 35 years. [40744]

Mr. Hoon: The information requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The Government are committed to encouraging a wide range of candidates to apply for positions on the boards of public bodies, reflecting the diverse society in which we live. This includes encouraging more young people to put themselves forward as potential candidates for public appointments. All appointments are made on merit, and candidates must demonstrate that they have the necessary skills and experience to match the needs of the public body on which they wish to serve.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prisoners

Mr. Cawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the guidance which will be given to governors concerning the assessment of the suitability of eligible prisoners for home detention curfew. [41865]

Ms Quin: We have today placed in the Library a draft version of the guidance to governors which would be used in assessing prisoners' suitability for Home Detention Curfew. A final version of the guidance will be included in a Prison Service Order which the Prison Service expects to issue to governors in October. Copies of that Order will be placed in the Library.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 5 May 1998, Official Report, columns 359–61, on prisoners, to what dates in 1998 the figures in Table A are provided. [41354]

Ms Quin: The 1998 figures in table A of my reply of 5 May 1998, Official Report, columns 359–61 refer to the period 1 January to 31 March.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his policy in respect of the disbursement of revenues from prison work. [40234]

Ms Quin [holding answer 30 April 1998]: Planned income generated by activities in prison industries and farms is included in the voted provision contained in the annual Supply Estimate for the Prison Service as part of the receipts appropriated in aid of the gross expenditure borne on the Estimate. The relevant level of appropriations in aid is included in the budget allocated to each prison. We are shortly to issue guidance on new arrangements which will give governors greater flexibility to take up commercial opportunities which develop during the year.

Firearms Compensation

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 26 November 1997, Official Report, column 542, on firearms compensation claims, when all compensation claims made under the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1997 under (a) options A and B and (b) option C, will be complete. [41225]

Mr. Michael: The estimated timetable for completion of compensation payments under the large calibre handgun compensation scheme remains as set out in the reply I gave to the hon. Member on 6 April 1998, Official Report, columns 19–20, that is to say, completion by around the end of May for payments under Options A and B and by the end of the year for most, if not all, payments under Option C.

Immigration

Ms Hewitt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many women who are British Overseas citizens have been admitted for settlement under the quota voucher system in each year since quota vouchers were introduced; [41148]

(2) how many women British Overseas citizens would qualify for admission to the United Kingdom for settlement, if women were treated in the same way as men under the quota voucher system; [41150]

(3) under what circumstances a woman who is a British Overseas citizen can be admitted for settlement under the quota voucher system; [41147]

(4) what assessment he has made of the advantages of treating women British Overseas citizens in the same way as men under the quota voucher system. [41149]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Immigration Rules, set out in House of Commons Paper 395, provide for a British Overseas citizen to be granted indefinite leave to enter the United Kingdom if he or she is in possession of a special voucher. This provision applies equally to both men and women.

A British Overseas citizen may be issued with a special voucher if he or she fulfils a number of requirements, one of which is that the person concerned is the head of their household. Women will be considered to be the head of their household if they are single, widowed, divorced or married to a man who is incapable of fulfilling the role of head of household for medical reasons, in accordance with a House of Lords ruling that this is not unlawful under the Sex Discrimination Act 1975.

The available data on the number of women who have been admitted for settlement as special voucher holders in each year are given in the table.

Human Rights

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to ratify Protocol 4 of the European Convention on Human Rights. [41754]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We have no plans to ratify Protocol 4 at present. Ratification will be possible only if potential conflicts with our domestic laws can be resolved. There is a particular concern in relation to Article 3(2) of the Protocol, which protects the right of nationals not to be excluded from their home state. This could be taken as conferring the right of abode in the United Kingdom on various categories of British nationals who do not have it.

Sir Alastair Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department to which optional provisions under UN and Council of Europe human rights agreements he is reviewing possible UK accession; which reservations to human rights treaties he is assessing the advantages of lifting; to which additional conventions he is assessing the advantages of acceding; and if he will make a statement. [41153]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Government announced on 3 July 1997, Official Report, column 221, that they intended to review the United Kingdom's position under various international human rights instruments. This includes the question of whether to accept the right of individuals to submit complaints under the Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, under Article 22 of the United Nations Convention against Torture and Other Forms of Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, and under Article 14 of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination. The review is in progress and the outcome will be announced when it has been concluded.

In preparing the Human Rights Bill, we also reviewed the United Kingdom's position on Protocols 4, 6 and 7 to the European Convention on Human Rights. Our conclusions were set out in the White paper "Rights Brought Home" (CM 3782).

In addition, the Government have a commitment to review unratified International Labour Organisation (ILO) Conventions. The Government fully support the principles embodied in the core ILO Conventions and are currently reviewing the United Kingdom's position with regard to ratification of the Conventions on minimum age and discrimination in employment.

Proxy Voting

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to eliminate fraud in respect of proxy voting. [41584]

Mr. George Howarth: The Working Party on Electoral Procedures, which I chair, will be examining both proxy and postal voting. We will pay particular attention to the need to achieve a balance between accessibility and the prevention of abuse.

Animal Procedures Committee

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the members of the Animal Procedures Committee, and their records of attendance for each of the meetings in (a) 1996, (b) 1997 and (c) 1998. [41343]

Mr. George Howarth: The membership of the Animal Procedures Committee and records of attendance have been as follows (attendance is signified by + and their absence by −):

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy to publish members' attendances at future meetings of the Animal Procedures Committee. [41342]

Mr. George Howarth: I will ask the Animal Procedures Committee to consider publishing this information in its annual report.

Incapacitants

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list the possible incapacitant agents which were assessed before the CS sprays were adopted for police use; [38609]

(2) how many published and internal papers have been written by his Department on the health effects of CR gas sprays since 1991; and what are the current security classifications of the internal reports. [38608]

Mr. Michael: CR (Dibenz (b.f)-1:4-oxazepine) was considered in a report by the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment, commissioned by the Home Office, which reviewed the toxicology of CS (Orthochlorobenzylidene Malonitrile). The report, which was produced in December 1994, is unclassified and copies have been placed in the Library. The Home Office has not produce any other published or internal reports on CR.

Incapacitants considered in the 1994 report apart from CS and CR were CN (chloroacetophenone, commonly known as Mace) and oleoresin capsicum (commonly known as pepper spray). None of the alternatives to CS is considered to be an appropriate incapacitant for use by police officers in this country.

DEFENCE

Officers

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the number of (a) 4 star, (b) 3 star, (c) 2 star and (d) 1 star officers in respect of the (i) Royal Navy, (ii) Army, (iii) Royal Marines and (iv) Royal Air Force and the total number of service personnel based in each of the Government's standard regions of England and in Scotland and in Wales at the latest date for which figures are available. [40997]

Dr. Reid: The number of 1 to 4 star officers, by Service, and the total number of Service personnel, based in each of the Government's standard regions of England, Scotland, and Wales, as at 1 July 1997 (the latest breakdown figures available) are set out in the tables.

Departmental Personnel

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many former Royal Marines personnel (a) above the rank of captain and (b) at or below the rank of captain are currently employed by his Department on a (i) full-time, (ii) part-time and (iii) consultant basis. [39936]

Dr. Reid: The number of former Royal Marines service personnel above the rank of captain employed by the Ministry of Defence on a full-time basis is 10; none is employed on a part-time basis. The number at or below the rank of captain employed on a full time basis is 174; none is employed on a part time basis.

The number of former Royal Marines service personnel employed by the Ministry of Defence on a consultant basis is not held centrally and could be made available only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many former Royal Navy service personnel (a) above the rank of lieutenant commander and (b) at or below the rank of lieutenant commander are currently employed by his Department on a (i) full-time, (ii) part-time and (iii) consultant basis. [39934]

Dr. Reid: The number of former Royal Navy service personnel above the rank of lieutenant commander employed by the Ministry of Defence on a full-time basis is 69; the number employed on a part-time basis is one. The number at or below the rank of lieutenant commander employed on a full-time basis is 953; the number employed on a part-time basis is seven.

The number of former Royal Navy service personnel employed by the Ministry of Defence on a consultant basis is not held centrally and could be made available only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many former RAF service personnel (a) above the rank of squadron leader and (b) at or below the rank of squadron are currently employed by his Department on a (i) full-time, (ii) part-time and (iii) consultant basis. [39933]

Dr. Reid: The number of former RAF service personnel above the rank of squadron leader employed by the Ministry of Defence on a full-time basis is 122; the number employed on a part-time basis is two. The number at or below the rank of squadron leader employed on a full-time basis is 1,598; the number employed on a part-time basis is 19.

The number of former RAF service personnel employed by the Ministry of Defence on a consultant basis is not held centrally and could be made available only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many former army personnel (a) above the rank of major and (b) at or below the rank of major are currently employed by his Department on a (i) full-time, (ii) part-time and (iii) consultant basis. [39935]

Dr. Reid: The number of former army service personnel above the rank of major employed by the Ministry of Defence on a full-time basis is 514; the number employed on a part-time basis is two. The number at or below the rank of major employed on a full-time basis is 2,404; the number employed on a part-time basis is 11.

The number of former army service personnel employed by the Ministry of Defence on a consultant basis is not held centrally and could be made available only at disproportionate cost.

Field Marshals

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) serving and (b) retired field marshals there are; and, in respect of the latter, what continuing duties or obligations they have. [41223]

Dr. Reid: One of the recommendations made in the Independent Review of the Armed Forces' Manpower, Career and Remuneration Structures by Sir Michael Bett was that promotion to 5-star rank should cease in peacetime. There is now no serving officer at Field Marshal rank. There are, however, eight retired Field Marshals retained on the active list. In terms of continuing duties and obligations some have retained honorary appointments connected with the Army which tend to be ceremonial and do not involve official commitment. These are: Constable Tower of London, Master Gunner St. James's Park, Vice Lord Lieutenant Wiltshire and Lord Lieutenant Greater London. In addition, two members of The Royal Family hold the honorary rank of Field Marshal, as does HM The King of Nepal.

Indonesia

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer on 16 February 1998, Official Report, column 483, what was the nature of the exercises conducted by the Royal Navy with Indonesian forces in the South China Sea in 1997; and what was the cost of those exercises. [41551]

Dr. Reid: HMS Richmond visited Jakarta from 9 to 12 April 1997 as part of the Royal Navy's Ocean Wave 97 deployment to the Asia-Pacific region. She participated in a low-key, passing exercise (PASSEX) with a ship from the Indonesian Navy as she left Jakarta following the visit. The PASSEX comprised a communications exercise and practice approaches for replenishment at sea. HMS Richmond also gave a demonstration of her Lynx helicopter as she left port. Exercises of this type are routinely undertaken with host navies by Royal Navy ships either at the beginning or upon completion of a visit to an overseas port. No separate costings of this activity were made.

TREASURY

Economic and Monetary Union

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 4 March 1998, Official Report, column 664, if he will place in the Library his Department's latest assessment of the effect of the sale of excess reserves of (a) gold and (b) foreign currency by central banks participating in EMU on (i) world gold prices and (ii) international exchanges; and what assessment his Department has made of the need to modify Bank of England holdings of such prior to the settling of the Frankfurt reserves of the Central Bank. [41509]

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: No.

Economic Growth

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the quarterly growth rate of the combined industrial, construction and agricultural sector of the United Kingdom economy in (a) the fourth quarter of 1997 and (b) the first quarter of 1998; and if he will make a statement. [41162]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 11 May 1998]: Output in the combined industrial, construction and agricultural sector fell by 0.5 per cent. in the fourth quarter of 1997. Estimates for the first quarter of 1998 will be published by the Office for National Statistics on 22 May.

Comprehensive Spending Review

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the progress of the Comprehensive Spending Review. [41163]

Mr. Darling [holding answer 11 May 1998]: The CSR is proceeding to timetable. It is on schedule for completion this Summer.

NVQ Training Providers

Mr. Chope: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if flying instructors registered with the Inland Revenue as training providers under the NVQ scheme will be able to continue to provide to existing clients training at a cost reduced by the standard rate of income tax beyond 30 June; and if he will make a statement. [41351]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 11 May 1998]: Vocational training relief, the tax relief for certain training expenses, is available on payments for training which can count towards a National Vocational Qualification (NVQ) or a Scottish Vocational Qualification (SVQ). Notice has been given by the Qualifications Authorities that the Piloting Transport Aircraft and Piloting Rotary Wing Transport Aircraft qualifications will cease to be accredited as NVQs or SVQs from 30 June 1998. Trainees who have registered with an Awarding Body for these qualifications before 30 June 1998 will be able to complete their training towards the NVQ or SVQ during the three years after 30 June (four years in Scotland). These trainees will be able to continue to obtain vocational training relief on the cost of training which takes place after 30 June 1998. The Inland Revenue is writing to all training providers who operate vocational training relief to explain the arrangements for giving tax relief on flight training after 30 June 1998.

North Sea Fiscal Regime

Sir Robert Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he will publish his consultation paper on the North Sea fiscal regime; and if he will make a statement. [41575]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 12 April 1998]: The consultative document on the North Sea fiscal regime is expected to be issued shortly.

Mozambique (Debt Repayments)

Mr. Timms: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much in debt service is expected to be paid by Mozambique, in US dollars, in each year from 1998 to 2002, following the recent agreement under the HIPC initiative, according to (a) the HIPC final document, and (b) the latest estimates. [41207]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 8 May 1998]: The HIPC Final document produced by the IMF does not give figures of debt service after full debt relief under the HIPC initiative.

The latest estimates of the debt service that Mozambique will have to pay after receiving debt relief under the HIPC initiative are:

Year	Debt service $ million
1998	124
1999	147
2000	97
2001	101
2002	97

Debt relief under the HIPC initiative will reduce Mozambique's stock of debt by $1,487 million in Net Present Value terms. Without this debt relief, Mozambique would have been due to pay an average of over $450 million a year in debt service over this period.

Mr. Timms: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much was paid in debt service by Mozambique, in US dollars, in each year from 1995 to 1997. [41206]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 8 May 1998]: The debt service paid by Mozambique between 1995 and 1997 was:

Year	Debt service paid $ million
1995	112
1996	131
1997	97

The debt service paid in these years was, however, only a fraction of the total debt service due, which was some $375 million a year.

Tax-free Sales

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the effect on (a) income and (b) employment, in manufacturing industry in the United Kingdom of the abolition of internal European Union tax-free sales in 1999, with particular reference to the Scotch whisky sector; and if he will make a statement. [41171]

Dawn Primarolo: No assessment has been made of the effect on income or employment in the Scotch Whisky sector in the United Kingdom of the abolition of intra-EU duty and tax-free sales in 1999.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the advantages to the United Kingdom of the abolition of internal European Union tax-free sales in 1999. [41174]

Dawn Primarolo: Customs and Excise have advised me that the abolition of intra-EU and duty-free sales in 1999 may result in an increase in Customs' receipts of about £100 million in a full year. This is very much a provisional estimate.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will ensure that the abolition of internal European Union tax-free sales will be on the agenda of the next ECOFIN meeting. [41172]

Dawn Primarolo: This issue is on the agenda for the next ECOFIN Council meeting to be held on 19 May 1998.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions he has had with European finance ministers regarding possible structural assistance to industries and areas which face a loss of business as a result of the abolition of internal European Union tax-free sales; and if he will press for such financial assistance to be given. [41173]

Dawn Primarolo: I have had no such discussions with European finance ministers regarding possible structural assistance to be given to industries or areas which face a loss of business as a result of the abolition of intra-EU duty and tax-free sales in 1999.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the impact on patterns of tourism to and from the United Kingdom of the abolition of internal European Union tax-free sales in 1999; and if he will make a statement. [41170]

Dawn Primarolo: No assessment has been made of the impact on patterns of tourism to and from the United Kingdom of the abolition of intra-EU duty and tax-free sales in 1999.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he is taking to respond to the resolution of the Transport Ministers Council on 17 March calling on ECOFIN to ensure that a study is undertaken of the impact of abolition of duty free within the European Union. [41222]

Dawn Primarolo: This matter is on the agenda for the next ECOFIN Council meeting to be held on 19 May 1998.

Government Information (Access)

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make it his policy to state which exemption of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information is being invoked to prevent the release of information in answer to parliamentary questions. [40873]

Dawn Primarolo: Treasury Ministers would expect to explain the reasons why information could not be provided in answer to parliamentary questions.

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) pursuant to his answer of 6 March 1998, Official Report, column 817, which exemption in the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information makes publication of the correspondence inappropriate; [40870]

(2) pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) of 12 March 1998, Official Report, column 313, on VAT rates on housing works, which exemption in the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information makes publication of the correspondence inappropriate. [40874]

Dawn Primarolo: Exemptions 1 and 2 apply.

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer in how many answers to parliamentary questions his Department has declined to provide information because it was inappropriate under the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information since 1 May 1997; and what subjects those questions concerned. [40867]

Dawn Primarolo: Treasury records show that in the case of some 19 of the 3,500 or so parliamentary answers given by Ministers in the present Parliament the information sought was not made available as is permitted under the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. These questions concerned such matters as individuals' tax affairs, personal information relating to officials, representations made to Ministers in confidence on commercial and other matters and internal discussions and advice on various policy issues.

Additionally, Treasury Ministers have traditionally declined to disclose in advance information relating to the Chancellor's Budget statement. In innumerable other instances, statistical and other information either is not available or cannot be presented in the form requested.

Civil Registration Records

Mr. Todd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he will take to improve access to historic registration records. [41349]

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proposals he has for allowing free public access to the records of civil registration of births, marriages and deaths. [41341]

Mrs. Liddell: I refer to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) on 7 May 1998, Official Report, column 455.

Cornwall

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer on what date the Office for National Statistics first proposed that Cornwall should be considered as a NUTS 2 area in its own right for Eurostat purposes; and on what date his Department notified Eurostat that such a unit should be considered for structural fund purposes. [41106]

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Chief Executive of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Dafydd Wigley, dated 12 May 1998:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your parliamentary question on the proposal to consider Cornwall as a separate NUTS-2 area for European purposes.

I wrote to Eurostat on 30 June 1997 with proposals for a new NUTS structure for the UK, which included the designation of Cornwall as a separate NUTS-2 area. Those proposals are still being discussed between Eurostat and the Government Statistical Service.

The consideration of any areas for Structural Funds purposes is not a matter for the ONS or for Eurostat.

Correspondence

Mr. Townend: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to the answer of 26 March 1998, Official Report, column 278, if the Financial Secretary will in future keep a record of the number of letters sent to hon. Members which are not personally signed. [38186]

Dawn Primarolo: Treasury Ministers see no need to maintain such a record.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Staff Car Mileage Allowance

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what percentage of the staff of all grades employed by his Department were eligible to claim a car mileage allowance on 31 March in each year since 1990; [40435]

(2) what were (a) the total value in real terms of staff car mileage claims paid, (b) the total value in real terms of staff rail fares paid, (c) the total amount of staff car mileage for which reimbursement was made and (d) the percentage change from the previous year in each case, for his Department in each year since 1989–90. [40440]

Dr. Howells: The information requested is available only at disproportionate cost.

Further and Higher Education

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the average number of years of full-time equivalent post-school specialist learning provided per head of population for the age group 16 to 25 years in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) other EU countries. [41105]

Dr. Howells: An average[1] of 2.7 full-time equivalent years are spent studying in UK further and higher education institutions, between the ages of 16 and 25. If post-compulsory school-age studies in a school setting are included, this increases to 3.4 full-time equivalent years. Comparable information is unavailable for other EU countries.

[1] Enrolment and population data for 1996–97 are used to calculate an "expected" number of years in education

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the average cost per head per year of full-time education in (a) the higher education sector and (b) the further education sector. [41099]

Dr. Howells: In 1996–97, the average funding for teaching and research per full-time equivalent per year was £4,700 in the higher education sector. In the further education sector the unit funding, for teaching only, was £2,920. Figures are presented at 1996–97 prices.

Standard Assessment Tests

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what percentage, to three decimal places, of all year 2 (a) pupils, (b) boys and (c) girls, attained (i) Level 2 or better, (ii) Level 3 or better, (iii) Level 4 or better and (iv) Level 5 or better in the Key Stage 1 English SAT tests for (1) reading, (2) writing and (3) English, in each local education authority area; and what was the national average level attained per pupil and by each gender in (A) 1996 and (B) 1997. [38160]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 7 April 1998]: The full information is not available in the form requested.

Child Care

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what assessment his Department has made of the likelihood of individuals offered training in childcare, as part of the New Deal, achieving sufficient qualifications to work in that intended capacity for local authority social services or education departments; [41528]

(2) what assessment his Department has made of the likelihood of individuals offered training in childcare, as part of the New Deal, subsequently achieving NVQ level 3 as a result of continued employer support after the initial six months of New Deal funding. [41529]

(3) if he will extend the New Deal arrangements for training to ensure that participants seeking qualifications for employment in childcare can continue beyond NVQ level 2. [41530]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Young people on the New Deal for 18–24 year olds, who wish to train to work with children, can work towards an NVQ level 3 childcare qualification during their New Deal placement, if their previous experience and qualifications are appropriate. If they gain an NVQ level 2 or 3 qualification, this will help them find employment whether in the voluntary sector, private sector or with a local authority. There is currently no formal requirement within the Children Act 1989 that childcare workers should have qualifications, but, in registering a provider, the authority will look at the range of experience, qualifications and maturity of the person concerned and any other staff.

In some areas, individual local authorities have introduced, through their discretionary powers, requirements of registration to the effect that providers must either have, or be working towards, certain qualification levels. This should not, however, prevent childcare providers, including local authorities, from employing these young people under supervision, after their New Deal placement ends. Moreover, the local New Deal partnership may be able to arrange for the young person to work towards an NVQ level 3 qualification, after their New Deal placement ends, as part of the New Deal 'follow through' strategy. This could be arranged through the Training and Enterprise Council, using funding from the employer, or other sources—for example, the Single Regeneration Budget and the European Social Fund.

We are not in a position to predict the proportion of young people on New Deal who train to work with children who will thereafter work for local authorities, nor the number who will gain NVQ level 3 qualifications with employer support after their New Deal placement ends, as this will vary according to individual and local circumstances.

The Department and the Department of Health recently issued a consultation paper on the regulation of early education and daycare. The consultation paper outlines the Government's intention to introduce more consistent regulatory standards across different sectors and localities. We have also asked the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority and the relevant National Training Organisations to look at qualifications for childcare and early years workers.

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he will publish the Green Paper on Child Care Strategies. [41654]

Mr. Alan Howarth: Our Green Paper on the national child care strategy will be published shortly. This will set out the broad principles of the strategy covering the whole of the United Kingdom and detailed proposals for England. My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland, for Wales and for Northern Ireland will be publishing in due course their own documents on implementation of the strategy in those countries.

National Grid for Learning

Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what technological barriers have been developed by his Department in the introduction of the National Grid for Learning, to secure children from access and exposure to unsuitable and damaging Internet material. [41345]

Dr. Howells: The Department has commissioned the British Educational Communications and Technology Agency to publish good practice guidance on the use of information and communications technologies in schools. This includes up to date advice on installing controlling software on classroom computers as well as more general advice on access by pupils to the Internet. LEAs and schools are required as a condition of the Standards Fund grant for the National Grid for Learning to have in place policies on protecting pupils from on-line access to undesirable materials. Industry is of course sensitive to the need to develop improved mechanisms to screen out such material.

Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what provisions have been made to monitor children's use of classroom computers when searching the Internet. [41347]

Dr. Howells: The Department has commissioned the British Educational Communications and Technology Agency to publish good practice guidance on the use of information and communications technologies in schools. This includes advice on proper monitoring of pupil's use of the Internet in the classroom. LEAs and schools are required as a condition of the Standards Fund grant for the National Grid for Learning to have in place policies on protecting pupils from on-line access to undesirable materials.

Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what financial provision he will make available to local education authorities to meet the costs of (a) installing and (b) maintaining the National Grid for Learning in their area. [41346]

Dr. Howells: The Government are supporting £100 million of ICT-related expenditure by LEA-maintained schools in 1998–99 through the Standards Fund. By building on LEAs' own development plans for information and communications technology (ICT) and those of their schools these grants will help schools to gain access to the National Grid for Learning by enabling them progressively to improve their provision. Support for future years will be determined in the light of the outcomes of consultation on the NGfL and the progress of overall strategy.

Pre-school Learning

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what estimate he has made of the average hourly rates of pay of employees of pre-school learning groups. [41655]

Ms Estelle Morris: Rates of pay will vary with the type of group. Most pre-schools are sessional: I understand that average hourly rates of pay for staff in such pre-schools in membership of the Pre-school Learning Alliance are £4.40 for pre-school leaders.

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how he intends to allocate the £500,000 announced on 6 April for the purposes of stopping further closures of pre-schools; and how he will ensure that the money achieves his stated objective. [41656]

Ms Estelle Morris: With the help of the Pre-school Learning Alliance and other playgroup organisations, Early Years Development Partnerships will be asked to identify good pre-schools where some short-term funding may avert the threat of closure. Criteria for the distribution of funds will be discussed with the Local Government Association and the pre-school organisations.

Disabled People

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the future financial support from his Department for disabled persons and disability groups through the Access Committee for England. [40559]

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Department of Education and Employment has only once provided financial support for ACE. That was in respect of a research project into the settlement of disputes between disabled people and service providers. There is a small balance to pay—£2,501—on successful completion of the project.

ACE are free to bid for funding for future project work. All such applications are considered on their merits.

SCOTLAND

Local Authority Elections

Mr. Charles Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the progress of the Boundary Commission in respect of the 1999 local authorities elections. [41200]

Mr. Macdonald: To date, the Local Government Boundary Commission for Scotland have submitted reports on five council areas, namely Angus, East Lothian, Perth and Kinross, East Dunbartonshire and Moray, and we are expecting them to send in reports for all other authorities within the next few months.

Further Education Funding

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what criteria are being used to determine the distribution of the strategic fund element of the recurrent grant-in-aid funding for Scottish colleges in 1998–99. [40895]

Mr. Wilson [holding answer 7 May 1998]: Of the £6.76 million Strategic Fund for 1998–99, £4.21 million has already been allocated to 13 colleges to limit their grant losses this year under the funding formula to no more than 6 per cent. The criteria which will be used to determine the allocation of the balance, which will largely be used to support strategic initiatives within the further education sector, are still under consideration.

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the level of the fixed element cost of the grant-in-aid funding for Scottish colleges in 1998–99; and what was the level in financial years (a) 1993–94, (b) 1994–95, (c) 1995–96, (d) 1996–97 and (e) 1997–98. [40893]

Mr. Wilson [holding answer 7 May 1998]: The annual fixed element of recurrent grant-in-aid for Scotland further education colleges is shown in the table, on a 'per college' basis.

Years	£
1993–94	Nil

Scottish Parliament

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what estimate he has made of the total cost of the building to house the Scottish Parliament, broken down into the costs of (a) securing the land, (b) construction of the debating chamber and associated administrative offices, (c) construction of offices for members and (d) equipping and furnishing it. [41110]

Mr. Dewar: The estimated construction cost of the Scottish Parliament building at Holyrood is around £55 million, including site acquisition costs and demolition costs but excluding fees and VAT. The estimated total cost of acquiring and preparing the Holyrood site is approximately £4 million. A detailed breakdown between the cost elements for the debating chamber, the administrative offices, Members' offices, equipment and furniture is not yet available. These costs cannot be estimated until the design team is appointed in the summer of 1998 and has undertaken further detailed work.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what estimate he has made of the length of time during which the Scottish Parliament will have to meet in temporary premises; and what is the (a) cost of renting this facility and (b) capital cost of adapting, furnishing and equipping this facility. [41101]

Mr. Dewar: The Scottish Parliament is expected to meet in temporary accommodation from May 1999 until the new building at Holyrood, Edinburgh, is ready for occupation in the second half of 2001. The estimated cost of preparing the temporary accommodation for use by the Parliament and for rent and rates over a 2-year period is estimated at £6 million. This does not include heating, lighting, security or other building-related costs, or the provision of IT and broadcasting equipment, furniture and services. These costs are still being assessed.

Student Awards Agency

Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recommendations he has received following the review he established into the operations of the Students Awards Agency for Scotland; and if he will make a statement. [41894]

Mr. Wilson: In view of the unacceptable situation experienced last year, in which students experienced very considerable delays in the processing of their applications for awards, I requested a Review of the Agency's operation arrangements; and established an independent Steering Committee, under the Chairmanship of Mr. G. Wilson CB, Head of The Scottish Office Education and Industry Department, to oversee the review. I asked for a report by April.

The Steering Committee reported to me on schedule, with a statement covering the Review report. The problems identified in relation to last year were difficulties with the new computer system and inadequate staff resources (as a result of staff reductions which took place during the period for the previous Government) to deal with the consequences of these difficulties. I am arranging for copies of the report and statement to be placed in the Libraries of both Houses; and to be made publicly available.

The Review has produced a number of recommendations relating both to the staffing resources and processing arrangements of the Agency. I accept these recommendations, and am arranging for additional resources, of up to £380,000 to be available to the Agency. I am also strengthening the senior management of the Agency to ensure that the recommended improvements to the processing arrangements are taken forward quickly.

I am grateful to the Steering Committee for their advice. They will continue in existence to monitor implementation of these arrangements, and to be available to offer further advice as required.

I am confident that the steps I have taken will ensure that the Agency provides a good service, especially to the students.

Tweed and Eye Protection Order

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list those persons and organisations recently consulted about the Tweed/Eye River protection order prior to his decision to revoke the order other than for those with angling interests in the Whiteadder area. [41469]

Mr. Macdonald: The difficulties with access in the area covered by the Tweed and Eye Protection Order came to light during a wider consultation exercise on the effectiveness of Protection Orders. A list of respondees has been placed in the Library of the House. Fifty-four responses were received, of which seven were from angling interests outwith the Whiteadder area.

A further two representations were received by angling interests outwith the area after the consultation exercise closed.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what factors led him to conclude that it was necessary to revoke the protection order covering the Tweed/Eye River system; and what account he took of recent discussions between interested parties in the Whiteadder area. [41471]

Mr. Macdonald: Protection Orders are first and foremost intended to provide greater public access to angling. This has not been the case for some time with the Tweed and Eye Protection Order, despite attempts by the River Tweed Commissioners, Tweed Liaison Committee and the Scottish Anglers' National Association to resolve access problems. I am aware that discussions concerning the Whiteadder are continuing.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many responses to the consultation process on the operation of protection orders commenced in 1997 he has received; and how many of those responses referred to difficulties in the operation of the Tweed/Eye order. [41473]

Mr. Macdonald: A total of 54 responses were received. Of these, 11 referred to difficulties in the operation of the Tweed and Eye Protection Order.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from angling interests, other than those in the Whiteadder area, about riparian owners denying access to anglers in the Tweed/Eye River catchment area covered by the current protection order. [41470]

Mr. Macdonald: Six representations from angling interests outwith the Whiteadder area have been received about reductions in angling access in the area covered by the Tweed and Eye Protection Order. Those responses draw attention to areas where previously available access to freshwater fishing has been withdrawn.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will delay the publication of the formal notice of his intention to revoke the River Tweed/Eye protection order until he is able to consider further representations on the implications of the revocation. [41472]

Mr. Macdonald: No. It is the Government's intention to give formal notice of proposed revocation action in the Edinburgh Gazette shortly.

River Protection Orders

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will assess the advantages of introducing protection orders which allow him to deal separately with sections of rivers within the protection order area without disturbing the protection in other parts of the river system. [41474]

Mr. Macdonald: Protection Orders are made in response to applications. When such an application is made, consideration is given as to whether it meets the terms of the Freshwater and Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act 1976. Before an Order is granted, the Secretary of State must be satisfied that the required standards will be met and maintained throughout the prescribed area.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Age Discrimination

Ms Perham: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, pursuant to his answer of 2 March 1998, Official Report, columns 420–22, when he expects to issue guidance to departments and agencies to help them avoid unfair discrimination on the basis of age. [41363]

Dr. David Clark: My Department will be issuing the guidance referred to in my answer of 2 March 1998, Official Report, columns 420–21 in the summer.

WALES

NHS Survey

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he proposes to initiate a national survey of patients' and users' experience of the NHS; and if he will make a statement. [40648]

Mr. Win Griffiths: A new national survey of patient and user experience is intended in Wales. Consultation on the conduct, content and use of the survey, including its timing, will be undertaken with the NHS and interested organisations.

New Deal (NHS)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he proposes to extend the New Deal into the NHS; and if he will make a statement. [40649]

Mr. Hain: The New Deal will provide employment opportunities in both the private and public sectors. The NHS is a major employer in Wales and can offer good quality jobs with training to young people.

The Employment Service has actively marketed the health sector and several Health Trusts have already indicated their commitment to the New Deal.

Teaching Hospitals

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what are the teaching hospitals in Wales; and if he will make a statement. [40650]

Mr. Win Griffiths: The University Hospital of Wales, Cardiff is the main teaching centre but teaching also takes place at most District General Hospitals in Wales—most notably at Morriston, Wrexham and the Royal Gwent Hospitals.

Spinal Injury Units

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many spinal injury units there are in Wales. [40914]

Mr. Win Griffiths: The designated regional service for spinal injuries is based in the University Hospital of Wales Healthcare NHS Trust and comprises acute spinal trauma surgery at Cardiff Royal Infirmary with rehabilitation at the Spinal Injuries Unit, Rookwood Hospital. Some acute spinal surgery for trauma is carried out at other acute hospitals.

Further Education

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what new moneys he has released to colleges of further education in Wales; and if he will make a statement. [41495]

Mr. Hain: In recognition of the pressures on the further education sector in Wales, we increased the Further Education Funding Council for Wales's 1998–99 grant by £5.4 million in November 1997. In March this year, we made £1 million capital available to the sector in 1997–98 and £360,000 for FE developments associated with the New Deal. Furthermore, arising from the Budget on 17 March, we have made an additional £3.5 million available to the FEFCW to set up an 'Education for Industry Challenge Fund' to meet local adult skills needs and develop outreach provision. This amounts to a total of over £10 million of new money to the further education sector.

Rural Job Creation

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how he proposes to create more jobs in rural Wales. [41491]

Mr. Hain: The Government aim to create job opportunities in rural Wales by attracting new investors and ensuring that indigenous businesses have access to comprehensive and effective support services so that they can develop and prosper in a vibrant and healthy rural economy.

Many small rural businesses looking to expand, but unable to take the initial risk of recruiting additional employees, will benefit from the employer subsidy available under the New Deal for 18–24 year olds. This, working in tandem with the Sole Traders Initiative, will encourage the self-employed to create new jobs. Others will be created under the self-employment route of the New Deal for 18–24 year-olds where young people can receive the support and guidance needed to set up their own businesses. A revamped Business Connect also means that new and small businesses now have access to the one-stop assistance they need.

The Welsh Development Agency (WDA) has consistently met its targets for job creation beyond the eastern M4 and A55 corridors and will continue—wherever possible—to encourage and steer industry to the more rural parts of Wales. The rural unit of the new enlarged WDA being established later this year will also provide the interface for a wide range of rural interests helping to stimulate the introduction of new and innovative approaches to economic development and job creation.

School Sixth Forms

Mr. Touhig: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the current teacher to student ratio in school sixth forms in Gwent; and what were the figures in (a) 1995, (b) 1996 and (c) 1997. [41484]

Mr. Hain: The information requested is not available centrally. Teacher to student ratios are not available for year groups and can be calculated only for entire schools.

Autistic Children

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what provision is made for the educational needs of autistic children in each local authority area in Wales. [40631]

Mr. Hain: Responsibility for identifying and making appropriate provision for children with special educational needs, including learning difficulties associated with autism, rests with LEAs and schools. Such children are educated in a variety of settings depending on each child's particular needs. These include mainstream schools, special schools and independent schools. Information on how individual LEAs organise provision for autistic children is not held centrally.

Public Appointments

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many of his public appointments since 1 May 1997 have been in full accordance with the guidance from the Commissioner for Public Appointments; and if he will make a statement. [41761]

Mr. Ron Davies: I have sought to make all appointments since 1 May 1997 for which I have sole responsibility in full accordance with the guidance of the Commissioner for Public Appointments.

I am keen to ensure that all appointments to public bodies in Wales, whether made by me alone or made jointly with other Government Departments, obey the principles of fair and open competition and appointment on merit. Where appropriate, I have extended the application of those principles to those bodies currently outside the Commissioner's remit.

Welsh Assembly

Mr. Rhodri Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with CADW in relation to the maintenance cost of the Pierhead building; what conclusions he has drawn as to the amount of useable office and meeting space in the Pierhead building; and what use he proposes to make of that space for Welsh Assembly purposes. [41764]

Mr. Ron Davies: None. A condition survey of the Pierhead building has been completed. Having considered the layout of the building, I propose, subject to further consideration, to use it for offices for the more senior members of the Assembly, the Leaders of each Party, and a number of support staff.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what costings he has obtained in relation to the deterioration of the foundations of the Pierhead building and the stability of the superstructure at the front end of the building; if the costs of shoring up the foundations are to be carried out by Grosvenor Waterside as a condition of the lease; and over what period of time the work will be carried out. [41768]

Mr. Ron Davies: A condition survey has been completed, and I am considering what essential work needs to be undertaken to Pierhead building. The terms of the lease will require that the building, on termination of the lease, will be in no worse a condition that upon commencement.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) of 5 May 1998, Official Report, column 299, what is the estimated cost of adapting the computer mainframe room to become the temporary debating chamber of the National Assembly. [41772]

Mr. Ron Davies: I have not yet decided which part of Crickhowell House should be used for the temporary debating chamber.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the legal obstacles to a system of twinning of constituencies for election to the Welsh Assembly; and what discussions he has had on this matter with the Lord Chancellor. [41755]

Mr. Ron Davies: The Government's view is that the procedure a party adopts for selecting candidates for the National Assembly for Wales is a matter for the party itself. The parties will have to have regard to the framework provided by domestic and European employment law in respect of equality of opportunity for all. The Government's view on this issue was set out by my hon. Friend the Minister for Home Affairs and Devolution in the House on 31 March 1998, Official Report, columns 1144–46.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what estimates he has made of the costs of providing temporary accommodation for the Welsh Assembly at (a) City Hall and (b) Crickhowell House. [41891]

Mr. Ron Davies: The estimated cost of capital works to bring City Hall into suitable condition for use as the temporary home for the National Assembly for Wales is at least £3 million.

None of this expenditure would benefit the National Assembly once it moved to its permanent home. There would in addition be removal costs of an estimated £100,000.

The cost of fitting out Crickhowell House as a temporary home is expected to be between £750,000 and £1 million. Members will be in their permanent offices from day one, so there will be no nugatory expenditure on their accommodation. Much of the equipment and furnishings of the temporary chamber will be re-used as part of the permanent arrangements, and the chamber itself will be available for other uses the Assembly decides.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he will announce the members of the assessment panel for the design competition for the new National Assembly for Wales building. [41890]

Mr. Ron Davies: Lord Callaghan will chair the Assessment Panel which will have as lay members Elinor Bennet, Angela Gidden, Mike Reilly and Professor Robin Williams together with two eminent architects nominated by RIBA.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals he has to permit the successful architect in the RIBA competition for the design of the Welsh Assembly debating chamber to co-ordinate the design with that of the office building on the adjoining part of the Pierhead site. [41766]

Mr. Ron Davies: It is not for me to decide who will design the office building for Grosvenor Waterside but they have indicated a willingness to consider using the same architect as the one who designs the Assembly building, should that be appropriate.

Crickhowell House

Mr. Rhodri Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what is the total area of Crickhowell House occupied by (a) the Prescription Pricing Unit, (b) Information Technology and Health Solutions Wales Group and (c) Contracts and Supplies; and what is the rent paid per square foot where it differs from the rent level for Crickhowell House as a whole; [41769]

(2) pursuant to his answer of 6 May 1998, Official Report, column 416, what rent he has agreed for Crickhowell House for the next five years as a percentage of the rent currently paid by the market-tested sections of WHCSA occupying areas of Crickhowell House; and what are the two levels of rent expressed in pounds per square foot per annum. [41770]

Mr. Ron Davies: The rent for Crickhowell House for the next 5 years shows no increase on the current level, ie £16 per square feet (£172.22 per sq.m). The other matters raised are the responsibility of the Welsh Health Common Services Authority and I have asked the Chief Executive to write to my Friend.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 6 May 1998, Official Report, column 416, what flexibility is built into the leases he is proposing to take on Crickhowell House on behalf of the National Assembly as regards (a) break clauses, (b) privity of contract, (c) repairs and insurance and (d) permission to sub-let or assign. [41771]

Mr. Ron Davies: There are no break clauses in the leases on Crickhowell House. In common with Government office accommodation, it is intended that leases will be held in the name of the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, with all ownership responsibilities vested in me. The leases contain full repairing obligations and I have dispensation to self insure. The existing provisions to sub-let or assign the lease remain constant.

Welsh Health Common Services Authority

Mr. Rhodri Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals he has for relocating the Legal Services Unit of Welsh Health Common Services Authority; and what amendments he proposes for its chain of command. [41763]

Mr. Ron Davies: Discussions are under way between the Authority and Glan Clwyd NHS Trust about the transfer of Welsh Health Legal Services to the Trust. The management structure is a matter for the Authority and the Trust to consider as part of the transfer arrangements.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with the office staff of the Welsh Health Common Services Authority concerning (a) transfer arrangements to (i) the National Assembly and (ii) trusts and health authorities, and (b) where those staff currently working at Crickhowell House will work in future. [41765]

Mr. Ron Davies: None. My Department involved staff representatives when options for the location of business units were being considered but consultations with staff about transfer arrangements are a matter for the Authority as employer. No decision has been taken about accommodation for staff currently working in Crickhowell House.

Museums

Mr. Rhodri Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with the President of the National Museums and Galleries of Wales in relation to the closure of the Welsh Industrial and Maritime Museum. [41767]

Mr. Ron Davies: My officials have held frequent discussions with the Museum's Director and his senior staff and I have been kept fully informed of the circumstances surrounding the closure of the Welsh Industrial and Maritime Museum.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with the President of the National Museums and Galleries of Wales concerning the provision of a suitable place for exhibiting the mediaeval ship recovered from Magor Pill. [41762]

Mr. Ron Davies: Decisions regarding the display of the remains of the Magor Pill boat are a matter for the professional staff of the National Museums and Galleries of Wales.

Incomes

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the income per capita for each of the unitary authorities in Wales (a) in cash terms, (b) as a percentage of the United Kingdom average and (c) as a percentage of the European Community average in the last year for which figures are available. [40089]

Mr. Hain: The available information, provided by the Office for National Statistics, is given in the following table, in respect of the former counties of Wales. A single figure is given for the counties of Dyfed and Powys, because separate estimates cannot reliably be made.

Unitary Authority estimates and European Community comparisons are not currently available.

Household income, 1994

	£ per head	Percentage of UK
Clwyd	8,751	90.2
Dyfed & Powys	8,391	86.5
Gwent	8,414	86.7
Gwynedd	8,983	92.6
Mid Glamorgan	7,781	80.2
South Glamorgan	9,509	98.0
West Glamorgan	8,460	7.2
Wales	8,549	88.1

HEALTH

Commission for Health Improvement

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement regarding the powers of the proposed Commission for Health Improvement to intervene in the running of NHS trusts and the proposed primary care groups. [29049]

Mr. Milburn: We will consult on the role and responsibilities of the Commission for Health Improvement before bringing forward legislation.

Haemophiliacs (Hepatitis C)

Mr. Nicholls: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people with haemophilia in the United Kingdom are currently infected with hepatitis C as a result of their treatment in the NHS with contaminated blood products. [33612]

Mr. Boateng: The Department estimates that around 4,000 people with haemophilia were infected with hepatitis C through blood products prior to the introduction of viral inactivation processes in 1985.

The latest figure quoted by the Haemophilia Society shows that they now assess the total number of haemophiliacs infected with hepatitis C at 4,800.

NHS Trusts (Mergers)

Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his policy with regard to merging the functions of NHS trusts; how many trusts will be involved; and if he will make a statement. [39286]

Mr. Milburn: Any proposal to merge National Health Service trusts will be considered on its own merits. Most importantly, mergers must lead to benefits for patients in improved health care and lead to savings in management costs.

Proposals for merging NHS trusts are initiated locally. There is no central programme of NHS trust mergers.

Devonshire Royal Hospital

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Secretary of State for Health who will have the responsibility for the upkeep of the Devonshire Royal Hospital building in Buxton when it is no longer required as a hospital by Stockport Health Authority. [38971]

Mr. Milburn: Responsibility will remain with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health until such time as the building is disposed of to a third party. Every effort will be made to find a new owner before health services are withdrawn and the building is decommissioned for healthcare purposes, which is expected to be in 2000.

GP Research Database

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will make a statement on the role of the General Practitioners Research Database in formulating policy in respect of (a) reducing waiting lists and (b) applying resources to where they are most needed; [41221]

(2) what steps he has taken to use the data contained on the General Practitioners Research Database to ensure that the use of NHS funds is based on scientifically recorded data; [41219]

(3) what programmes are in operation to categorise the information on drugs, treatment and medical procedures which is recorded on the General Practitioners Research Database to provide doctors and patients with information that is not currently available elsewhere; [41220]

(4) what plans he has to analyse the recorded data on the General Practitioners Research Database concerning the long-term results of treatments, drugs and medical procedures in order to inform doctors of the ongoing results of these treatments. [41218]

Mr. Milburn: The General Practice Research Database (GPRD) is owned by the Department and is a powerful research and analytical tool. It is one of a number of data sources available to the Department, each of which has its strengths and limitations for specific purposes. For example, because of its general practice focus, the GPRD is well suited for many drug safety and pharmaco-epidemiological studies. However, because it is based on a sample of general practices, it is less valuable for making comparisons between health authorities. This would limit its use in resource allocation or in understanding waiting list issues at local level. The GPRD's lack of socio-economic data is also a factor in the way it can be used.

Data from the GPRD are published in Key Health Statistics from General Practice[1], and extracts have also been used in the Chief Medical Officer's Annual Report. The Department has used data from the GPRD on a number of occasions. The Medicines Control Agency, which is responsible for medicines regulation, uses data from the GPRD to investigate and evaluate drug safety issues.

Overall, the number of applications to use the GPRD for research studies has increased in the past year and we are keen that this trend should continue.

Extra-contractual Referrals

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list all National Health trusts which received more than 15 per cent of their income from extra-contractual referrals in 1996–97, indicating the total amount of revenue from ECRs for each trust and the percentage this represents of total revenues. [41538]

Mr. Milburn: In 1996–97, the following National Health Service trusts received more than 15 per cent. of their income from extra-contractual referrals (ECRs):

	ECR income £000	ECR as per cent. of total income
The Royal National Hospital for Rheumatic Diseases NHS Trust	2,561	33.19
Royal National Orthopaedic Hospital NHS Trust	11,793	32.04
Royal London Homoeopathic Hospital NHS Trust	1,044	31.72
The Queen Victoria Hospital NHS Trust	4,895	26.82
Robert Jones & Agnes Hunt Orthopaedic & District Hospital NHS Trust	4,446	19.80

Oncologists

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidelines his Department issues on the maximum number of new patients annually a clinical oncologist should take on. [41546]

Mr. Milburn: None. It is for local health service employers to estimate the level of staff required in the light of professional guidance and local population needs and priorities.

Sodium Bicarbonate

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will investigate the increase in prices between March and May of sodium bicarbonate supplied to the NHS; and if he will make a statement. [41024]

Mr. Milburn: We understand there is a single supplier of sodium bicarbonate capsules 500 milligrammes in the United Kingdom. The company concerned increased its list price from £2.05 to £30.56 for 100 capsules between March and April 1998. Officials have written to the company seeking a justification.

Fluoridation

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the sources, in each case, of the fluoride used to fluoridate water supplies in England. [41004]

Ms Jowell: About half a million people in this country receive water which is naturally fluoridated at or about the optimum level of one part per million. A further one million people receive water which is naturally fluoridated at a lower level, but which still confers some dental benefit. Some 5 million people receive water where the fluoride content has been artificially increased to a level of one part per million. Information on the sources from which water companies obtain fluoride is commercially confidential and is not routinely collected by government.

Laser Surgery

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to review the safety and appropriateness of laser surgery to correct short sight. [41586]

Mr. Milburn: The Department is consulting the Royal College of Ophthalmologists about this procedure, which is not available under the National Health Service but carried out in private clinics. The College has undertaken to provide information on complications and clinical standards. This will inform a judgment about the adequacy of the regulatory provisions currently available.

Hospital Waiting Times

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond), on 5 May 1998, Official Report, columns 347–48, concerning hospital waiting times, for how many trusts figures were supplied, what assessment he has made of the reliability and accuracy of the data he published on 1 April and if he will provide a breakdown of the ways in which the patients who had been on the waiting list for more than 18 months prior to 1 April were removed from the waiting list. [41720]

Mr. Milburn: As I made clear in my reply to the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) of 5 May 1998, Official Report, columns 347–48, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State based his announcement about the number of patients waiting longer than 18 months on 31 March on management intelligence. This was obtained by regional offices of the National Health Service Executive as a special exercise as part of their performance management function. Provisional waiting list/time information for 31 March 1998, based on the well-established series of quarterly returns from health authorities and trusts, will be published in week commencing 18 May 1998. Information on removals from waiting lists collected centrally does not differentiate between the various reasons for removal, nor does it show how long patients had been waiting at the time of removal.

Closures and Service Reduction

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will list those hospitals whose accident and emergency departments have been (a) closed and (b) downgraded to Minor Injuries Clinics since 1 May 1997 which are subject to consultation which might lead to such closure or downgrading; [41757]

(2) if he will list the hospitals and health units which have been closed since 1 May 1997 or which are subject to consultation which might lead to closure; [41756]

(3) if he will list those hospitals or health units which have been subject to a major reduction in services provided on site. [41758]

Mr. Milburn: In line with the practice of previous Administrations, this information is not collected centrally.

Primary Care Groups

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which authority will make the final decisions regarding the boundaries of primary care groups, with particular reference to where centres of population are on the borders of a health authority area; and if it will be possible for a primary care group to cross health authority borders. [41602]

Mr. Milburn: Guidance issued at Easter (HSC 1998/065) made clear that Primary Care Groups will be based on natural geographical communities of people, typically covering around 100,000 population, and taking account of social services organisational structures. Health authorities are charged with responsibility for establishing the Primary Care Groups and will be required to notify the National Health Service Executive of their local configuration by July 1998.

Disabled Persons

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the future financial support from his Department for disabled persons and disability groups through the Access Committee for England. [40557]

Mr. Boateng: It is open to the Access Committee for England (ACE) to apply for funding for projects under the general section 64 grant scheme administered by the Department for the financial year 1999–2000 onwards. Each project application will be considered carefully in the light of its likely furtherance of the Department's objectives, other applications received and the amount of money available. The decision was taken in March this year, following an inter-departmental review, not to renew core funding for ACE from the current financial year (1998–99). This was in line with our policy of time-limiting core grants of which all voluntary organisations receiving support from the Department under section 64 have been made aware. It is, therefore, unlikely that any future application for core funding from ACE would be successful.

Eastbourne District General Hospital

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients received treatment at Eastbourne District General Hospital in each of the last five years. [41475]

Mr. Milburn: Information on numbers and patients treated is not collected centrally. In-patient activity is recorded in terms of finished consultant episodes (FCEs), and outpatient activity is recorded in terms of consultant outpatient attendances.

The information provided in the table is for Eastbourne Hospitals National Health Service Trust. The trust consists of Eastbourne District General Hospital and All Saints Hospital. A breakdown of the information between the hospitals is not available centrally, but may be available from the Chief Executive of the trust.

Data are taken from the publications, "Ordinary and day case admissions for England" and "Outpatients and ward attenders for England", 1996–97, copies of which are available in the Library.

Table: Finished consultant episodes and first consultant outpatient attendances for Eastbourne Hospitals NHS Trust, 1992–93 to 1996–97

	Finished consultant episodes
Year	Ordinary admissions	Day case admissions	First consultant outpatient attendances
1992–93	30,163	5,040	134,861
1993–94	31,434	6,554	135,800
1994–95	31,707	7,140	136,074
1995–96	34,866	8,226	134,971
1996–97	32,273	10,026	138,864

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients (a) are currently awaiting admission and (b) were awaiting admission on 1 May 1997 to Eastbourne District General Hospital. [41468]

Mr. Milburn: Waiting list information collected centrally shows the number of patients waiting at the end of each quarter and how long they had been waiting broken down by 3 month timebands. Information for 1 May 1997 is not therefore available. On 31 March 1997, there were 4,806 patients awaiting admission to Eastbourne Hospitals National Health Service Trust on either an ordinary or day case basis. The latest information currently available is for 31 December 1997 and this shows 5,079 patients awaiting admission.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Policy Reviews

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many policy reviews are currently being carried out within her Department; what is the cost to date of those reviews; and when each review is expected to report. [40901]

Mr. Denham: We are reviewing the major components of the Social Security system. On 26 March, we published a Green Paper, New Ambitions for our Country: A New Contract For Welfare, which sets out the Government's principles for welfare reform, indicates the issues to be tackled and identifies a series of proposed success measures by which we can monitor progress. We are currently seeking views on its contents. The consultation period ends on 31 July.

In accordance with our manifesto commitment, we have also instigated a review of pensions and we will be publishing a Green Paper on Pensions later this year. Further announcements on other areas will be made in due course.

The costs of this activity are being met from within existing Departmental running costs.

Lone Parents

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to her answer of 7 April 1998, Official Report, column 224, on lone parents, if she will update that answer to cover the period 21 July 1997 to 31 March 1998. [40900]

Mr. Keith Bradley: Information on the operation of the New Deal for Lone Parents is available up to and including 31 March 1998.

As at 31 March 1998:

24,795 lone parents have been contacted, or have made contact with their personal advisers

6,085 initial interviews have been arranged, and 5,178 lone parents have attended interviews

4,637 lone parents have agreed to participate in the programme following initial interviews

1,530 lone parents have found jobs following agreement to participate in the programme.A full independent evaluation of the New Deal for Lone Parents is being undertaken, to report in Autumn 1999. This will assess the overall effectiveness of the programme in helping lone parents move into employment.

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to her answer of 21 April 1998, Official Report, columns 604–05, on lone parents, how many lone parents who gained employment between 1 March and 31 March are now in receipt of income support and have no earnings. [40952]

Mr. Keith Bradley: The number of lone parents who gained employment between 1 and 31 March 1998 was 280, and, of these, 25 are now in receipt of Income Support and have no earnings.

It is not possible to draw conclusions about exit rates from employment of lone parents on the New Deal for Lone Parents as the data from the New Deal for Lone Parents are insufficient to calculate exit rates. The evaluation of the New Deal for Lone Parents will identify any factors which have affected the programme's success and will calculate exit rates from employment of lone parents on the New Deal for Lone Parents. The full evaluation will report in Autumn 1999.

EU Ministers for Women

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if she will make a statement on the conference of EU Ministers for Women on Childcare in Belfast on 5 and 6 May; if she will place in the Library a list of those who attended and copies of those speeches made in English; and what plans she has to publish a transcript of the conference including translations of speeches made in other languages. [40463]

Ms Harman: The theme of the UK Presidency is employability. We have been clear from the outset that this means the employability of women as well as men. That is why we called the meeting of EU Ministers for Women which we held in Belfast on 5–6 May.

The meeting focused in particular on the importance of childcare and family friendly employment policies, and provided a valuable opportunity to share best practice with our EU partners. The meeting reached a consensus on the following key points.

Affordable, accessible, and high quality childcare, parental and other leave schemes, and family friendly working policies are essential for women and men to combine work and family responsibilities.

Equality between women and men must be mainstreamed in all employment policies, both at national and EU level, so that measures to improve employability and support the unemployed take the rights and needs of women and men fully into account.

Meetings of Ministers for Women and for Equality provide useful opportunities for the exchange of ideas and best practice and developing strategies. They intend to meet at least once a year in future.

Member states expressed their commitment to drive forward these initiatives and will use proposed future meetings to do so.

The full text of the Belfast Communiqué will be placed in the Library, together with a list of those attending the conference. In keeping with normal practice for informal proceedings at such conferences, transcripts of speeches will not be published, although the programme and the speech to the open session by Secretary of State will be placed in the Library.

Child Support

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many applications to the Child Support Agency for maintenance assessment have been outstanding for more than (a) six months, (b) 12 months and (c) 18 months; and if he will make a statement. [41352]

Mr. Keith Bradley: One of our key aims for the Child Support Agency is to ensure that more absent parents pay the maintenance they owe. We are looking closely at all aspects of the child support scheme to see where improvements can be made and we aim to bring forward a consultation document on our proposals.

The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the Chief Executive, Mrs. Faith Boardman. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Faith Boardman to Mr. Christopher Chope, dated 11 May 1998:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about Child Support Agency maintenance assessments.

The child maintenance formula can require the Agency to enquire, look at and consider over 100 pieces of information before an assessment can be made and it is inevitable that some time will elapse between an application being made and the maintenance assessment being made.

From its launch in 1993, the Agency has taken on just under 2.4 million cases. In the last year, the Agency has started to clear the backlog of cases that had built up during the Agency's first two years, with the emphasis being on completing full maintenance assessments. The Agency's increased performance in this area is well illustrated by the number of full maintenance assessments completed; in 1997/98 up to 31 January 1998, 132,724 full maintenance assessments had been completed compared to 97,542 for the same period the previous year.

The Agency is very aware of the need to assess maintenance applications as quickly as possible, and in 1997/98 had a Secretary of State target covering this area which included a volume element for the first time. The target required a total of at least 525,000 maintenance applications to be cleared; 60% of new maintenance applications to be cleared within 26 weeks and on 31 March 1998 no more than 5% of all maintenance applications received by the Agency to be over 52 weeks old. The volume element of the target was exceeded by 13% with 595,000 clearances achieved, a significant increase on clearances of 357,000 in 1996/97. Both percentage targets were also met. 71% of new applications were cleared within 26 weeks, against an achievement of 54% in 1996/97. This represented a total of 278,180 applications cleared within 26 weeks, an increase of 52% over the previous year. At the end of 1997/98, less than 5% of all applications received since the Agency's inception were over 52 weeks old. This was a major improvement on last year, when the target to have no more than 10% of cases over a year old was missed. The 1998/99 Secretary of State target requires 65% of new applications to be cleared within 22 weeks and on 31 March 1999 there to be no applications outstanding over 52 weeks old.

The latest available information on outstanding maintenance applications (to 31 March 1998) is detailed below:

applications outstanding over six months and less than 12 months: 45,211 applications outstanding over twelve months and less than 18 months: 11,593 applications outstanding over eighteen months: 98,524

The number of applications outstanding over 6 months and less than 12 months in each Business Unit is approximately 6,500; in 1997/98 each Business Unit cleared on average around 85,000 applications. Any maintenance application which is over 52 weeks old is considered to form part of the Agency's backlog—the large majority of these applications are a legacy from the difficult first two years of the Agency. At the beginning of 1997/98 the number of backlog applications amounted to 224,714; this has more than halved to 110,117 at 31 March 1998.

The Agency has developed and is now implementing a strategy for meeting its undertaking to clear all its backlogs. All Business Units have put in place operational plans which will guide them towards the achievement of our stated objective of clearing all the backlogs by 31 March 1999.

We are constantly looking at how we can adapt and improve our procedures to speed up the time taken to clear maintenance applications. The timescales for clearances have shortened considerably over the last 2 years. The Agency is now building more pro-active use of the telephone into its assessment process; an increased use of the telephone to gather information, should have a positive impact on timescales.

I hope this is helpful.

Contributions Agency

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what use is made of the Yield Analysis Statistical System in each Contributions Agency region and office. [41463]

Mr. Denham: The administration of National Insurance contribution records and related issues is a matter for George Bertram, the Chief Executive of the Contributions Agency. He will write to my hon. Friend shortly.

Letter from George Bertram to Mr. Jim Cousins, dated May 1998:

As Chief Executive of the Contributions Agency I have responsibility for answering questions about matters relating to the Contributions Agency. I have been asked to reply to your question about the Yield Analysis and Statistical System (YASS) and its use within the Agency's regions and regional offices.

The YASS is a personal computer based targeting system that has been rolled out for use by the Contributions Agency's Operations in the Field. Initially, one YASS personal computer was installed into each region, but subsequently nine of the twelve regions have installed additional YASS personal computers.

YASS is a targeting and modelling tool that was designed to assist CA Field Operations in identifying those employers who:

Need assistance in completing their end of year returns correctly; or

Those that are most likely to owe arrears of National Insurance Contributions

YASS uses data taken from the Agency's Employers Index System (ENDX) and information supplied from the inspections of employers National Insurance records.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

British Exporters

11. Mr. Eric Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the progress made by his Department in improving its support for British exporters. [40501]

Mr. Fatchett: I refer my hon. Friend to the oral answer I gave earlier in the House today to my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones).

Middle East Peace Process

17. Mrs. Betty Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the progress of the middle east peace process. [40508]

24. Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consultations he has had with Israel and surrounding Arab countries regarding peace in the middle east. [40515]

30. Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the initiatives taken by his Department to assist the middle east peace process. [40522]

32. Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress in the middle east peace process, following the visit by the Prime Minister. [40524]

Mr. Fatchett: I refer my hon. Friends and the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary earlier in the House today to my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Ms Morgan).

Iraq

21. Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on human rights in Iraq. [40512]

Mr. Fatchett: Iraq's record on human rights is appalling, as our annual report on human rights made clear. The latest report from the UN Special Rapporteur Max Van-Der Stoel concluded that the situation had deteriorated still further since his last report to the Commission on Human Rights in Geneva. On 21 April the Commission adopted a tough resolution, drafted by the UK as EU Presidency, which strongly criticised the Iraqi regime.

South Africa

26. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with other European Foreign Ministers on the EU-South Africa trade negotiations. [40517]

Mr. Fatchett: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary's most recent discussions with European colleagues took place at the General Affairs Council in March. He noted the progress made in the previous negotiating round, and reiterated our wish to complete the negotiations soon. The Commission will report back to the Council in the light of its further negotiations with the South Africans, the next round of which is scheduled for late this month.

Falkland Islands

27. Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to discuss the sovereignty of the Falkland Islands with representatives of the Argentine Government. [40518]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We have no plans to discuss the transfer or sharing of the sovereignty of the Falkland Islands with the Argentine Government. We do not regard the sovereignty of the Islands as negotiable.

Hong Kong

28. Ms Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the progress towards democracy in Hong Kong. [40519]

Mr. Fatchett: We strongly support the goal of a legislature elected by universal suffrage, as provided for by the Basic Law, and welcome the HKSAR Government's commitment to this goal. We hope that this will be achieved according to a timetable reflecting the wishes of the people of Hong Kong.

The fact that elections will be held on 24 May to replace the unelected provisional legislature is a welcome step towards more representative government, although we have concerns about some of the detailed arrangements, particularly in the functional constituencies.

EU (Enlargement)

29. Mr. Rammell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress in achieving agreement within the European Union on the enlargement process. [40521]

Mr. Fatchett: In the first four months of our Presidency of the EU, we have taken forward the remit agreed at the Luxembourg European Conference in London on 12 March; we launched the Accession Process in Brussels on 30 March; and we opened Accession Negotiations the next day with six of the applicants.

Kosovo

31. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about recent contact group meetings on Kosovo. [40523]

Mr. Robin Cook: The Contact Group has met regularly since January to discuss Kosovo. It has condemned the continuing violence in that province and underlined the need for a meaningful dialogue between the parties if the spiral of violence is to be reversed. We will continue to play a leading role on this issue within the Group, including on the need for further measures against Belgrade if President Milosevic continues to turn his back on dialogue.

European Integration

33. Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his Department's proposals for further European integration. [40525]

Mr. Fatchett: We support closer integration with our European partners where it is in the United Kingdom's interest. This Department has made no specific proposals for further integration.

Sudan

34. Mr. Savidge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the crisis in the Sudan. [40527]

Mr. Fatchett: The Civil war in Sudan has displaced large segments of the population in the South, creating a serious humanitarian problem. Bahr El Ghazal is the area where the current crisis is most acute. We are deeply concerned at this unfolding human tragedy and we have been active in trying to find solutions. We and our EU partners are of the view that a political settlement is essential to bring to an end the suffering of the Sudanese people. As Presidency, we issued an EU Declaration on 1 May which voiced European concerns and called for an immediate cease-fire. At UK instigation, Sudan was discussed at the UN Security Council on 5 May and a press statement was made by the President expressing the UN's concerns. We have lobbied countries in the region to bring pressure to bear on all parties in the civil war to reach a comprehensive negotiated settlement at the Intergovernmental Authority on Development (IGAD) peace talks held in Nairobi on 2 to 5 May.

Environmental Protection

Ms Shipley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his Department's progress in securing protection of the international environment. [40507]

Mr. Fatchett: We have raised the profile of international environment issues in foreign policy discussions. As a result, environment will have been a theme at each of the major conferences hosted by the UK from October 1997 to June 1998. Environment is one of the themes of the UK Presidency of the EU. We are working in international forums with colleagues from other Departments to achieve better protection of the international environment, notably in the area of climate change and protection of the world's oceans.

Human Rights Annual Report

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his Department's first annual human rights report. [40513]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary undertook last July to publish an Annual Report on the Government's activities to promote human rights.

He published the first such Report jointly with the Secretary of State for International Development on 21 April. The Report illustrates activities in respect of human rights in a range of activities undertaken by the government in some 70 countries; as well as summarising our activities in the UN and other international organisations.

Indonesia

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 24 July 1997, Official Report, column 708, if he will make a statement on the use of Hawk aircraft in East Timor since 1983. [41447]

Mr. Fatchett: We have studied all the information available about allegations of Hawk being used in East Timor. We are confident that UK supplied Hawk aircraft have not been used in East Timor or, indeed, in a counter-insurgency role in Indonesia.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to ensure the British and French proposals for a code of conduct governing arms transfers will give priority to the protection of human rights in Indonesia over the maintenance of a strong defence industry. [41550]

Mr. Fatchett: Discussions with EU partners on the text of the Code of Conduct are continuing. Our policy is that the Code should apply to all arms exports to all destinations, and should specify that Member States will refuse an export licence if there is a clear risk that the proposed export might be used for internal repression.

Arms Export Licences

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which countries are currently refused arms export licences as a consequence of the ethical foreign policy. [41569]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: All applications to export goods entered in Part III of Schedule 1 to the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1994 are assessed against the criteria announced by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary on 28 July 1997, Official Report, columns 26–29. The criteria do not specify automatic refusal of licence applications for exports to any country or countries. But they do state that a licence should be refused if approval would be inconsistent with the UK's international obligations and commitments to enforce UN, OSCE and EU embargoes together with any national embargoes. I listed all arms embargoes implemented by the UK in my answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Flynn) of 28 January 1998, Official Report, columns 273–74.

Lord Whitty

Mr. Howard: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is Lord Whitty's salary in his capacity as Minister with Special Responsibility for the EU Presidency. [41383]

Mr. Doug Henderson: As a Government Whip, my noble Friend Lord Whitty receives the salary of a Lord in Waiting. He receives no further salary for performing other official duties on behalf of the FCO or other Departments.

Pakistan

Mr. Touhig: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make representations to the Pakistan Government expressing concern about the death sentence passed on Ayub Masih for blasphemy. [41385]

Mr. Fatchett: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) on 7 May 1998, Official Report, column 483.

Mr. Touhig: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will monitor the case of Pakistani Christian, Ayub Masih, who was sentenced to death on 27 April at Punjab District Court for blasphemy. [41384]

Mr. Fatchett: Our High Commission in Islamabad is monitoring Ayub Masih's case closely. His lawyers have lodged an appeal in the Punjab High Court against his sentence. I was shocked to hear of the suicide of Bishop John Joseph on 6 May, apparently in protest at Ayub Masih's sentence. Our High Commission has sent condolences to his family and community.

Strategic Arms Exports

Mr. Howard: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on what date he plans to publish his annual report on strategic arms exports. [41729]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We hope to publish the annual report on strategic arms exports during the current session.

Seconded Staff

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his policy towards the secondment of individuals from private companies to his Department. [41068]

Mr. Fatchett: This Department has had a long-standing programme of interchange with business. We aim to build on this. Last July, we announced a new programme of short-term business attachments to our missions overseas of business people to work on specific projects. The 14 recruited so far have added their expertise to our commercial effort. We also open some longer-term positions within this Department, at home and overseas, to business people. In addition, we second FCO staff to companies so that they can gain first-hand business experience.

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what role individuals on secondment from private companies to his Department have in advising Ministers; and what access such individuals have to Ministers on issues concerning their company. [41072]

Mr. Fatchett: Secondees contribute towards the work of departments and posts and are managed by civil servants. To avoid conflict of interest, individuals do not have access to Ministers on issues directly concerning their company. Steps are put in place to ensure no conflict of interest.

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many individuals are currently on secondment from private companies to his Department; and if he will list them, indicating their responsibilities. [41073]

Mr. Fatchett: We currently have 21 staff seconded from private companies, including 10 secondees under the Business Attachment Scheme. Details are shown.

European Court of Justice

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which body has final jurisdiction in respect of the interpretation of framework decisions taken under the proposed Article K.6(2)(b) and (c) of the Treaty of Amsterdam where Her Majesty's Government under Article K.7 does not accept a preliminary ruling of the European Court of Justice. [41507]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 11 May 1998]: Article K.7(1) of the Treaty on European Union, as amended by the Treaty of Amsterdam, confers jurisdiction on the European Court of Justice to give preliminary rulings on the interpretation of framework decisions and decisions adopted by the Council pursuant to Article K.6(2)(b) and (c). By virtue of Article K.7(2) a Member State may choose whether or not to accept that jurisdiction. Since the Government do not intend to accept that jurisdiction, if a framework decision or decision adopted pursuant to Article K.6(2)(b) or (c) fell to be interpreted by the British courts, the House of Lords would ultimately be the Court of final jurisdiction as far as the United Kingdom was concerned.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

North American Free Trade Agreement

Mr. Paterson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will make a statement on the recent proposals to bring Britain and the European Union closer to NAFTA. [40503]

Mrs. Beckett: There are many ties of trade, culture and history between the UK and North America, and we are also a committed member of the European Union. In trade matters we act primarily as part of the EU. During its Presidency of the EU Council of Ministers, the UK has sought to develop our multilateral trading relations and our relations with North America so that these relations are closer and mutually supportive.

Employment Protection

Mr. Bennett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how much has been paid to employees of insolvent employers through the provisions of sections 63 to 65 of the Employment Protection Act 1975 and successive acts incorporating those provisions in each year since 1976. [41360]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The information is not available as such payments are part of general payments which may be made to employees of insolvent employers and are not separately identified.

Vehicle Licensing

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what criteria are used to decide whether a post office in rural Scotland provides a vehicle licensing service. [41046]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency determine the total number of post office outlets from which the motor vehicle licensing service operates. Post Office Counters Ltd then determine the most suitable post office locations for the service taking account of various criteria, including local car parking facilities, space within the office to cope with demand for service at peak times, level of customer demand and proximity to alternative offices to achieve a suitable geographical spread.

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what percentage of post offices in Scotland have been able to offer vehicle licensing facilities for each year since 1987. [41043]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The Post Office tell me that the percentages of post offices in Scotland offering vehicle licensing facilities for each year since 1987 for which the information is available are as follows:

1993	22.4
1994	22.o
1995	22.8
1996	23.0
1997	23.2
1998	23.5

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what percentage of post offices in England have been able to offer vehicle licensing facilities for each year since 1987. [41044]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The Post Office tell me that the percentages of post offices in England offering vehicle licensing facilities for each year since 1987 for which the information is available are as follows:

Year	Percentage
1992	20.1
1993	20.3
1994	20.5
1995	20.7
1996	20.9
1997	21.1
1998	21.3

Public Bodies

Mr. Öpik: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many and what proportion of her Department's appointees to non-departmental public bodies are (i) aged under 25, (ii) aged 25 to 30 and (iii) aged 31 to 35 years. [40741]

Mrs. Beckett: As far as I am aware, none of my Department's public appointments is held by people aged under 25, three are held by those aged 25–30 and 51 by those aged 31–35. This represents approximately 0.1 per cent. and 1.7 per cent. respectively of the overall number of appointments. These figures exclude a few appointments to advisory bodies (approximately 2 per cent. of the total) for which details are not available.

The Government are committed to encouraging a wide range of candidates to apply for positions on the boards of public bodies, reflecting the diverse society in which we live. This includes encouraging more young people to put themselves forward as potential candidates for public appointments. All appointments are made on merit, and candidates must demonstrate that they have the necessary skills and experience to match the needs of the public body on which they wish to serve.

Import Quotas

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade which import quotas have been exceeded, and by how much, in each of the last five years; and what (a) penalties and (b) sanctions the United Kingdom has imposed. [40626]

Mrs. Roche: Since 1994, all quantitative restrictions on imports have been established at the level of the European Union.

I am aware of one case where the European Commission established that products subject to quota were imported into the European Union under false declarations of origin, and where an equivalent reduction was made to that country's quota for a later year.

I am not aware from the information that is readily available, and after taking account of the flexibilities provided for under the various regimes, of other instances in the past five years of imports of products subject to quota exceeding permitted levels.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if the tests listed by the Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee to evaluate the suitability of nuclear materials for import, in its publication on the import and export of radioactive materials, were applied to the consignment of enriched uranium due to be sent from Georgia to Dounreay. [40672]

Mr. Battle: The tests listed by the Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee (RWMAC) were applied to the consignment of enriched uranium recently sent from Georgia to Dounreay. For the majority of the material which is unirradiated, Tests 4 and 5 are relevant, in that useful material with a positive economic value to the UK can be recovered from it. Based on these tests alone, there would be an expectation that wastes produced would be returned to the country of origin. This is also true of the wastes arising from the reprocessing of the small quantity of spent reactor fuel.

However, Tests 9 and 12 are overriding for the whole consignment in that the quantity of radioactive waste arising would be too small for the recovery processes to be practicable in the country of origin. Furthermore, Georgia could not reasonably be expected to develop suitable disposal facilities of its own for such a small amount of waste. Test 10 is also relevant in that the material accepted does not significantly add to the wastes needing to be disposed of in the UK.

UKAEA Constabulary

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to her answer of 30 April 1998, Official Report, column 237 if she will place a copy of the most recent HMI Constabulary report relating to security at UKAEA Constabulary-policed sites in the Library; and if she will list the security organisations which advised HMI on the report. [41086]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 6 May 1998]: The Director of Civil Nuclear Security, not HM Inspectorate of Constabulary, is responsible for auditing security at UKAEA Constabulary policed sites. HMI of Constabulary is tasked by the Police Authority to report on the operational efficiency and effectiveness of the force. As his reports relate to detailed arrangements concerning the internal security of nuclear material, it would not be appropriate to release them.

Ethical Trading

Dr. Tonge: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what recent initiatives involving private sector and non-Governmental organisations her Department has promoted to develop the ethical trading initiative. [41039]

Mrs. Roche: The Ethical Trading Initiative is a partnership between the private sector, non-governmental organisations and trades unions which is part-funded by the Department for International Development. DTI supports the ETI and similar partnerships which are promoted by the partners involved.

Information and Communication Technologies

Mr. Timms: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps she is taking to monitor and assess the United Kingdom's progress in the uptake of information and communication technologies in the United Kingdom compared with other countries. [41927]

Mrs. Roche: An understanding of the UK's position in the global information age is essential for development of relevant and timely government policies, and is an important tool for UK companies in benchmarking their own development. This is why the Department of Trade and Industry has been carrying out a series of benchmarking studies, as part of the Information Society Initiative (ISI), to compare progress in the UK with other major economies (USA, Japan, Germany, and France). Today I published the latest report 'Moving into the Information Age—International Benchmarking Study 1998' and copies have been place in the Library of the House. Copies of the 1998 report (and last year's report) are also available by calling the ISI Business Infoline on 0345 15 2000, or by e-mailing info@isi.gov.uk, or through the ISI website at http://www.isi.gov.uk.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Departmental Reviews

Sir Nicholas Lyell: To ask the Attorney-General how many reviews are currently in train in his Department; what is the cost to date of each review; and when each review is expected to report. [41152]

The Attorney-General: The only review currently in train in my Department is the Review of the Crown Prosecution Service under the chairmanship of Sir Iain Glidewell. The costs incurred in the financial year 1997–98 were £508,000.

I expect to receive the Report before the Spring Bank Holiday.

Written Answers to Questions

Wednesday 13 May 1998

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Human Rights

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, what recent representations he has received concerning the implications of the Human Rights Bill [Lords] for religious organisations. [41202]

Mr. Stuart Bell: I have had a number of recent representations raising various issues relating to the effect on religious organisations, and particularly the Church of England, of the Human Rights Bill. A delegation representing the Church of England, the Roman Catholic Church and the Free Churches met the Home Secretary before Easter to explain their position.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Treasury Solicitor's Department

Mr. Hopkins: To ask the Attorney-General what key performance targets he has set for the Treasury Solicitor's Department in 1998–99. [41580]

The Attorney-General: In 1998–99 the performance of the Treasury Solicitor's Department will be measured against the following targets:

Performance	Target
Financial
1. Annual efficiency savings in real terms	2.5%
2. To recover the full operating costs for chargeable services of the Agency	100%
3. To achieve an improvement of 25% on 1997–98 level of income recovery from clients within 30 days of their receipt of a validated invoice	75%
Legal services
4. To maintain a level of client satisfaction of—(advisory)	95–100%
5. Reduction in average unit cost per chargeable hour in real terms (litigation)	2.5%
6. Minimum average number of chargeable hours recorded per full time caseholder per year (litigation)	1,150
7. Reduction in average unit cost per case in real terms—(bona vacantia)	2.5%

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Duty Free

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the potential effects on (a) the number of routes, (b) the cost, (c) the frequency and (d) employment provided in the United Kingdom of (i) continental ferry services and (ii) continental air passenger services of the abolition of internal European Union tax free sales in 1999; and if he will make a statement. [41169]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Department has undertaken a review of the reports prepared for the shipping and aviation industry assessing the likely employment and economic effects of the abolition of intra-EC duty free sales in 1999. A copy has been placed in the Library today.

Sea Turtles

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the recent World Trade Organisation ruling that a United States law protecting sea turtles is incompatible with world trade agreements. [41458]

Angela Eagle: We will read the report of the World Trade Organisation Panel on this case very carefully when it is made available to World Trade Organisation members who are not parties to the dispute in a few weeks' time. It would be premature to draw conclusions before knowing the full detail of the Panel's judgment. The Government will be able to comment once we have the papers and have assessed them.

Aviation Safety

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what action (a) his Department and (b) the Civil Aviation Authority intend to take following the publication by the FAA that Bangladesh has been listed as not meeting international aviation safety standards. [41556]

Ms Glenda Jackson: None. However, the Civil Aviation Authority has already inspected on our behalf aircraft operated by airlines based in Bangladesh. In addition, Bangladesh has applied for an assessment under the International Civil Aviation Organisation's safety oversight assessment programme. We will review the position once that assessment has been carried out.

Park and Ride

Sir Raymond Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many park and ride schemes his Department has (a) introduced and (b) drawn up since 1 May 1997. [41590]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker) on 13 March 1998, Official Report, column 308.

Planning, design, and implementation of park and ride schemes are functions of local authorities. My Department's role is to fund those initiatives where authorities are able to demonstrate, in their annual Transport Policies and Programme submissions, that their proposals meet the criteria the Department has prescribed.

Walking Strategy Working Groups

Sir Raymond Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the members of the three working groups on Walking Strategy, indicating how members were chosen, by whom and using what criteria. [41581]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Membership of the three working groups was based on recommendations of the Walking Steering Group plus other suggestions made within the Department. The final selection was made by a sub-group of the Steering Group.

No formal criteria were adopted other than to identify candidates with appropriate expertise and representing a broad range of interested and relevant organisations.

The current members of the working groups and the Steering Group are as listed:

Regional Development Authorities

Sir Raymond Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list those organisations from which he has requested nominations to serve on the proposed (a) London, (b) South East, (c) North East, (d) North West, (e) Yorks and Humber, (f) West Midlands, (g) East Midlands, (h) Eastern and (i) South West Regional Development Authorities, indicating the number of nominations he has sought from each organisation, the dates of the interviews, and those who will be present at the interview, who will select those appointed and how the chair and vice chair will be chosen. [41582]

Mr. Caborn: Following my hon. Friend's question of 8 April 1998, Official Report, column 286, I am writing to him with a list of organisations that were contacted seeking nominations for RDAs. I am also placing a copy of the list in the Library. Nominations for the London RDA have been passed on to the relevant Government Office to be given to the Mayor. We did not seek a specific number of nominations from any organisation.

Candidates for interview have not yet been selected; nor have dates been set. All appointments will be made by Ministers.

Countryside Access

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how much money has been (a) given and (b) committed by the Countryside Commission to the Country Landowners Association to assist with the CLA's Access 2000 project; if he will list the (i) numbers, (ii) size and (iii) location of sites involving new public access opened as a result of the expenditure; and if each new public access is (1) permanent, (2) free of charge and (3) paid for by (I) walkers and (II) a Government-funded scheme. [41548]

Mr. Meacher: The Country Landowners Association is taking action under its Access 2000 initiative to improve the quality, diversity and quantity of managed public access and recreation in the countryside. The CLA has employed an Access Adviser to assist them with the practical aspects of this initiative. The Countryside Commission is helping to meet the costs of the Access Adviser. To date, the Commission has paid approximately £17,000 and is committed to a maximum contribution of £68,500 over the three years to April 2000.

The work of the Adviser involves seeking voluntary improvements in the public access available over rural private land in England, and includes the production of guidance on making local access assessments. The Commission receives progress reports from the CLA and I shall be asking the Commission to seek up-to-date information from the CLA on the other points my hon. Friend raises and to write to him with the information available. A copy of the Commission's letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Carbon Dioxide Emissions

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the change in the level of the United Kingdom's carbon dioxide emissions in (a) quantity and (b) percentage terms in each of the last 10 years. [41380]

Angela Eagle: Carbon dioxide emissions and changes in the level of emissions since 1990 are as follows:

Year	Emissions (million tonnes of carbon)	Level change (million tonnes of carbon)	Percentage change
1990	167.7	—	—
1991	168.8	+1.1	+0.7
1992	164.3	−4.5	−2.7
1993	160.2	−4.1	−2.5
1994	159.1	−1.1	−0.7
1995	156.6	−2.6	−1.6
1996	161.8	+5.3	+3.4

The estimates in the Table are those reported to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change on the basis of the guidelines recommended by the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC). Final data for 1997 are not yet available but provisional estimates show that emissions last year were about 155 million tonnes, a decrease of some 4% from 1996. Differences between years are affected by outside temperature and this is the main reason for the increase between 1995 and 1996 and the subsequent decrease to 1997. Changes in economic activity, types of fuel used, the structure of the economy, and energy efficiency also affect emissions from year to year. Estimates on the IPCC basis are not available for years before 1990. Comparable data are available for earlier years on the basis used for reporting emissions to the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe, and these show that in 1988, 1989 and 1990 emissions changed by 0.0, -2.6 and +2.1 million tonnes of carbon, or 0%, -1.6% and +1.3% respectively.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the likely increase in the United Kingdom's carbon dioxide emissions in (a) quantity and (b) percentage terms over the 10 years from the beginning of 1998. [41381]

Angela Eagle: UK projections of carbon dioxide emissions are under review, but the existing estimates based on Energy Paper 65 suggest that, without the introduction of further policies, emissions in 2008 would be about 9 million tonnes of carbon, or about 6%, higher than in 1998. The increase above the 1990 baseline would be about 0.2%. Actual emissions in any year will be affected by external factors including the fluctuation in outside temperature. We are currently looking at policies and measures to meet our legally binding commitment following the Kyoto agreement, and our domestic aim to reduce emissions by 20% below the 1990 level. We shall be consulting on this over the summer.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what data he has collated in respect of the recent safety test conducted on the modified NTL-II transport container used to ship irradiated spent nuclear fuel from Krummel Nuclear Plant in Germany and Sellafield; when he received these data; and what actions he has taken as a result of this test. [41718]

Ms Glenda Jackson: No data have been received by this Department concerning these tests. The certificates of approval issued by DETR for the NTL 11 flask design were suspended by the Department on 20 February 1998 and they will remain so until the Department is satisfied that the designs meet the regulatory requirements.

Coastguard

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the responsibility for the Coastguard service will continue to rest with his Department after the conclusion of the Belfast Agreement; and what changes will be made to existing arrangements. [40706]

Ms Glenda Jackson: No changes are proposed to the Coastguard service as a result of the Belfast Agreement.

House Condition Survey

Mrs. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will publish the results of the 1996 English House Condition Survey. [42214]

Ms Armstrong: The report of the survey is to be published next week. A copy of the report and press release will be placed in the Library.

Thaumasite

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Reading, East (Jane Griffiths) of 1 April 1998, Official Report, columns 532–33, if he will announce the composition of the expert group on thaumasite. [42215]

Mr. Raynsford: I am pleased to announce that the Expert Group on Thaumasite, to be chaired by Professor Leslie Clark, President elect of the Institution of Structural Engineers, will comprise the following members:

Member	Representing
Professor Leslie Clark	Chairman
Dr. Philip Nixon	The Building Research Establishment
Dr. Peter Robery	The Institution of Civil Engineers
John Haynes	The National House-Building Council
Dr. Bill Price	The Association of Consulting Engineers
Neil Dutton	The Council of Mortgage Lenders and The Royal Institute of Chartered Surveyors
Dr. Don Hobbs	The British Cement Association
Chris Curtis	The Quarry Products Association
John Patch	The Federation of Piling Specialists and Association of Specialist Underpinning Contractors
Terry Rochester	Construction Clients Forum
Roy Thurgood	The Department of the Environment Transport and the Regions
David Slater	The Concrete Society
Chris Judge	Secretariat

SOCIAL SECURITY

Pensioners (Income Support)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps she is taking to ensure that pensioners entitled to income support are made aware of their entitlement. [40016]

Mr. Denham: We have a Manifesto commitment to examine ways of delivering more automatic help to the poorest pensioners. We have already started to deliver—research is underway into why pensioners do not take up their Income Support entitlement, and last month we started pilot projects in nine areas to test out the best ways of identifying potential pensioner claimants and encouraging them to make a claim.

Apart from the pilots, there is a great deal of information available which explains what Income Support is, how to claim it and where people can go for help. Post offices, libraries and local authorities hold information leaflets.

In addition, many non-Governmental organisations, such as Age Concern, Help the Aged and the Citizens Advice Bureaux, usually have a wide knowledge of all Social Security benefits and are also available to advise the public.

War Widows

Mr. McLoughlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many war widows currently receive both the DSS basic war widows' pension and the armed forces families' attributable pension. [41006]

Mr. Denham: I have been asked to reply.

The information requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Such information as is available is that at 31 March 1998 there were 57,551 War Widows pensions in payment.

Welfare Reform

Mr. Hepburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans she has to implement the objective in the Green Paper on Welfare Reform that the social security system should be flexible, efficient and easy to use. [42270]

Mr. Keith Bradley: We are committed to transforming the Social Security system into an Active Modern Service which provides better, simpler and more efficient service for our customers. I am pleased to announce since 27 April the Benefits Agency Chiltern South Directorate in partnership with Camden Local Authority have started to test integrated service delivery by providing a single point of contact to lone parents who are claiming Income Support, Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit and who make applications for child support. In addition, the Benefits Agency and the London Borough of Lewisham are developing a project which will test better exchange of information and improved advice and service to customers. We want to know what customers and staff think about this new way of delivering services and we will be listening carefully to what they tell us.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Tourism Projects

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what consultations are undertaken by (a) the Millennium Commission and (b) the Heritage Lottery Fund to ascertain local opinion in areas subject to application for grants for major tourism projects. [40827]

Mr. Chris Smith: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy) on 21 April 1998, Official Report, columns 565–66.

Regional Orchestras

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) what discussions he has had with the Chief Executives of regional orchestras; and if he will make a statement; [41642]

(2) how many regional orchestras have notified him that they have financial problems; and if he will make a statement; [41643]

(3) what steps he has taken to increase the funding of regional orchestras since 1997. [41641]

Mr. Fisher: The Arts Council of England takes decisions on the balance of funding between artforms and the distribution of Government grant-in-aid to regional orchestras without the involvement of Ministers. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have received representations from the major regional orchestras on a range of issues, and between us have met Chief Executives or other senior representatives of four of the main regional orchestras as well as other major orchestras.

Dukes Playhouse, Lancaster

Mr. Dawson: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will examine the policies of the North West Arts Board towards the Dukes Playhouse, Lancaster; and if he will make a statement. [41666]

Mr. Fisher [holding answer 12 May 1998]: North West Arts Board currently funds seven producing theatres in the North-West region, including £173,850 for the Dukes Playhouse, Lancaster in 1998–99. The Dukes Playhouse has also received a grant of £194,750 from the arts Lottery fund.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Deportations

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been deported from the United Kingdom since 1 May 1997. [40842]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Information on the numbers of persons removed from the United Kingdom between 1 May 1997 and 31 January 1998 is given in the table.

Persons removed from the United Kingdom 1 May 1997 to 31 January 1998[1]

	Number of persons removed[1]
Removed as a result of deportation action[2,3]	1,410
Removed as a result of illegal entry action[2,4]	3,340
Removed under port procedures[2]	18,620
Total removed	23,370

[1] Data are provisional and rounded
[2] Action may have been initiated in an earlier period
[3] Includes persons who departed voluntarily after deportation action had been initiated against them
[4] Includes persons who departed voluntarily after illegal entry action had been initiated against them

Race Relations Forum

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the persons appointed to the Race Relations Forum. [40841]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: My right hon. Friend has already sent out invitations to the persons being asked to serve on the Race Relations Forum. Once they have all responded we will announce the membership of the Forum. It is anticipated that it will meet in June.

Obscenity

Barbara Follett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions there have been for sending obscene material via fax machines in each of the last five years. [41500]

Mr. Michael: Under section 2 of the Obscene Publications Act 1959, it is a criminal offence to publish or possess for gain an obscene article. A person publishes an article if he distributes, circulates, sells, lets on hire, gives or lends it, or offers it, or electronically transmits it. Material sent via fax machines comes within the scope of the Act.

Data collected centrally about proceedings under section 2 do not specify the type of medium (e.g. book, magazine, Internet, facsimile, etc.) used in the commission of an offence.

Barbara Follett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what statutory provision governs the transmission of obscene and unsolicited faxes. [41498]

Mr. Michael: The principal control on obscene material is the Obscene Publications Act 1959. Under this Act, it is an offence to publish an obscene article, that is, an article which, in the view of the court, tends to 'deprave and corrupt' those likely to see, read or hear it. It is the responsibility of the police to decide whether there are sufficient grounds to launch a criminal investigation and that of the Crown Prosecution Service to decide whether to prosecute those alleged to be responsible for the publication.

Under the Telecommunications Act 1984, anyone running a telecommunications system in the United Kingdom is required to do so under licence. These licences contain measures aimed at limiting the nuisance caused by unsolicited telephone and fax calls, by requiring callers to cease this practice on receipt of a written request from the recipient. OFTEL are responsible for enforcing these rules and ultimately the Director General has power to deprive persistent offenders of the right to operate their telephone system.

The Government have also recently published a consultation paper on implementation of the European Union Telecoms Data Protection Directive, which seeks to address the question of additional measures to protect businesses and residential consumers from unwelcome faxes. The Directive will be implemented later this year.

Drugs

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the numbers and percentage of the total population aged under 25 years that use (a) cannabis and (b) heroin (i) on a regular basis and (ii) occasionally. [41612]

Mr. Michael: The British Crime Survey (BCS) gives estimates of drug use amongst people aged 16 to 24 living in private households in England and Wales. The most recent estimates are from the 1996 survey, when 39 per cent. of people in this age group said they had used cannabis at some time, 26 per cent. said they had used it in the last year and 16 per cent. in the last month. The proportion admitting to heroin use were: 1.0 per cent. in life-time, 0.4 per cent. in last year and 0.1 per cent. in the last month.

The estimates of heroin use—especially use in the last month—should be treated with great caution, partly because they are subject to very large sampling error, and partly because a household survey such as the BCS is likely to under-represent current heroin users.

Because the findings are subject to sampling error, estimates of the number of people using drugs can be said, with a certain degree of statistical confidence, to fall within a range. The table gives this range, together with the mid-point estimate. The estimates for cannabis use are fairly precise, while those for heroin are not.

Number of 16 to 24 year olds using cannabis and heroin (95 per cent. confidence intervals)

(000)

	Lower estimate	Higher estimate	Mid-point
Cannabis
ever used	2,100	2,400	2,300
used last year	1,400	1,700	1,500
used last month	800	1,100	900
Heroin
ever used	30	110	60
used last year	10	60	20
used last month	1	40	6

Firearms

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make arrangements to pay interest on outstanding claims under the compensation scheme for both high and small calibre pistols. [41798]

Mr. Michael: No. During the Parliamentary consideration of the compensation schemes last year, the principle of paying interest to claimants was expressly rejected. There is no reason to change that position.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Stephen Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he intends to make public country assessments prepared in respect of the main asylum producing countries in the United Kingdom. [42271]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Country assessments are being produced by the Country information and Policy Unit within the Immigration and Nationality Directorate on the 35 main asylum producing countries in the United Kingdom. The assessments will be completed over the next few weeks and will be made publicly available on the Home Office Internet site. Copies of the assessments will be placed in the Library as they become available. The assessments are all sourced to information obtained from independent external sources and from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. A bibliography of sources used is included in each assessment.

Assessments are being prepared in respect of the following countries:

Afghanistan
Algeria
Angola
Bangladesh
Bulgaria

It is intended to revise and update the assessments periodically; approximately six monthly depending on reported circumstances in the country concerned.

DEFENCE

Depleted Uranium Shells

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what reviews he is currently conducting on the (a) health and (b) environmental implications of the firing of depleted uranium shells at (i) Kirkcudbright test range at Dundrennan, (ii) Eskmeals in Cumbria and (iii) in Iraq, by British forces. [40633]

Mr. Spellar: Comprehensive environmental sampling programmes are in place at both Eskmeals and Kirkcudbright ranges where depleted uranium ammunition is fired. To date, calculated public radiation doses from all direct and indirect routes have been trivial, representing much less than 1 per cent. of the national annual radiation dose limit for members of the public. These monitoring programmes will continue until such time as the Environmental Agency considers that no further monitoring is necessary. The monitoring data is provided to the relevant local councils and environmental agencies.

No specific review of the environmental and health effects of firing depleted uranium ammunition in Iraq has been undertaken by the Ministry of Defence, nor is any review currently being carried out. To the best of our knowledge, no specific UK studies have been conducted into the potential environmental effects of depleted uranium contamination on the battlefield. The Defence Evaluation and Research Agency has, however, undertaken an assessment of the health effects on personnel exposed to depleted uranium under battlefield conditions. A summary of this report, 'Radiological and Chemical Hazards of Depleted Uranium', has already been placed in the Library of the House. This report concluded that there was no indication that any UK troops had been subjected to harmful over-exposure to depleted uranium during the Gulf War.

TREASURY

Economic and Monetary Union

Mr. Cash: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the economic benefits arising from membership of the Single Currency which would outweigh the constitutional costs to the United Kingdom of membership of EMU. [41344]

Mr. Gordon Brown: The Government do not accept that there is a constitutional bar that outweighs the economic tests as the decisive reason why we might join EMU. The constitutional issue is a factor in the decision, but it is not an overriding one. Rather it signifies that in order for monetary union to be right for Britain the economic benefits should be clear and unambiguous.

Mrs. Laing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the implications of the decision on which countries would enter EMU in the first wave for European political integrity. [40526]

Mr. Gordon Brown [holding answer 12 May 1998]: The UK Government supported the Commission recommendation on membership of the single currency on 1 January 1999 on the basis of the considerable progress made towards economic convergence on the basis of the Treaty criteria; the framework for stability and discipline provided by the Stability and Growth pact; the progress made by high-debt countries in reducing their debt-GDP ratios in recent years and their commitments to reducing them in the future; and the declaration issued by Finance Ministers on 1 May reaffirming the commitment to fiscal discipline, economic reform and job creation. The UK Government agreed with other Member States that in light of the above the necessary conditions for the adoption of the single currency had been achieved for all 11 candidates.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the revenue effect on the Exchequer of reducing the rate of value added tax on accommodation from 17.5 per cent. to 8 per cent., taking into account any effects on the demand for United Kingdom tourism; and if he will make a statement. [41161]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 11 May 1998]: After allowing for the impact on tourist expenditure in the UK, reducing the rate of VAT on accommodation from 17.5 per cent. to 8 per cent. is estimated to cost around £400m.

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when his Department will publish its Consultation Document on VAT Grouping; and if a copy will be placed in the Library. [40784]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 11 May 1998]: The proposal to consult on matters relating to VAT grouping was announced as part of this year's Budget Statement. Customs and Excise hope to publish as soon as possible. A copy will be placed in the Library.

Euro-X Committee

Dr. Fox: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the position of the United Kingdom with regard to the Euro-X Committee. [40488]

Mr. Gordon Brown [holding answer 12 May 1998]: Euro-X is an informal body to be established in line with the conclusions of the Luxembourg European Council. In line with the Luxembourg conclusions, the United Kingdom will be present at meetings of Euro-X which discuss issues of common interest to all EU Member States. The ECOFIN Council, which involves all Member States, will remain the only decision making body on economic coordination.

SCOTLAND

Continence Services

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for each local health board area the sums allocated to provide continence services in each area for the last three years for which figures are available, listing the amounts as a percentage of each board's primary care budget. [41446]

Mr. Galbraith: The information requested is not available centrally.

Edinburgh Royal Infirmary

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the development and financing of the new Edinburgh Royal Infirmary, and what representation he has received on the concerns of health care associations regarding future health care provision in the Edinburgh area. [41808]

Mr. Galbraith: The Royal Infirmary of Edinburgh NHS Trust is currently negotiating a PFI contract with its private sector partner for the delivery of the New Royal Infirmary. The development of the new facility on the south-east of Edinburgh is fully consistent with the Lothian Acute Strategy published in 1992.

Private Finance Initiative (NHS)

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will invite trade unions and professional associations representing NHS staff to interview companies short-listed as PFI partners. [41809]

Mr. Galbraith: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell and Wishaw (Mr. Roy) on 7 May 1998, Official Report, column 469.

Rents

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if, in respect of the financial years 1996–97 and 1997–98, he will list for each housing authority in Scotland (a) the total amount of unpaid rent from housing authority tenants and (b) the proportion of unpaid rent from housing authority tenants in relation to the total rental income. [41478]

Mr. Macdonald: Information in the form requested is not available. The table provides information on the cumulative amount of rents not paid by local authority tenants as at 31 March 1997 and 30 September 1997, the latest dates for which information is available.

Women Offenders

Mr. Browne: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish the report which he commissioned into Women's Offending. [42280]

Mr. McLeish: I have today published the Report "A Safer Way" on Community Disposals and the Use of Custody for Women Offenders in Scotland the Government's response to the report's seven recommendations. Copies are available in the Libraries of the House.

WALES

NHS Waiting Lists

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the estimated amount of additional money being made available to each Welsh health authority in 1998–99 to deal with rising waiting lists. [41176]

Mr. Win Griffiths: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) on 8 May 1998, Official Report, column 512.

New Deal

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the estimated budget for (a) the New Deal and (b) Welsh Training and Enterprise Councils in 1998–99; and if he will make a statement on the (i) actual and (ii) percentage change in these figures relative to those in 1997–98. [41175]

Mr. Hain: The budget for the New Deal in Wales in 1998–99 will depend on the take-up of the various New Deal programmes. The Employment Service, which has responsibility for the New Deal, currently anticipates that expenditure will be in the range of £25-£30 million.

The budget for Wales in 1997–98 is not comparable with this figure as it comprised only the 3-month Pathfinder for the New Deal for 18–24 year olds in South-West Wales.

Provision for programmes delivered through TECs in 1998–99 is £104.4 million. This compares with an equivalent figure of £110.6 million last year—a reduction of £6.2 million, or 5.6 per cent.

Recycling

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will review the guidelines issued to local government in Wales on the recycling of domestic and commercial waste products as regards (a) the extent of recycling and (b) improving facilities for recycling, particularly in rural areas. [41107]

Mr. Win Griffiths: In January, the Government announced that they would be undertaking a comprehensive review of waste management policy with a view to preparing a statutory waste strategy. A consultation paper will be issued shortly. Developing the strategy will offer the opportunity to consider all the various waste management options, including recycling, in the context of sustainable waste management.

Also, in March this year, the Government issued revised guidance to local authorities on preparing and revising local authority recycling strategies and recycling plans. The guidance incorporates advice on a wide range of recycling issues and will assist local authorities in developing effective plans for their areas.

North Wales Health Authority

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of the capitation money available to the Health Service in Wales was allocated to the North Wales Health Authority in (a) 1997–98 and (b) 1998–99; and what proportion of the change in the total funding available to the North Wales Health Authority between those years was accounted for by the change in capitation finance. [41100]

Mr. Win Griffiths: In 1997–98, the North Wales Health Authority discretionary Hospital, Community and Family Health Services allocation, was £314.410 million which represented 22.926 per cent. of the Wales total. In 1998–99 the corresponding figures were £322.950 million and 22.910 per cent. This represents a year-on-year cash change of £8.540 million, net of a £0.226 million capitation effect. This represented 2.6 per cent. of the cash change.
